

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LAWYERS REPORTS

ANNOTATED

NEW SERIES.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

HENRY W. NISWONGER, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF INDIANA.

(— Ind. —, 102 N. E. 135.)

Drugs — sale by physician.

1. A sale of cocaine by a duly licensed physician without a written prescription violates a statute making it unlawful for any person to sell cocaine except upon a written prescription of a duly licensed physician.

Note. — Right of physician to sell drugs without a prescription.

NISWONGER v. STATE arose under a statute making it unlawful for any druggist "or any other person" to sell cocaine except upon the written prescription of a duly registered physician, veterinary, or dentist, and it was held that under such a statute, no one, not even a duly licensed physician, has a right to sell cocaine without a prescription.

Only one other case has been found passing upon the right of a physician to sell drugs without a prescription, and that case is in harmony with the NISWONGER CASE. In State v. Jones, 18 Or. 256, 22 Pac. 840, the statute prohibited the sale or giving away of certain named drugs except to those who should present a prescription for the same from a physician or a regularly qualified pharmacist, and required the parties so selling to retain the prescription and keep it open for public inspection, and further provided that physicians or pharmacists who should prescribe any of the drugs named in the act should keep a record, which should be open to public inspection, of all cases in which they had prescribed such drugs, stating the date of prescription, the name and residence of the patient, the disease for which the drug was prescribed, and how much and how often the patient was instructed to use medicine containing

Evidence — sale of drugs — procurement by police.

2. Upon prosecution of one for illegal sale of drugs, evidence is admissible that the sale was procured by the prosecuting witness with money furnished by the police for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the evidence of the prosecution.

New trial — discretion to overrule.

3. There is no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in overruling a motion for new trial in a criminal case which is not filed until eighty days after rendition of the judgment, where the statute requires it to be filed within thirty days from the date of the verdict.

the drug. It was held that under such a statute, proof that one who is charged with selling one of the prohibited drugs (morphine in this case) without a prescription is a physician, is not enough to exonerate him. Under such a statute, the mere fact that he is a physician does not give him the right to sell such drugs without any other prescription than such as he may orally make to the patient at the time of the sale. Unless he shows that he prescribed the drug and kept the required record, he is in no better position than any other illegal seller.

In People v. Moorman, 86 Mich. 433, 49 N. W. 263, a physician was charged with selling drugs without having a license as a pharmacist as the statute required, and it was said that under the statute which exempted from its operation only practising physicians who "did not keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of medicines or poisons," if a physician wished to keep open shop, or in other words a drug store, he must come under the same regulations as other persons. He has no more right than any other person to step into a drug store and to compound or sell drugs, medicines, or poisons to one not his patient. It may be that he is as competent to do this as a registered pharmacist, but he has no vested right to do so.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Allen County convicting him of selling cocaine in violation of the drugs act. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John H. Aiken, for appellant:

A physician may furnish his patients with medicine as he may in his professional capacity deem proper without a prescription.

Messrs. Thomas M. Honan and Thomas H. Branaman for the State.

Spencer, Ch. J. delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was tried by the judge of the Allen circuit court, without a jury, on the charge of having unlawfully sold cocaine, in violation of the act of 1911 pertaining to the sale of drugs. Acts 1911, p. 45. From a judgment of conviction, he prosecutes this appeal.

The act of the legislature on which this prosecution is based provides "that it shall be unlawful for any druggist or any other person to retail, sell, or barter or give away any cocaine, . . . except upon the written prescription of a duly registered physician, licensed veterinarian, or licensed dentist, . . . except, however, that such cocaine, . . . may lawfully be sold at wholesale upon the written order of a licensed pharmacist or licensed druggist, duly registered practising physician, licensed veterinarian or licensed dentist."

Appellant first insists that the court erred in overruling the motion to quash each count of the affidavit on which this action was based. This affidavit is in two counts; but for the purposes of the question before us it is necessary only to set out the first count, which is as follows: "Count 1. Walter H. Immel, being duly sworn, upon his oath says that on the 16th day of May, 1912, at the county of Allen, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) and the state of Indiana, Henry W. Niswonger, who was then and there a druggist, did then and there unlawfully sell to one John Burton at and for the price of $1, one eighth of an ounce of cocaine, the said sale not being then and there made upon the written prescription of any duly registered physician, licensed veterinarian, or licensed dentist, the said Henry W. Niswonger having then and there a license as a physician and a license as a pharmacist."

Without deciding whether appellant has properly presented any question as to the sufficiency of the affidavit, it is apparent that the offense defined in the statute applies to all persons; and if a physician, although duly licensed, commits the act charged in this affidavit, he is not excepted from the operation of the law. The statute in question prohibits the sale, barter, or giving away of cocaine except under certain conditions, and it was not intended to exempt licensed physicians from its terms. There is nothing in the act which will authorize a physician to operate a drug store and, as such druggist, to sell cocaine indiscriminately to any one applying therefor without having a written prescription as required by law. Such prescription is a prerequisite to any sale of either of the drugs mentioned in the statute, and must be retained on file by the person making such sale. There was no error in overruling the motion to quash the affidavit.

It is next contended that the circuit court erred in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial. There was some evidence of the sale as alleged, and that it was made without a prescription therefor. Whether such testimony carried conviction was a matter resting exclusively with the court which tried the case, and the sufficiency thereof cannot be determined here. Freese v. State, 159 Ind. 597-604, 65 N. E. 915.

The remaining assignment is that the court erred in overruling the second or supplemental motion for a new trial. The original motion for a new trial was overruled and the judgment rendered on June 22, 1912. Appellant then prayed an appeal to this court, which was granted, and an appeal bond was regularly filed and approved on said date. The execution of the judgment rendered was thereby stayed, and appellant was given ninety days in which to prepare and file his bill of exceptions. On September 10, 1912, appellant filed his supplemental motion for a new trial, the substance of which motion is that the witness John Burton was given the money with which to purchase the cocaine from appellant by a police officer of the city of Fort Wayne, for the purpose of securing evidence against appellant of his violation of the cocaine act, supra. The motion stated that said Burton was intimidated, threatened, and coerced by said police officer, and forced to make the purchase of the cocaine, for the purpose of making a successful prosecution against appellant.

The record of the evidence introduced at the trial shows that this matter was gone into at that time, and was properly presented to the trial court for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness. While this method of securing evidence is not to be wholly commended or approved, it is sometimes true that the conditions surrounding the commission of crime are such as to make the securing of proper and competent evidence as to such act a very difficult task. When evidence is secured in the manner suggested by appellant's supplemental motion for a new trial, the method so employed and the credibility of the witness securing the same may properly be considered by the trial court or jury in seeing that justice is done. It must be presumed that such facts were so considered by the Allen circuit court in the trial of this case.

Furthermore, in our Code of Criminal Procedure it is provided (§ 2158, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908) that "the motion for a new trial . . . must be filed within thirty days from the date of the verdict or finding." While the matter of permitting a defendant to file a supplemental motion for a new trial in a case involving his life or liberty is within the sound discretion of the trial court, as was said in Dennis v. State, 103 Ind. 142-147, 2 N. E. 349, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 469, we are constrained to hold that it would not be an abuse of such discretion to refuse to entertain such motion in a case involving a misdemeanor only, where the same was not filed for eighty days after the rendition of the judgment. Here the circuit court entertained such motion, and did not err in overruling the same.

The judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Cox, J., concurs in conclusion.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

L. B. BLALOCK et al., Appts.,
v.

J. E. ATWOOD.

(154 Ky. 394, 157 S. W. 694.)

Trespass — tree on boundary — action for removal.

1. A property owner whose title runs to 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the center of the street may maintain an action against the adjoining property owner for removing a tree between the sidewalk and the curve, which was on the boundary line between the two lots.

Damages — destruction of tree.

2. An allowance of $275 for the malicious destruction by a property owner of a healthy and symmetrical shade tree 24 inches in diameter, on the boundary between his own and his neighbor's property, will not be interfered with, where evidence tends to show that the value of the neighboring property was diminished from two to five hundred dollars by the act.

II. Trees near boundary line, 6.

The earlier cases on this question have been collected in the note to Hickey v. Michigan C. R. Co. 21 L.R.A. 729.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon a verdict of $275 damages, which appellee recovered of appellants in the court below for a trespass committed by the latter. A former appeal in this case was dismissed, because of the appellants' failure to file the transcript in the office of the clerk of this court twenty days before the first day of the second term of the court next after the granting of the appeal as provided by § 738, Civil Code. Blalock v. Atwood, 148 Ky. 828, 147 S. W. 748. The present appeal was granted by the clerk of this court.

It appears from the record that the appellant Blalock and the appellee, Atwood, own and reside upon adjoining lots situated on Cherry street in the city of Mayfield. The lots were originally included in the one block which belonged to the common grantor of the present owners. Appellee has owned and resided upon his lot thirteen years; the appellant Blalock has owned and lived upon his lot only two or three years. The action was brought against appellants, L. B. Blalock, Bill Smith, and Cal Harris, Smith and Harris being Blalock's employees, to recover damages for the destruction by them of a shade tree, known as a silver leaf poplar, which stood in the sidewalk in front of the lots in question and partly upon each lot. The amount of the damages claimed was $500. The object of the action and character of the injury alleged are stated in the

a. Character of ownership.

Trees on a boundary line between adjoining tracts of land are owned in common by the owners of the respective tracts (Yoakum v. Davis, 162 Mo. App. 253, 144 S. W. 877); and this is true whether they are marked as boundary trees or not (Quillen v. Betts, 1 Penn. (Del.) 53, 39 Atl. 595; Phillips v. Brittingham, — Del. —, 77 Atl. 984).

Although it is stated in Scarborough v. Woodill, 7 Cal. App. 39, 93 Pac. 383, that the adjoining owners are tenants in common of such trees, the doctrine of Robinson v. Clapp, infra, is approved therein.

Some doubt is thrown on the doctrine of tenancy in common in Robinson v. Clapp, 65 Conn. 365, 29 L.R.A. 582, 32 Atl. 939, where it is stated that "it will be evident, we think, that the tenancy in common in a tree is of a peculiar nature, if there be such a tenancy at all. It would really seem to come to this,—that each of the landowners upon whose land any part of a trunk of a tree stands has an interest in that tree, a property in it, equal, in the first instance, to, or perhaps rather identical with, the part which is upon his land; and in the next place, embracing the right to demand that the owner of the other portion shall so use his part as not unreasonably to injure or destroy the whole."

A hedge set along, but not on, the line between landowners, which grows into such size that the trunks of the trees constituting the hedge crowd across the line onto the land of the other owner, becomes the property of the adjoining landowners in common. Yoakum v. Davis, supra.

b. Rights and remedies of parties.

1. Right to remove.

Where a row of cypress trees is growing on the boundary line between adjoining owners, one such owner cannot cut down every alternate two of such trees until 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

he has cut down one half the entire row. Scarborough v. Woodill, supra.

A landowner who cuts down and removes a tree directly upon the boundary line is liable in trespass for so doing. Quillen v. Betts, supra.

A landowner who enters upon the adjoining property to cut line trees, or who, without being thereon, aids or abets anyone in the cutting of such trees, is liable in damages to the adjoining owner. Phillips v. Brittingham, supra.

It is not required of an adjoining landowner to prove that the trees were cut with a wrongful intent, but it is sufficient if it be shown that the cutting was done without a justifiable cause or purpose, though it was done accidentally or by mistake. Ibid.

2. Right to compel removal.

A landowner who has set out a hedge on the boundary line cannot thereafter compel the adjoining landowner to remove the same, even though such adjoining landowner has assumed the care and maintenance of the hedge, and it is claimed that the roots and shade of the growing trees injuriously affect the productiveness of the plaintiff's land. Harndon v. Stultz, 124 Iowa, 440, 100 N. W. 329. By consent of the adjoining landowner in this case, the plaintiff was allowed to remove the hedge.

3. Right to trim to line.

It is stated in Scarborough v. Woodill, supra, citing Washb. Real Prop. 3d ed. § 7a, 6th ed. § 14, that neither of the adjoining owners is at liberty to cut away the tree without the consent of the other, nor to cut away the part which extends over his land, if he thereby injures the common property in the tree.

But it is held in Robinson v. Clapp, 65 Conn. 365, 29 L.R.A. 582, 32 Atl. 939, that one of the owners may cut off the branches up to the line, even though that would be practically to the trunk of the tree. It is stated farther that if in fact the trunk divides itself as the tree extends upward following excerpt from the petition: "That on or about said date [August, 1911] the defendants, L. B. Blalock, Bill Smith, and Cal Harris, over the repeated and continued protest and objections of the plaintiff, wantonly, wilfully, knowingly, unlawfully, forcibly, and in a high-handed and oppressive way and manner, without any regard whatever for the rights of this plaintiff, entered upon said lot or land and cut the limbs and body and dug up by the roots and removed and destroyed one very large and very valuable shade tree, which tree stood at least two thirds, if not entirely, on plaintiff's side of the line, and was a shade tree, a protection, and an ornament to plaintiff's dwelling house and premises. . . ."

The answer of appellants, in effect, admitted the removal and destruction of the tree, but denied the averments as to the manner in which it was done; also denied that the tree was to any extent on appellee's lot, or that he was damaged by its removal, and alleged that appellants possessed the right to remove it. Such of the averments of the answer as were of an affirmative nature were controverted by appellee's reply. Appellants complain that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence; that the jury should have been peremptorily instructed to find for appellants; and that the damages awarded were unauthorized by the evidence, and so excessive in amount as to indicate that the jury were influenced by passion and prejudice.

into two or more parts of similar size with more of a perpendicular than horizontal extension, each of those parts should be regarded as a portion of the trunk. In this case an injunction was sought, and it was held that the order should not extend farther than to restrain the owner from cutting any portion of the trunk and any further cutting of the branches or of the roots than he might lawfully have done had the trunk stood wholly upon his neighbor's land, but reaching to the boundary line. In a second appeal of this case, reported in 67 Conn. 538, 52 Am. St. Rep. 298, 35 Atl. 504, the trial court found that if the trunk of the tree was not touched, but the roots and branches were cut off up to the boundary line, the tree would probably die, but if it did not, it would, after such branches were cut, be unsightly and of no practical value to the adjoining landowner, and an injunction was refused to restrain the landowner from cutting away half the trunk and clearing away the branches and roots to the dividing line. Upon the appeal this action of the trial court was affirmed.

A hedge growing on the boundary between private property and that of the state may be trimmed to the boundary line by the lessees of the state without incurring any liability in damages. Bright v. New Orleans R. Co. 114 La. 679, 38 So. 494.

Compare with Harndon v. Stultz, supra, where the action was to compel the removal of the entire hedge, and not to have it trimmed or cut back.

4. Right to injunction.

It has been urged that injunction will not lie to restrain the cutting of trees on a boundary line, as the parties are tenants in common. Scarborough v. Woodill, 7 Cal. App. 39, 93 Pac. 383. But it is held in this case that where the act of the defendant is not a legitimate enjoyment of the estate, he may be enjoined from cutting the trees.

The court here took judicial notice of the flora and climatic conditions of the country, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) and from this and the testimony, which showed that the trees in question were cypress trees, presumed that the cutting of such cypress trees for firewood, on the boundary line of an orange orchard in southern California, was not a legitimate enjoyment of the estate in such trees, and issued an injunction to restrain the cutting.

Injunction lies at the suit of one lot owner in a rural or suburban locality, to restrain the owner of the adjoining lot from cutting a tree on the boundary line between the properties, and on the pavement line thereof. Comfort v. Everhardt, 35 W. N. C. 364.

Injunction will lie to restrain a landowner from cutting every alternate two trees until he has cut one half of the entire number of a row of trees on the boundary line between him and an adjoining landowner. Scarborough v. Woodill, supra.

In Tanner v. Wallbrunn, 77 Mo. App. 262, a mandatory injunction was denied where the adjoining landowner had, about the date of the institution of the suit, cut away the branches of the tree to the extent that they overhung the plaintiff's buildings, as it is stated that the plaintiff thereby obtained all the relief he was entitled to. The court states that even had the adjoining landowner refused to cut off such overreaching limbs, the plaintiff had the legal right to do so, and having this right it was his duty to avail himself thereof before resorting to the extraordinary remedy of injunction.

In Tanner v. Wallbrunn, supra, an injunction was denied to a landowner to compel the removal of roots from a near-by tree, where there was no evidence of any damage done by such roots.

In Robinson v. Clapp, 65 Conn. 365, 29 L.R.A. 582, 32 Atl. 939, the court states in an action in which an injunction was sought to restrain the cutting of a line tree, that "it might perhaps fairly be urged that to prevent the defendant from removing that portion of the trunk of the tree upon his own land—thereby depriving him of the opportunity to build upon it as de,

In our opinion none of these contentions is sustained by the record. As to the first, it is sufficient to say that the weight of the evidence was to the effect that the tree removed by the appellants was in part on the land of the appellee and in part on that of the appellant Blalock; three fourths of it being on the lot of the former, and one fourth on the lot of the latter. This fact was established, not only by the testimony of witnesses familiar with the line dividing the two lots, but also by a surveyor who ran the lines of the lots. Moreover, it was shown by several of appellee's witnesses that a year or more before the removal of the tree the appellant or his son, who was his sired—would be likely to produce a greater irreparable injury to the defendant than such removal, and the consequent destruction of the life of the tree, would cause the plaintiff, and that therefore the equitable remedy of injunction, which is not adapted finally to adjust the rights of the parties, should have been refused, and the contestants left to settle such rights in methods pertaining to the legal, and not the chancery, jurisdiction. We are inclined to think such elements of discretion enter into this matter that we ought not to disturb the conclusion of the trial court upon it." In a second appeal of this case, reported in 67 Conn. 538, 52 Am. St. Rep. 298, 35 Atl. 504, an injunction was refused, as stated above.

5. Right to maintain trespass or replevin.

The action of trespass quare clausum fregit lies in favor of a landowner against his adjoining landowner for cutting down and carrying away a line tree. Miller v. Holland, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 622.

The action in Quillen v. Betts, 1 Penn. (Del.) 53, 39 Atl. 595, was in trespass, but no special attention is given to the form of action.

A landowner cannot maintain replevin against the owner of the adjoining land, to recover fence posts cut by such adjoining owner out of a hedge on the boundary line. Yoakum v. Davis, 162 Mo. App. 253, 144 S. W. 877.

II. Trees near boundary line.

As will be seen by reference to the note to which this is supplementary, the landowner over whose land branches from a near-by tree overhang may remove the branches to the boundary line, on the theory that they are a nuisance.

This right is recognized in Tanner v. Wallbrunn, supra, but it is there held that an order in injunction which commands not only the destruction of the overhanging branches, but would destroy the tree itself, is erroneous. The building on the complainant's property was about 3 inches from the division line, and about 3½ feet from the trunk of the tree on the adjoining landowner's property. About the date of the institution of the suit, the adjoining landowner had cut away the branches of the tree to the extent that they overhung the plaintiff's buildings, and this being all the plaintiff was entitled to, the judgment of the lower court was reversed.

adjoining land, the removal may be effected without notice, notwithstanding the branches may have so overhung for more than twenty years. Lemmon v. Webb [1895] A. C. 1, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 205, 71 L. T. N. S. 647, 59 J. P. 564, 11 Reports, 116, affirming [1894] 3 Ch. 1.

An action lies against a landowner for allowing trees to overhang the adjoining land, where injury results to the crops of the adjoining landowner. Smith v. Giddy [1904] 2 K. B. 448, 2 B. R. C. 897, 73 L. J. K. B. N. S. 894, 91 L. T. N. S. 296, 20 Times L. R. 596, 53 Week. Rep. 207.

So, in Ackerman v. Ellis, 81 N. J. L. 1, 79 Atl. 883, it is held that trees which overhang the premises of another are a nuisance, and the person over whose land they spread is entitled to his action for damages against the person who is responsible for their presence there.

If, in removing the overhanging branches, trespass is committed, a liability is incurred.

Thus, a landowner who has cut the limbs of a tree standing on the adjoining owner's land about 3 feet from the line, close to the body of the tree, is liable in damages, unless he was acting under a license from the adjoining owner. Newberry v. Bunda, 137 Mich. 69, 100 N. W. 277. The license claimed in this case was one implied from an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the rebuilding of the line fence. The tree stood adjacent to that portion of the fence assigned to the plaintiff, but it was claimed that it was necessary, in order to fix the line upon which the fence was to be located, to line through the entire distance, and that, in order to do this, it was necessary to cut the limbs from the tree. As to whether or not a license existed under these circumstances was held to be a question of fact, and the court refused to disturb the finding of the jury in favor of the defendant.

The building regulations of the District of Columbia, which, after providing for the building or repairing of division fences, contain a provision that the new fence must be a rough board fence with tight or close joints, do not authorize the destruction of a division hedge located entirely on the land of one of the parties. Slye v. Guerdum, 29 App. D. C. 550.

The defendant in Slye v. Guerdum, supra, claimed that the plaintiff should have declared in case instead of in trespass, but he was held to have waived this objection by introducing evidence in his behalf after his motion to this effect had been overruled.

immediate grantor, caused the fence between the two lots to be rebuilt, in doing which the new fence was moved 6 or 8 inches further over on appellee's lot, by the manner in which the posts were reset, and by wholly placing the purlins and other material of which the fence was constructed on the side of the posts next to appellee's lot, instead of on the side thereof next to the appellant Blalock's lot, as they were placed on the posts of the old fence.

We do not find that the evidence furnished by the appellants' witnesses conduced to prove that the tree was not in part on appellee's side of the line dividing the two lots. It was more particularly directed toward showing that the present fence stands precisely where the old one stood, and that the tree was not as much as three fourths of it on appellee's side of the line. We are convinced that the evidence authorized a verdict for the appellee.

Appellants' contention as to the peremptory instruction rests upon their claim that the tree removed by them was a part of Cherry street, and therefore appellee had no property right therein. The law gives no support to this contention. Along the east side of Cherry street in front of the lots of appellee and the appellant Blalock is a pavement, between the outer edge of which and the street curbing is a narrow grass plot, and on this grass plot the tree removed by the appellants was situated. The third line of appellee's deed calls to run with the line of Blalock's lot from the rear of both lots, 225 feet to Cherry street; thence north and with the east line of Cherry street, 92 feet to the beginning, also on Cherry street. Appellee's deed therefore carried the front line or boundary of his lot to the center of Cherry street, subject to the use of the entire street and sidewalk by the public; and if the city authorities of Mayfield should discontinue the street and sidewalk, appellee's title to 92 feet in width, to the center of the street, of the ground now included in the street and sidewalk could not be questioned.

In Williams v. Johnson, 149 Ky. 409, 149 S. W. 821, the city of London having, by proper authority, converted a public road within its limits, upon which the appellants' lots fronted, into a macadamized street, and in doing so abandoned the use of part, but at no point more than the whole, of the old roadbed in front of the lots, the appellee, their grantor, by actions in ejectment against appellants severally, sought to recover such part of the old roadbed as lay between their lots and the new street, upon the ground that its abandonment as a public highway entitled him to same. We held, however, that as the deeds by which ap-pellee conveyed the lots described them as fronting and abutting on the old road, and the street was substituted for the old road, its construction and establishment by the city operated to include the abandoned roadbed in appellants' lots, respectively, and extend the boundaries thereof to the edge of the street. In the opinion it is said: "It seems to be the universally recognized rule that the conveyance of land bordering on a public highway conveys title to the center of the highway, subject to its use by the public, whether it is so expressed in the deed or not; and where a conveyance, or a bond to convey, designates the public highway as one of the boundaries of the tract, it will, in the absence of language showing a contrary intention, be construed as including the highway itself to the center or middle thereof. Tiedeman Real Prop. 3d ed. § 601; 2 Washb. *Real Prop. 636; 14 Cyc. 1181; 2 Ballard, Real Prop. § 48; Warbritton v. Demorett, 129 Ind. 346, 27 N. E. 730, 28 N. E. 613; Silvey v. McCool, 86 Ga. 1, 12 S. E. 175; Firmstone v. Spaeter, 150 Pa. 616, 30 Am. St. Rep. 851, 25 Atl. 41; Hawesville v. Lander, 8 Bush, 679; Schneider v. Jacob, 86 Ky. 106, 5 S. W. 350; Jacob v. Woolfolk, 90 Ky. 429, 9 L.R.A. 551, 14 S. W. 415; Bright v. Palmer, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 772, 47 S. W. 590; Hommell v. Lewis, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2299, 66 S. W. 1041; Coppin v. Manson, 144 Ky. 634, 139 S. W. 860; Ballard, etc. v. Louisville, 3rd Ky. Ms. Opinions, 31.

In Schneider v. Jacob, 86 Ky. 106, 5 S. W. 350, we held that where the owner of land adjacent to a city exhibits a map of it, laying it out into building lots, streets, and alleys, and sells the lots as bounded by such streets or alleys, this is an immediate dedication of the streets and alleys to the use of the purchaser and to the public, although they have not been actually opened; and where a lot thus sold fronts on a street, and the deed calls for the street as the boundary, the title passes to the center of the street, subject to the right of the public to the use; and if the street is never opened, the purchaser is entitled to hold to the center of the strip of ground thus described as a street.

The reasons for the rule in question are thus given in the opinion: "The purchaser of the lot, doubtless, would not have purchased it but for the usual benefits of the street; he therefore pays an increased price for the lot. He purchases the lot with the understanding that he may build houses fronting on the street, with windows, doors, and doorsteps, and that the doorsteps may extend beyond the line of the street; also that he may construct vaults below the surface of the street; and vaults in cities of considerable size are nearly always constructed under the sidewalks and they are sometimes extended to the center of the street. Their construction as depositories for fuel and other necessities is highly necessary. Shade trees, posts, awnings, etc., are also necessary protections and conveniences. If the grantor held the property right in the street up to the dividing line between the street and the lot, he could deprive his vendee of the right of ingress from the streets into his house, and exit from it, of light and air, and of planting shade trees, and erecting posts and awnings, and of constructing vaults. . . . For these reasons the correct rule seems to be that where the lot fronts on a street, and the deed calls for the street as the boundary, the title passes to the center of the street, subject to the right of public use. . . . The fact that the description only brings the lot to the edge of the street can make no difference, for the description which thus brings the lot to the edge of the street must be merely understood as specifying the land that the purchaser may hold and use as exclusively his own, and as defining the line at which the public easement begins, the purchaser owning, subject to that easement, to the center of the street. Paul v. Carver, 26 Pa. 223, 67 Am. Dec. 413."

If, as the above authorities hold, appellee's deed, calling, as it does, to run with the east side of Cherry street, carries the front boundary of his lot to the center of the street, and conveys him the title to the ground included in the street to the center thereof, subject to the public easement, it necessarily also passed to him the title to the entire sidewalk in front of his lot, subject to the public easement; and if the shade tree removed by appellants from the sidewalk was in part on his side of the line dividing his lot from the lot of the appellant Blalock, his title to such part of the tree could not be questioned. This being true, the appellants, notwithstanding the fact that the tree was also in part on Blalock's side of the division line, had no right to remove the tree without appellee's consent, and in doing so they committed a trespass.

In Griffin v. Bixby, 12 N. H. 464, 37 Am. Dec. 225, it was held that "a tree standing directly upon the line between adjoining owners, so that the line passes through it, is the common property of both parties, whether marked or not, and that trespass will lie if one cuts and destroys it without the consent of the other."

The fact that the shade tree in question stood on the border of the sidewalk, where it afforded shade for the benefit of those who traveled the sidewalk, did not interfere 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

with the appellee's right to protect it from destruction, or with his right to recover damages for the injury done his property right therein by the act of appellants in destroying it. Musch v. Burkhart, 83 Iowa, 301, 12 L.R.A. 486, 32 Am. St. Rep. 305, 48 N. W. 1025. In Russellville Home Teleph. Co. v. Com. 33 Ky. L. Rep. 132, 109 S. W. 340, we held that it was an indictable offense under the statute for the telephone company to unnecessarily cut shade trees standing on the side of a highway on the land of one who had given it permission to erect its line and poles thereon, saying in the opinion: "They stood upon Orndorff's land on the border of the public highway, and trees upon the highway are valuable for the shade they make for the benefit of those who travel the highway; and the owner's right to protect them from the ax was not lessened by the fact that other persons using the highway in common with him got the same enjoyment he received from the shade afforded by the trees when standing."

Having, as we think, properly disposed of the first and second grounds urged by appellants for a reversal, we will now consider the third and final complaint, that the verdict is excessive. We regard the complaint as without merit. According to the evidence, the tree was 24 inches in diameter, symmetrical in form, free from disease or blemish, and of sufficient size and height to afford excellent shade and at the same time greatly ornament appellee's premises. The value of such a tree is very great, and we are not surprised that the witnesses introduced in appellee's behalf so regarded it. Several of them testified that its loss to appellee greatly reduced the vendible value of his property. Some of them saying, in substance, that its fair market value, whether sold for cash or on reasonable credit, was less by $250 or $300 after the destruction of the tree than was its value before, and others placed the difference or deterioration in the value of the property at a larger sum, and one or more of them as high as $500. But, in addition to the actual damage to appellee's property by the destruction of the tree, the wanton and malicious character of the trespass committed by appellants in destroying the tree authorized the jury to award appellee exemplary damages. The conversation had with the appellant Blalock by appellee, and his responses to the requests to spare the tree made of him by the latter, illustrate the animus, wantonness, and violence with which the trespass was committed. The testimony of appellee as to the conversation referred to was corroborated by others.

Manifestly, under the averments of the petition and the evidence, the case was one for the recovery of exemplary as well as actual damages, and we have been unable to find in the record any cause for holding that the $275 damages awarded by the jury is in any sense excessive; nor is it apparent that anything occurred during the trial to inflame the passions or excite the prejudices of the jury toward the appellants.

The instructions gave the jury, in substantially correct terms, all the law required for their guidance in arriving at a verdict, and no material error is shown in the admission or rejection of evidence.

The conclusion we have reached makes it unnecessary for us to pass upon appellee's motion to strike the bill of exceptions from the record.

Judgment affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. HUGO SCHWARTZKOPF et al., Respts.,
v.

CITY COUNCIL OF BRAINERD, Appts.

• (121 Minn. 182, 141 N. W. 97.)

Mandamus — charges against officials — hearing.

Section 12 of the city charter of Brainerd

Headnote by PHILIP E. BROWN, J.

Note. — Mandamus to compel exercise of the power to remove or suspend public officer.

The early cases on this question are collected in the note to State ex rel. Davern v. Rose, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 194.

As shown in the earlier note, the cases generally announce the rule that the exercise of the power to remove or suspend a public officer, where the duty to act in the premises is clearly established, can only be enforced by the courts in so far as they may compel action on the part of the officer or board, to pass upon the sufficiency of the charges or investigate the conduct complained of, but that they cannot compel further action where the officer or the board has a discretion in the matter.

Thus, mandamus will lie to compel a city council to order an election for the recall of some of its members sought to be removed from office, in the manner provided by the city charter, upon the presentation of petitions requesting such an election, where they are duly filed and there are no objections to their sufficiency. Conn v. Richmond, 17 Cal. App. 705, 121 Pac. 714, 719.

imposes no duty upon the city council to entertain and hear a petition filed by citizens and taxpayers, whether specially interested or not, preferring charges against city officers and demanding their removal; and hence an alternative writ of mandamus to compel the council to fix a time and place for a hearing upon charges so preferred was demurrable.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Crow Wing County granting a writ of mandamus to compel them to hear charges against members of the water board. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. E. Ryan, for appellants:

Since the charter provision does not "specially enjoin" the governing body so to entertain charges, it is a discretionary matter, and the relators have no "clear legal right" to the same.

Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 635, p. 1548; Wish-ek v. Becker, 10 N. D. 63, 84 N. W. 590; Barnum v. Gilman, 27 Minn. 466, 38 Am. Rep. 304, 8 N. W. 375; Re Kane, 71 Misc. 163, 129 N. Y. Supp. 990; Gamble v. State, 61 Fla. 233, 54 So. 370; State ex rel. Romano v. Yakey, 43 Wash. 15, 85 Pac. 990, 9 Ann. Cas. 1071; 26 Cyc. 162.

For reasons of sound public policy, governing bodies should not be compelled to hear charges formulated and preferred by private citizens.

Chouteau v. Rice, 1 Minn. 121, Gil. 97; Gleason v. University of Minnesota, 104

It will be observed that in STATE EX REL. SCHWARTZKOPF v. BRAINERD, the right to the writ of mandamus was denied, although it only sought to compel the hearing of the charges. In this case, however, unlike those upholding the right to mandamus to compel action or a hearing of the charges, the respondent was vested with discretion, not only as to the ultimate question of removal, but also as to the preliminary question whether the charges should be heard. As shown in the earlier note, mandamus will not ordinarily lie to control the decision of the officer or board on the ultimate question of removal, even when it is proper for the purpose of compelling action on their part.

Thus, mandamus will not lie to compel the court to enter an order ousting a public officer from office for an admitted violation of the Code, which makes the taking of illegal fees a ground for removal from office, where the proceedings for removal are quasi criminal in character and the question of guilt or innocence of accused is one exclusively for the judge. Smith, 123 Wis. 510, 102 N. W. 1, 3 Ann. Cas. 773.

Mandamus does not lie to compel an official to reverse a decision already rendered in the exercise of discretionary power.

Mandamus will not be granted where it is obvious that it will prove futile and practically unavailing.

Messrs. Russell & Barron, for respondents:

The city council of the city of Brainerd, vested with the power to remove a member of the water and light board, must proceed to hear charges formulated and preferred by private citizens, where those charges involve grave and serious abuses in public office.

W. 118.

Philip E. Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to any of the occurrences disclosed in this proceeding, Brainerd framed and adopted a charter for its government as a city, and still continues to be so governed. Among other things this charter provides:

"Sec. 12. Every person appointed to any office by the city council or mayor, or elected to any office by the people, may be removed from such office by a vote of two thirds of all the aldermen authorized to be elected. But any officer elected by the people or appointed by the mayor shall not be removed except for cause, nor unless first furnished with a copy of the charges, nor until such person shall have reasonable opportunity to be heard in person, or by council in his own defense. The city council shall fix the time and place for the trial of such officer, of which not less than ten days' notice shall be given to such officer and to the aldermen, and shall have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers, and to hear and determine the case; and if such officer shall refuse or neglect to appear and answer such charges, the city council may declare such office vacant. Among such causes shall be continued absence by aldermen without leave, from three successive regular meetings of the city council, or a member of a board from the meetings of such board, or neglect of duty of any officer."

"Sec. 46. The city council shall examine, audit, and adjust the accounts of all the city officers and agents of the city at such times as they may deem proper, and also at the end of each fiscal year and before the term for which the officers of said city were elected or appointed shall expire; and the city council shall require and may compel by proceedings in court each and every such officer and agent to exhibit his books, accounts, and vouchers for such examination and settlement, and if any such officer or agent shall refuse to comply with the orders of said council in the discharge of his said duties in the pursuance of this section, or shall neglect or refuse to render his accounts or present his books or vouchers to the city council or a committee thereof, it shall be the duty of the city council to declare the office of such person vacant; and the city council shall order suits and proceedings at law against any officer or agent of said city who may be found delinquent or defaulting in his accounts or in the discharge of his official duties, and shall make a full record of such settlements and adjustments."

On December 5, 1911, one of these relators, with others, filed with the city council a petition praying the council to investigate and audit the water and light board, under § 46 of the charter above set out. Thereafter a committee was appointed by the council to conduct the investigation, which committee filed a report. The council, however, determined to prefer no charges against any city official involved in the proceeding. On September 3, 1912, these relators filed with the council a verified petition, alleging, among other things, that they were resident citizens of the city and were consumers of its water and light; that they petitioned for and in behalf of themselves and all other citizens of the city and consumers of its water and light; that during the investigation and audit of the water and light board referred to sworn testimony was taken before the council, and that the evidence adduced during such investigation was amply sufficient to require the council to remove the president of the water and light board; that all allegations set out in the petition as founded on information and belief were based upon such sworn testimony so taken. The petition charged the president of the water and light board with being the president of a banking corporation organized under the laws of the state and doing a banking business in the city, and that such bank had established, as the petitioners were informed and believed, "banking relations with certain members of the city council and members of said board, and [had] loaned money to certain members of the city council and of said board, and has otherwise entered into financial transactions with the intent to influence the said members of the city council and members of said board to vote favorably on propositions involving" the bank and the president of the water and light board. The petition further charged, on information and belief, that between December 25, 1909, and January 1, 1910, the said president paid to one of the aldermen of the city $5, "with intent to bribe, influence, and corrupt" such alderman, and to procure his favorable vote on matters in which the president of said board was interested; and a like transaction between the president and another alderman was similarly charged as of date June 1, 1911. Allegations were also made that the president, in May, 1911, made a trip to St. Paul, with another member of the board, expending $57.41 of the board's money without authority, and that he entertained such other member of the board on such trip "with intent to influence and corrupt" him and to procure his vote on matters in which the president was interested; and, further, that he made presents to members of the board as and for his bank, at the expense of the board, was guilty of extravagance and neglect of duty in the renting of rooms for the board's use, and in allowing the city attorney to write insurance on the property of the board, and was guilty of malfeasance in taking the opinion of such attorney concerning the validity of a city contract, knowing that such attorney was counsel for the other party to the contract. Other charges of malfeasance, nonfeasance, and incompetency were made, the whole petition covering more than six pages of the paper book, and closing with a prayer demanding that the council should, pursuant to § 12 of the charter, proceed forthwith to remove the said president, and should declare his office vacant.

On September 16, 1912, the city council adopted a resolution "that there is no cause for the granting of said petition or for proceeding thereunder, and that said petition be and the same is hereby denied." Whereupon the relators presented their petition to the district court for an alternative writ of mandamus, setting out, in substance, the facts above recited, and making the petition of September 3d and resolution of September 16th a part thereof, and praying, on behalf of themselves and of all other taxpayers and residents of the city and of consumers of its water and light, that a writ of mandamus should issue commanding the city council to fix a time and place for the hearing of such charges, and to comply with § 12 of the charter in all respects. Thereafter, and on September 26, 1912, an alternative writ was issued, reciting the matters stated, commanding the city council, immediately after the receipt of the writ, to fix a time and place for the hearing of the charges preferred in the petition in accordance with § 12 of the charter, or to show cause, etc. On the return day the council appeared and moved to quash the writ on the ground of the insufficiency of the facts alleged in the petition and writ to constitute a cause of action, and likewise demurred on the same ground. The court denied the motion to quash and overruled the demurrer, and from the order so made the council appealed.

1. The demurrer challenged the adequacy of the facts relied upon by the relators to warrant the granting of the relief demanded (State ex rel. McGill v. Cook, 119 Minn. 407, 138 N. W. 432), and, for the purposes of this appeal, all the allegations of the writ must be taken as true, so that, if under any reasonable construction thereof the relators are entitled to relief, the order appealed from must be affirmed. If, in connection with these propositions, we keep in mind the elementary principles determinative of the right of resort to the remedy of mandamus, and also the precise question underlying the present controversy, no difficulty in reaching the correct conclusion should ensue. Of these, then, in order:

Where the matter involved relates merely to the enforcement of a private right, the relator must be the person interested in having such right enforced; but where the object is the enforcement of a public duty, not due to the government as such, any private citizen may move to enforce it. The rule is thus laid down in State ex rel. Currie v. Weld, 39 Minn. 426, 40 N. W. 561; and in the note to State v. Gardner, 98 Am. St. Rep. 866, it is stated as follows: "Where the relief is sought merely for the protection of private rights, the relator must show some personal or special interest in the subject-matter, since he is regarded as the real party in interest, and his rights must clearly appear. On the other hand, where the question is one of public right, and the object of the mandamus is to procure the enforcement of a public duty, the people are regarded as the real party, and the relator, at whose instigation the proceedings are instituted, need not show that he has any legal or special interest in the result; it being sufficient to show that he is a citizen, and, as such, interested in the execution of the laws." See also People ex rel. Chilcoat v. Harrison, 253 Ill. 625, 97 N. E. 1092, Ann. Cas. 1913 A, 539.

Nevertheless, as declared in Lauritsen v. Seward, 99 Minn. 313, 324, 109 N. W. 404, 409, in defining the function of the writ of mandamus at the time of the adoption of our Constitution: "It issued only to command and compel the performance of clearly defined duties which were already prescribed by law. 8 Enc. Laws of England, 96, and cases there cited. The present 'existence of a legal right or obligation is the foundation of every writ of mandamus.' Lord Campbell, Ex parte Napier (1852) L. R. 18 Q. B. 692, 695, 21 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 332, 17 Jur. 380. No new duty was created by the writ; it was neither a law nor the source of law; it never commanded the performance of an act which was unauthorized in the absence of the writ. Its office was to compel the performance of a plain and positive existing duty, and it issued only upon the application of one who had a clear right to demand the performance of such duty. It issued only to compel a party to do that which it was his duty to do without the command of the writ, and the obligation had to be both peremptory and clearly defined." The writ still has precisely the same office. "A writ of mandamus," said Chief Justice Start, in State ex rel. McGill v. Cook, 119 Minn. 407, 138 N. W. 432, 434, "will issue only to compel the performance by an inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person of an act which the law specifically enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station."

We are indebted to Mr. Justice Marshall for the following, from State ex rel. Runge v. Anderson, 100 Wis. 523, 527, 42 L.R.A. 239, 76 N. W. 482, 483: "Before the petitioner for a writ of mandamus is entitled thereto, he must show more than that there is a public wrong specially injurious to him. He must show that such wrong consists of some failure of official duty clearly imposed by law, and that there is no other adequate specific legal remedy. The duty must be positive, not discretionary, and the right must be so clear as not to admit of any reasonable controversy. These principles are so elementary as not to call for discussion or support by a citation of authorities."

Having stated the relevant principles, let us next define the question to be determined. It is not one of the expediency or wisdom of broadening the powers or duties of the municipal council concerning the disciplining of its officers for misconduct, or whether such body, with that end in view, may of its own motion investigate charges against city officers preferred by citizens; but, as there clearly is no common-law or general statutory obligation, the sole inquiry ultimately involved narrows to this—to state the question most favorably to the relators: Have we here any charter provision which in terms imposes the duty upon the council of doing the identical thing ordered to be done by the writ, or from which such must necessarily result by fair and reasonable construction, interpretation, or implication? If so, then the court's order must be sustained; otherwise, it cannot be.

The relators claim to find such in the provisions of § 12 of the charter above quoted. We cannot so hold; for, even though it be conceded that the relators have a proper status as such so far as concerns their interest in the matter, yet, in our opinion, the charter imposes no positive duty upon the council in the matter of the removal of city officers, except that when, in the exercise of the disciplinary discretion vested in the council by the first portion of § 12, it undertakes to remove an officer appointed by the mayor or elected by the people, it must furnish him with a copy of the charges preferred against him, shall give him an opportunity to be heard, and "shall fix a time and place for the trial,"—such latter provisions being mere limitations upon the power of removal previously conferred, and not being intended to impose upon the council any duty, either to prefer charges of its own motion, or to entertain and hear petitions for removal presented by outsiders, whether citizens and taxpayers or not. The provision that "any officer elected by the people or appointed by the mayor shall not be removed except for cause" is likewise a mere limitation upon the general power of removal previously conferred. It is clear from an analysis of § 12 that every duty prescribed therein is imposed by way of restriction upon the power granted in the first sentence thereof, and all tests lead to this conclusion. Charter provisions of this kind are not unusual, being inserted simply to empower the council, if it be so disposed, to discipline its members, appointees, and city officers. Neither is there anything to warrant us in reading into the charter a provision authorizing citizens to file the charges or to compel investigations. The charter was the handiwork of the people of the city, and it is an extraordinary circumstance, if it was their intention to compel the council to investigate charges such as here involved, that no procedure to that end is even suggested, and no safeguards are provided.

Our conclusion is that § 12 enjoins no duty upon the council to fix a time and place for the hearing of the charges preferred by the relators.

The order appealed from is reversed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MISSOURI, Resp.,

v.

ROY LARKIN et al., Appts.

(250 Mo. 218, 157 S. W. 600.)

Appeal — refused instructions — general charge.

1. Refusal to give requested instructions is not error where the court has fully covered the question in its general charge.

Homicide — liability of bystander.

2. The mere presence of a woman when her paramour kills her husband, at a place to which the latter had followed them, does not render her guilty of homicide.

Trial — comment of prosecuting attorney — failure of accused to deny facts.

3. The prosecuting attorney may comment in his argument to the jury upon the failure of accused to deny incriminating facts when on the witness stand, although the statute permits him to be cross-examined only as to matters to which he has referred in his examination in chief.

Homicide — presumption from killing — self-defense.

4. The presumption of murder which arises from the wilful intentional killing of one man by another does not prohibit the latter from showing that the killing was done in self-defense.

Same — self-defense — paramour of wife.

5. One is not deprived of the right of self-defense when attacked by another, by the fact that he has enticed the latter's wife from her home for illicit purposes.

Criminal law — trial — instruction — self-defense.

6. The mere fact that a man who killed another had enticed the latter's wife from her home for illicit purposes does not justify an instruction that he would not have the right of self-defense if he provoked or voluntarily sought, brought on, or engaged in the difficulty with deceased.

Evidence — homicide — beer bottle.

7. Upon trial of one for homicide in killing the husband of a woman with whom he was found in company after dark, under a tree, at which place the homicide occurred, beer bottles found there at the time are admissible in evidence.

Appeal — statements in argument — error.

8. It is not reversible error for the prosecuting attorney to comment in argument to the jury upon the failure of accused in a murder case to call a witness, although it is a matter of inference that he might not have been in a position to see what occurred.

Note. — Right of self-defense against attack due to defendant's illicit relations with wife or other relative of assailant.

The general rule applicable to self-defense in homicide is stated in 21 Cyc. 800, as follows: "Justifiable homicide in self-defense occurs where a person, without any fault on his part in bringing on the contest or struggle, kills another under at least an apparent necessity, in order to save himself from death or great bodily harm. Excusable homicide in self-defense occurs where a person, in the course of a sudden affray or combat in which he has become engaged with another, necessarily or under a reasonable apprehension of danger, kills the other to save himself from death or great bodily harm. To justify or excuse a homicide on the ground of self-defense, the slayer must believe and have reasonable grounds for believing that he is in imminent danger of death, great bodily harm, or some felony, and that there is a necessity to kill in order to save himself therefrom," and "he must not have been 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the aggressor or provoker of the difficulty." Most of the cases falling within the present note involve the element of provocation as barring the right to set up self-defense; the view taken by some of the courts being that illicit relation of the kind herein under consideration is such a provocation as precludes the setting up of self-defense as a justification for a killing done by the paramour in repulsing an attack by the deceased. Another element which enters into the determination as to whether or not self-defense may be set up is whether the husband was justified in making the attack.

The question of justification upon the part of the deceased as affecting the right of the accused to set up self-defense was touched upon in STATE v. LARKIN, it being there said that the husband was not justified in making an attack upon the accused and that he would have been guilty of manslaughter at least had he killed the accused; but the court intimated that had the husband been justified, it would have precluded the setting up of self-defense by the accused.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Francois County convicting them of murder in the second degree. Reversed.

Statement by Faris, J.:

Defendants were jointly tried on the charge of murder in the second degree in the circuit court of St. Francois county on the 16th day of June, 1912, and, being found guilty, the punishment of each of them was assessed at imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of ten years. From this conviction, after the usual motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, they jointly appealed.

Defendant Ida Belle Harris was the wife of one Henry Harris, who, as the evidence discloses, was shot to death by defendant Roy Larkin in St. Francois county on May 3, 1912. The information charges defendant Larkin with murder in the first degree, and defendant Ida Belle Harris is jointly charged as accessory thereto before the fact. The state elected, however, to waive the charge of murder in the first degree, and to proceed against defendants for murder in the second degree.

The facts of the case are few and simple. Practically none of the testimony adduced on the part of the state was denied by the defendants, and likewise practically none of the testimony adduced by the defendants was denied by the state. The facts of the homicide, in brief, are about as follows: Deceased, Henry Harris, was by occupation

And the effect of the element of justification was in issue in Drysdale v. State, 83 Ga. 744, 6 L.R.A. 424, 20 Am. St. Rep. 340, 10 S. E. 358, wherein the court, in holding that a husband may attack for intimacy with his wife in his presence, raising a well-founded belief from the improper or unjustifiable conduct of the defendant that an adulterous act is just over or about to begin, and that the adulterer, though in imminent danger, cannot defend himself by using a deadly weapon, said that "A man surprised by the husband immediately after an actual, or immediately before an intended adulterous connection can lawfully defend himself against the husband's violence by flight only, or at least by means short of deadly. He cannot stand his ground and shoot or cut to repel the husband's attack upon him, though it may be a dangerous attack. Whatsoever the law would justify the husband in doing under such circumstances, it would not justify the adulterer in preventing by homicide or attempting homicide; perhaps not otherwise than by making his escape," but that "circumstances which would lead a husband to believe that a man has just been engaged in the guilty act, or is about to engage in it, would not deprive the man of the right of self-defense on the spot, unless he himself was chargeable with giving rise to such circumstances by his own improper or unjustifiable conduct." But in Wilkerson v. State, 91 Ga. 729, 44 Am. St. Rep. 63, 17 S. E. 990, the rule announced in Drysdale v. State, supra, was qualified by holding that if a husband, knowing of his wife's criminal infidelity, deliberately lays a trap for her paramour by pretending to him and her that he, the husband, is going on a journey, when it is his purpose not to go, but to conceal himself and lie in wait at or near his home for the purpose of killing the paramour in case he should be caught in the guilty act, at the same time expecting and designing so to catch him, the paramour has a right to defend himself against a deadly assault made by the husband under such circumstances, although the assault be made whilst the guilty act is in progress; and if the husband be killed as matter of necessity to prevent his assault from resulting in death, the homicide is justifiable. This decision is based upon the fact that the act of the husband was in no sense justifiable, for it was not to prevent the adultery, he being consonant of previous similar acts, but to obtain revenge; whereas in the Drysdale Case it did not appear that there was any previous adultery or circumstances other than that the husband, upon discovering the intimacy, immediately assaulted the paramour under such circumstances as to render his act justifiable. And in Brown v. State, 135 Ga. 656, 70 S. E. 329, the decision in the Drysdale Case was again limited to cases where the attack was justifiable because of an impending or progressing wrong, and it was held that a father was not justified in attacking one who had previously had criminal intercourse with his daughter; that being guilty of wrong in the past did not deprive the defendant of the right of self-defense; and therefore that if the father assaulted defendant after the consummation of the sexual act, and to avenge such conduct, the defendant would not have forfeited his right of self-defense.

The first view above referred to is illustrated by the case of Dabney v. State, 113 Ala. 38, 59 Am. St. Rep. 92, 21 So. 211, wherein, in holding that illicit intercourse with the deceased's wife was such a wrong as took away from the paramour the right of self-defense in case the husband attacked him, the court said: "If, as in the case at bar, the paramour, in order to save his own life from the consequences of the deadly passions of the husband, excited by the wrong of the former, slays the husband, he can in no sense be said to have been free from fault in bringing about the mortal encounter; the fatal result, to the contrary, is traceable directly to his own wrong, and he cannot justify his act by an invocation of the doctrine under which one free from fault and unable to retreat is authorized to save his own life, by destroying that of another." This rule was followed with approval in State v. Emerson, 78 S. C. 83, 58 S. E. 974, wherein it was held that to hold illicit a miner, engaged in labor at the time of his death upon what is called the "night shift." His work required him to leave his home about 9 o'clock every night. His wife, Ida Belle Harris, who is one of the defendants here, for some weeks prior to the killing had been in the habit of permitting to visit her and of entertaining during the absence of the deceased the defendant Roy Larkin, who was a bartender in one of the saloons of Flat River. There is no direct and positive evidence that the defendants sustained toward each other illicit relations; but the inference that they did so is patent from the record. On the night of the homicide, deceased after preparing his lunch, and about the hour of 9 o'clock, left his home for the purpose of going to his work. Some thirty minutes after deceased left, defendant Larkin came to the home of the deceased, bringing with him four bottles of beer. For some little time, thirty minutes or more perhaps, defendant Larkin sat in the kitchen of the home of deceased and talked with defendant Ida Belle Harris and one Cora Carrow, the hired servant of the Harris's. During the conversation he drew from his pocket a pistol, and laid the same upon a chair. When Larkin left the kitchen, he returned the pistol to his pocket, and accompanied by Mrs. Harris left the house, going with her, as the subsequent testimony shows, to a point some 91 yards distant from, and southeast of, the house of deceased. Shortly after the defendants had left the house intercourse with a man's daughter in his home was such an act as would be reasonably calculated to stir the passion of the father, and provoke an attack on the spot such as would deprive the paramour of the right of self-defense should he kill the father in resisting such attack, although the father had killed the paramour under such circumstances would have been guilty of manslaughter at least.

So, in State v. Martin, 9 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 778, it was held that if the jury should find that the defendant's debauchery of the deceased's wife and daughter was the direct cause of the deceased's attack upon the defendant, he had so far put himself in the wrong by provoking the attack that he would not be justified in killing in repelling the attack, unless he retreated as far as he could, and avoid the conflict by every available means that did not increase his danger.

And in Dabney v. State, supra, in holding that if a paramour arm himself with a deadly weapon in contemplation that the husband would interfere with his having illicit intercourse with the wife, and for the purpose of taking life should it become necessary to save his own in the course of such interference, and he does in fact take the life of the husband, while so interfering, in pursuit of such intent, he cannot set up self-defense, but is guilty of murder, the court said: "It is also a too elementary and familiar principle of law to need discussion or reference to authorities, that if one entering upon the commission of a wrongful act has in contemplation that another will or may interfere with his enterprise, arms himself with a deadly weapon with the intent to take the life of that other should it become necessary to save his own in the course of such interference, and who in fact does take the life of the person so interfering in pursuance of such intent, is guilty of murder in the first degree; the intent to kill under the conditions contemplated constituting the 'formed design' sufficient and necessary in murder, when the circumstances of the act do not justify the design, and the wrongfulness of the act in which the slayer was engaged at the time the necessity to strike arose precluding all justification of the design." So, in State v. Emerson, supra, it was held, following Dabney v. State, supra, that if the paramour of the deceased's daughter arm himself in anticipation of the father interfering with his purpose to have illicit intercourse with such daughter, and with the intent to take life should it become necessary to save his own in the course of such interference, and, during the course of such an interference he did kill the father, he would be guilty of murder. And to the effect that if the defendant produced the occasion for the purpose or in order to have a pretext for killing, the killing will be murder, no matter to what extremity the defendant was reduced, see statements in Varnell v. State, 28 Tex. App. 56, 9 S. W. 65, and Franklin v. State, 30 Tex. App. 628, 18 S. W. 468.

And in Ridgell v. State, 1 Ala. App. 94, 55 So. 327, it was held that the mere fact that accused had had improper relations with deceased's daughter would not deprive him of the right to claim freedom from fault, so as to permit him to set up self-defense in a prosecution for having killed the father while repulsing an attack prompted by the statement of the defendant, when told that he was too familiar, that he would do as he pleased.

In Texas, where by statute a husband is justified in slaying a person when taken in the act of adultery with the wife and before they have separated, and by adjudication a distinction is made between the so-called perfect and imperfect right of self-defense, it is held that the wrong does not entirely remove the right of self-defense. This distinction and its application is well illustrated by the case of Reed v. State, 11 Tex. App. 509, 40 Am. Rep. 795, wherein, in holding erroneous an instruction to the effect that an adulterer is not justified in resisting an attack by the husband of the adulteress, it is said: "Evidently the court must have based this charge upon the converse of the proposition stated in art. 567 of the Penal Code, which declares that 'homicide is justifiable when committed by the husband upon the person of anyone taken in the act of of deceased together, the latter returned from his work and went into the north room of his dwelling, where he obtained from a drawer of a sewing machine a 32-caliber revolver. Deceased was heard to enter the house and go into the north room, by Cora Carrow and a young man by the name of Ames, who was in the kitchen visiting the said Cora, and with whom she was talking. Upon hearing the movements of deceased, Ames and Miss Carrow left the kitchen and passed through the house to the front porch, where they intercepted deceased. At this time deceased had the 32-caliber pistol in his hand and was heard to make threats against defendant Larkin, to the effect that he intended "to get the son of a bitch." Both Miss Carrow and Ames remonstrated with deceased, and endeavored to prevent him from going to the point where defendants then were; but they were unable to prevail on him to return. Shortly after deceased left his home seven pistol shots were heard by Miss Carrow and witness Ames coming from the direction toward which the deceased had gone. Thereupon Miss Carrow and Ames got a lantern and went to a point outside of the premises of deceased, and as stated, 91 yards distant therefrom, and found deceased dead from a gunshot wound. Defendant Ida Belle Harris, when Miss Carrow and Ames came to the scene of the killing, was holding the head of her husband in her lap, and was crying or screaming. Miss Carrow said to defendant Mrs. Harris, "See what you have caused?" and Mrs. Harris replied, "Yes; Henry is killed; and I am the whole cause of it." Defendant Larkin was standing by, and witness Ames said to him: "That looks pretty bad." Larkin replied, "I had to do it, for he was shooting at me;" or, as the witness Miss Carrow puts it, Larkin said: "Yes, I shot him; but I couldn't help it; he was shooting at me." The uncontradicted testimony is that as stated, seven shots in all were fired; the two first shots were not so loud as the third shot; the third shot being followed by another shot, apparently of lesser volume, after which there were three loud reports in quick succession.

It is not contended by the state that defendant Mrs. Harris had any physical part in the killing of deceased. Defendant Larkin admits the killing, and urges self-defense. He says: "I seen it was either him or me, and I shot to hit." The only evidence which tends to show the guilt of Mrs.

adultery with the wife, provided the killing take place before the parties to the act of adultery have separated.' In other words, the controlling idea intended to be conveyed by the court, according to our construction of the language used, seems to have been that, because the law would justify the husband in taking the life of the adulterer under the circumstances named in the statute, it would follow that the adulterer must submit to the infliction of death thus attempted to be executed upon him, and that he was not even authorized to resist an attack upon his life by the injured husband, much less plead such deadly attack by way of justification or self-defense if, in resisting such attack, he was compelled to take the life of the injured husband to save his own. "Thus it appears that the court has attempted to make the legal status of the defendant depend upon what might or would have been the law with reference to the act of deceased, had the situation of the parties been reversed and the latter had taken the life of the former. In no possible state or case would such a rule of deduction be a fair or conclusive criterion in the administration of criminal law. The accused is always guilty or innocent from his own standpoint; that is, his personal, individual acts with relation to the matter charged. . . . "But the right of self-defense, though inalienable, is and should to some extent be subordinated to rules of law, regulating its proper exercise, and so the law has wisely provided. It may be divided into two general classes, to wit, perfect and imperfect right of self-defense. A perfect right of self-defense can only obtain and avail where the party pleading it acted from necessity, and was wholly free from wrong or blame in occasioning or producing the necessity which required his action. If, however, he was in the wrong,—if he was himself violating or in the act of violating the law,—and on account of his own wrong was placed in a situation wherein it became necessary for him to defend himself against an attack made upon himself which was superinduced or created by his own wrong, then the law justly limits his right of self-defense, and regulates it according to the magnitude of his own wrong. Such a state of case may be said to illustrate and determine what in law would be denominated the imperfect right of self-defense. Whenever a party by his own wrongful act produces a condition of things wherein it becomes necessary for his own safety that he should take life or do serious bodily harm, then indeed the law wisely imputes to him his own wrong and its consequences to the extent that they may and should be considered in determining the grade of offense which but for such acts would never have been occasioned. . . . How far and to what extent he will be excused or excusable in law must depend upon the nature and character of the act he was committing, and which produced the necessity that he should defend himself. When his own original act was in violation of law, then the law takes that fact into consideration in limiting his right of defense and resistance whilst in the perpetration of such unlawful act. If he was engaged in the commission of a felony, and, to prevent its

Harris is found in the testimony of the witness Miss Carrow, who says that Mrs. Harris talked to her on three or four occasions about deceased, saying that she (Mrs. Harris) "wished she was free; that she didn't see no more peace of her life; that she had had no satisfaction and she would rather if he (deceased) was clear out of the way," and that "if he was to get killed in the mine or hurt in any way Roy Larkin would take care of her;" and upon another occasion when Miss Carrow remonstrated with defendant Mrs. Harris as to her relations with defendant Larkin, and said to her, "If I was you I would be afraid to talk to him like you do, I would be afraid Mr. Harris would turn back some time and catch him," that Mrs. Harris said "she would talk to him (Larkin) until the world looked level."

Defendant Mrs. Harris did not take the stand. All of the evidence offered on behalf of defendants came from the testimony of defendant Larkin, who said in substance that on the night of the killing he left the saloon of one Romine, where he was employed as a bartender, and went to a point near the place of the killing, where he met Mrs. Harris. Near the scene of the homicide there seems to have been a widely spreading red haw tree, called by the witnesses a "thorn tree." As to what transpired between the defendants after they met at the haw tree, or as to how long they remained there before deceased came, the record is silent. Defendant Larkin stated in his testimony that the first information he had of deceased's presence came from hearing footsteps as of some one running tolerably fast; that deceased came up and said to him, "Larkin, you son of a bitch, I am going to kill you." That thereupon deceased fired at him twice; that he then ran and while running discharged his pistol once, firing off to one side, but without aiming at deceased; that he, Larkin, got behind a little thorn bush, and that while there deceased shot at him again, and that thereupon he began shooting at deceased. Near the thorn tree in question, and some 20 yards from the point where deceased was killed, four beer bottles were found the next morning, one of which was empty and the other three full.

commission, the party seeing it or about to be injured thereby makes a violent assault upon him, calculated to produce death or serious bodily harm, and in resisting such attack he slay his assailant, the law would impute the original wrong to the homicide, and make it murder. But if the original wrong was or would have been a misdemeanor, then the homicide growing out of or occasioned by it, though in self-defense from an assault made upon him, would be manslaughter under the law. . . . "If defendant was taken by deceased in the act of adultery with his wife, and to avenge the wrong deceased made a dangerous or murderous assault upon him, in resisting which he took the life of deceased, under such state of facts defendant would be guilty of manslaughter, because he was committing a misdemeanor which was the cause of and brought about the necessity for the homicide." And in Varnell v. State, 26 Tex. App. 56, 9 S. W. 65, the rule that where no felony but a misdemeanor only is intended, one will be permitted to urge his extremity in order to reduce a killing to manslaughter, and that where not even a misdemeanor is intended the perfect right of self-defense arises, was adhered to, it being held that, since the copulation of the defendant and the deceased's daughter, although morally wrong, constituted no offense against the laws of the state, the defendant's right of self-defense against an attack by the father was perfect; the assault being not to prevent, but to revenge, what had shortly before occurred. And in Franklin v. State, 30 Tex. App. 638, 18 S. W. 468, the rule of per- 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fect and imperfect self-defense was again adhered to, it being held that conduct of the defendant, such as being found in the deceased's home at 2 A. M. under circumstances indicating that the purpose was carnal knowledge of the deceased's wife, was such as was calculated to provoke an attack from the husband, and that therefore the right of self-defense was imperfect, and a killing in resisting an attack so provoked, manslaughter. So, in Nicks v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 241, 79 S. W. 35, where, from one view of the evidence it appeared that the defendant went to deceased's house for the purpose of having carnal intercourse with the latter's wife, which provoked an assault upon him by the deceased, it was held that the issue of imperfect self-defense was raised, and that it was the duty of the court to charge on manslaughter. But in Pannell v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 498, 113 S. W. 536, where it appeared that defendant's carnal intercourse with deceased's wife was prior to the time of the homicide, and that the defendant had tried to evade difficulty with the deceased, it was held that the defendant's right to self-defense under such circumstances were perfect. For another case in which the court referred to the obvious evading of a probable difficulty as affecting his right of self-defense, see STATE v. LARKIN.

The general question of homicide in defense of family and relations is treated in the notes to Bailey v. People, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 145, and Morrison v. Com. 67 L.R.A. 529.

G. J. C.

the inference that he met Mrs. Harris at the thorn tree in question; while the testimony of Miss Carrow for the state leads to the inference that he left the house with Mrs. Harris, and presumably went with her to the thorn tree. This is the only contradiction presented by the record, and arises, it may be, from a failure of Larkin to state as to whether he had been at the house of deceased on the night of the homicide, but prior thereto.

The pistol with which Larkin was armed, and with which he killed deceased, is shown by the evidence to have been a 38-caliber pistol, while the one with which deceased left his home is shown to have been a 32-caliber pistol. That the two first reports were less loud than the third is uncontradicted; but there is no evidence in the record as to the relative loudness of the reports of pistols of different calibers. Many matters which from this distance it would seem might have been shown with clearness appear darkly and vaguely, and rest largely upon inferences.

Upon the trial the court gave, among others, instruction numbered 6, which is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if you find and believe from the evidence that defendant Roy Larkin provoked or voluntarily sought, brought on, or engaged in the quarrel or difficulty with the deceased with the purpose of taking advantage of him and of taking his life, or of doing him some great bodily harm, then and in that event there is no self-defense in the case, however imminent the peril of the defendant may have become in consequence of an attack made upon him by the deceased." At the close of the state's testimony defendant Ida Belle Harris offered an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence as to her, which instruction was by the court refused. Again, at the close of all of the testimony, Mrs. Harris prayed an instruction that the jury be directed to find her not guilty, which instruction was also by the court refused.

During the argument of the case the prosecuting attorney used this language: "Roy Larkin got on the stand, and didn't say one word about what Mrs. Harris said that he said about taking care of her in case Henry Harris was killed." Thereupon defendant objected that the above statement of the prosecuting attorney was a comment on what the defendant did not testify to in this case. To this objection the court said: "Try to confine your argument within the record; proceed." Defendant duly saved his exceptions to the above remarks and to the ruling of the court thereon, and thereupon the prosecuting attorney continued as follows: "He took the stand, and testified in his own behalf after having heard that statement fall from the lips of this witness, and he absolutely failed to say that he didn't make that statement to Mrs. Harris." Defendant Larkin, by his counsel, again objected, and asked the court to rebuke the prosecuting attorney. The court said: "The court has said to stay within the record and that should not be commented on." Whereupon defendant's counsel said: "I say, your honor, that it is the court's duty to reprimand counsel for making such remarks, and it is the court's duty to keep him within the record; and I except to the ruling of the court."

During the argument of the case the prosecuting attorney used this language: "Where is the little girl? The testimony all shows that she was there, and did they put her on the stand?" Counsel for defendant: "I object and except to that remark, and ask that it be excluded, and that the court instruct the jury to disregard it. The Court: Let it be excluded, and the jury will not consider it." The little girl referred to in the above excerpt was the thirteen-year-old daughter of deceased, Henry Harris, and the defendant Ida Belle Harris. Her whereabouts at the moment of the killing rests almost wholly in inference. From the context it would appear that she had gone to bed some considerable time before defendant Larkin came to the home of deceased, and that perhaps the coming of her father into the room subsequently and his obtaining the pistol and leaving the house awakened her, and that she arose, dressed herself, and followed after him, perhaps immediately preceding Miss Carrow and the witness Ames, to the scene of the killing. It would thus appear from the fact that she had been in bed, and that she is next definitely accounted for when she is heard calling to Miss Carrow from a point in the direction of the place of the killing, and asking that a lantern be brought, and from the fact that when seen at the place of the killing she was dressed.

The above statement is substantially what was shown upon the trial; and, as heretofore stated, there is no contradiction between the facts shown by the defendants and the facts shown upon the part of the state, except that noted above, and which inferentially arises from the statement of Miss Carrow that defendant Larkin was in the kitchen of deceased's home on the night of the killing some hour or more prior thereto, and the statement of the defendant that he met Mrs. Harris at the thorn tree on the night in question. This contradiction may be more apparent than real, and may arise, it would seem, from the failure or neglect of defendant Larkin to state all the facts. If further facts shall become necessary to make clear what is said touching the case, they will be adverted to in their proper order.

Messrs. T. M. Jackson, J. H. Malugen, and Benjamin H. Marbury, for appellants:

The mere presence of a person while the alleged crime was being committed by another, will not, in the absence of some word or act of approval or encouragement, make her guilty of that crime.

State v. Valle, 184 Mo. 551, 65 S. W. 232; State v. Orrick, 106 Mo. 120, 17 S. W. 178, 329.

The trial court should have directed a verdict of not guilty.

One accused of a crime should not be convicted on a mere suspicion of guilt.

State v. Lentz, 184 Mo. 243, 83 S. W. 970.

The right of the prosecuting attorney to comment upon the testimony of the defendant, who has offered himself in his own behalf, extends no further than his right to cross-examine him in regard to matters testified to by him in his direct examination.

Messrs. John T. Barker, Attorney General, and William M. Fitch, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Faris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Among the contentions made by the defendant, and not adverted to in the above statement, is that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction which defendant asked, on the presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt. No error is to be predicated upon this alleged point, for the reason that the court had already fully and correctly instructed on this phase of the case, and the instruction asked by defendants in that behalf was properly refused.

2. It is contended on behalf of defendant Ida Belle Harris that one of the two requested instructions in the nature of demurrers to the evidence should have been given by the court. Since both of these alleged errors go to the question of whether there was sufficient proof upon which to sustain the conviction of Mrs. Harris, the two points may be considered together. It will be noted that there is no contention made by the state, nor is there one word of proof to sustain such a contention had it been made, that Mrs. Harris actually participated in any physical manner whatever in the shooting and killing of her husband. That she was present at an agreed rendezvous with her paramour, Larkin, when deceased appeared and interrupted the meeting between her and her codefendant, Larkin, there is no doubt, but we need not cite authorities that mere presence at the scene of a killing, without more does not constitute that aiding, abetting, assisting, encouraging, or advising such killing required by the law to constitute guilt. The attitude in which she was found when first seen after the killing, and her language and apparent remorse, inferentially negative any active participation by her. All that is shown connecting her in any wise, with the most reprehensible condition of affairs shown by this record, are the statements shown in evidence by the testimony of Miss Carrow as coming from her, and which are set out in the above recital of facts. In the cross-examination of Miss Carrow, however, which we have not set out, the latter specifically says that Mrs. Harris made no threats that she was going to kill her husband or to procure his killing by anybody else, or that she had any plans for having him killed. That her conduct was most reprehensible goes without saying, that she was guilty of adultery is by fair inference to be deduced from the record; but there is a distinction between reprehensible and even adulterous conduct, and murder in the second degree, of which she was convicted. We are not called upon to characterize her conduct; but upon the record we are clear that her conviction was not warranted from the testimony, and that the court erred in refusing to so instruct the jury. What is said above renders it unnecessary to deal with the further objection of defendants that the court erred in instructing the jury as to the law touching accessories before the fact.

3. Defendants strenuously urge that the court erred in permitting the prosecuting attorney to comment upon the failure of defendant Roy Larkin, who took the stand as a witness in his own behalf, to deny certain statements which the prosecuting attorney averred had been made by him to Mrs. Harris. Leaving for a moment the broad and ever-recurring question of the right of prosecuting attorneys to comment upon the failure of a defendant who takes the stand, to testify to facts within his knowledge, or to facts and statements attributed to him, we might say in passing that upon the record and outside of this question there is no warrant in the testimony for the statement of the prosecuting attorney. The record nowhere says that defendant Larkin had ever said to Mrs. Harris that he would take care of her if Henry Harris were dead. All the record does show on this point comes from the witness Miss Carrow, who says in substance that Mrs. Harris told her that if Harris were dead Larkin would take care of her (Mrs. Harris). In our view the chief vice in the utterance of the prosecuting attorney in this behalf arose from the fact that he was not correctly quoting what the record showed. The mere fact that Mrs. Harris had made the statement to Miss Carrow to the effect that her codefendant Larkin would take care of her in the event of her husband's death does not show or indicate necessarily that such statement was predicated upon a promise of defendant Larkin so to do. The statement may have been made on the part of Mrs. Harris as an inference from his attentions to her, or as a mere boast of conditions which would necessarily arise from her conquest. At least Mrs. Harris did not say that she made the statement as the result of any suggestion to that effect from Larkin, or by reason of any promise on Larkin's part so to do. This objection is an eternally recurring one, and is present in practically half of the appeals in criminal cases with which we are required to deal. It has been said in a late case (State v. Ferrell, 233 Mo. 452, 136 S. W. 709) that the inhibition of comment upon counsel for the state as to the failure of a defendant when a witness upon the stand to testify upon any fact in issue, or to deny any fact testified to by another witness, has been the settled law of this state since the decision in the case of State v. Graves, 95 Mo. 510, 8 S. W. 739. The learned judge who wrote the opinion in the case of State v. Ferrell, supra, from which we quote above in substance, says, however, that the statute upon which this ruling is based does not in express terms deny the right of the state so to comment. That this is the correct view there can be no doubt, when we consider the history of the law and the language used by the statutes, which the learned judge in question had in mind. Prior to the year 1877 the common law prevailed in this state as to the evidence of a defendant on trial upon a criminal charge. Such defendant was incompetent to testify in his own behalf. So the common law stood until the year 1877 (Laws 1877, p. 356), when a statute was passed changing the common-law rule and granting defendant the right or privilege of being sworn as a witness in his own behalf. When first written and passed, this statute contained two pertinent sections, which read as follows:

"Section 1. No person shall be rendered incompetent to testify in criminal causes by reason of being the person on trial or examination; but any such fact may be shown for the purpose of affecting his or her credibility: Provided, that no person on trial or examination shall be required to testify, except as a witness on behalf of the person on trial or examination: And, provided further, that the neglect or refusal of the person on trial or examination to testify in the cause shall not raise any presumption of guilt, nor shall that circumstance be referred to by any attorney prosecuting in the cause, nor shall the same be considered by the court or jury before whom the trial takes place.

"Sec. 2. If the accused shall not avail himself of his right to testify in any case, it shall not be construed to affect his innocence or guilt."

In 1879 this law was amended into its present form, and was made to read as it now stands, as follows:

"Sec. 5242. No person shall be incompetent to testify as a witness in any criminal cause or prosecution by reason of being the person on trial or examination, or by reason of being the husband or wife of the accused, but any such facts may be shown for the purpose of affecting the credibility of such witness: Provided, that no person on trial or examination, nor wife or husband of such person, shall be required to testify, but any such person may, at the option of the defendant, testify in his own behalf, or on behalf of a codefendant, and shall be liable to cross-examination, as to any matter referred to in his examination in chief, and may be contradicted and impeached as any other witness in the case: Provided, that in no case shall husband or wife, when testifying under the provisions of this section for a defendant, be permitted to disclose confidential communications had or made between them in relation to such husband and wife.

"Sec. 5243. If the accused shall not avail himself or herself of his or her right to testify, or the testimony of the wife or husband, on the trial in the case, it shall not be construed to affect the innocence or guilt of the accused, nor shall the same raise any presumption of guilt, nor be referred to by any attorney in the case, nor be considered by the court or jury before whom the trial takes place."

Every state in the American Union, except the state of Georgia, has either prior to or subsequent to the enactment of our statute in 1877 passed similar statutes conferring competency upon the accused as a witness for himself in a trial upon a criminal charge. In passing we may say that in Georgia the accused is permitted without being sworn to make a statement to the jury; and in Washington he may be either sworn as a witness in his own behalf, or he may make a statement without being sworn, at his election. In more than half of the states the common-law bar is raised, and the accused is made competent to testify by statutes in substance providing that "he may, at his own request, and not otherwise, testify for himself in any criminal trial or proceeding, but his failure or neglect or refusal so to testify shall create no presumption against him, nor shall the same be referred to by the prosecuting attorney in his argument of the case." In Iowa, by statute, any reference in argument to the failure of a defendant to take the stand as a witness in his own behalf by the prosecuting attorney is made a misdemeanor. We have carefully examined the statutes and holdings, upon this question, of more than thirty states, and we find that it has been held universally that, if the defendant is not sworn as a witness in his own behalf, any comment by the prosecuting attorney on his failure so to testify constitutes reversible error, in the absence of a peremptory and proper rebuke by the trial court. But, on the other hand, except in our own state and in California, where the question has been sometimes doubted, the right of the prosecuting attorney to comment upon the failure of the defendant, when he takes the stand as a witness in his own behalf, to deny or explain incriminating facts and statements, has been uniformly held allowable. Solander v. People, 2 Colo. 56; State v. Tatman, 59 Iowa, 471, 13 N. W. 632; Stover v. People, 56 N. Y. 315; Heldt v. State, 20 Neb. 492, 57 Am. Rep. 835, 30 N. W. 626; Comstock v. State, 14 Neb. 205, 15 N. W. 355; State v. Staley, 14 Minn. 118, Gil. 75; Cotton v. State, 87 Ala. 103, 6 So. 372; Clarke v. State, 87 Ala. 71, 6 So. 368; Lee v. State, 56 Ark. 4, 19 S. W. 16; McCoy v. State, 46 Ark. 141; Brashears v. State, 58 Md. 567; McFadden v. State, 28 Tex. App. 241, 14 S. W. 128; Lienburger v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 21 S. W. 603; Parker v. State, 62 N. J. L. 801, 45 Atl. 1002; State v. Harrington, 12 Nev. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

125; State v. Ulsemer, 24 Wash. 659, 64 Pac. 800; Hanoff v. State, 37 Ohio St. 178, 41 Am. Rep. 496; State v. Ober, 52 N. H. 459, 13 Am. Rep. 88; State v. Glave, 51 Kan. 330, 33 Pac. 8; Toops v. State, 92 Ind. 13; Com. v. McConnell, 162 Mass. 499, 39 N. E. 107. The rule that no reference shall be made to the neglect, failure, or even refusal of a defendant to avail himself of his right to testify shall not be commented on in the event he does not become a witness in his own behalf is therefore, we find, universal; but, on the contrary, the rule that if he does go upon the witness stand he then stands in the precise attitude of any other witness is, except in this state, and, as stated in California, where the rule is subject to some doubt, also universal. Mr. Wharton in his learned and able work on Criminal Evidence lays down in the tenth edition thereof the rule that such comment is allowable; to this statement of the text he cites no exceptions, and correctly quotes the Missouri courts as entertaining like views. Wharton, Crim. Ev. 10th ed. § 435a. This assumption of Mr. Wharton is based upon the holding of this court in State v. Testerman, 68 Mo. 414; State v. Anderson, 89 Mo. 330, 1 S. W. 135. Mr. Underhill also like (Underhill, Crim. Ev. 68); also, so says Mr. Best (Best, Ev. 283). Between the taking effect of the above-quoted act of 1877 and the amendments thereof in 1879, no doubt was entertained by this court as to the right of comment upon what a defendant testifying for himself either said, or failed or neglected to say. But subsequent to the amendment quoted this court, Judges Sherwood and Brace for years dissenting, began to hold that comment by the prosecuting attorney upon the failure or neglect of a defendant, even when he testified for himself upon the stand, to deny or to explain any fact in the case testified to by any other witness, was reversible error. The only thing in our statute urged as limiting the right of comment was said to be the following, to wit: "And shall be liable to cross-examination as to any matter referred to in his examination in chief." Yet our statute now under discussion, remarkable to say, contains other language qualifying the above proviso, which language is not found in any other of the statutes of the states of the Union examined by the writer. This language is the following, to wit: "And may be contradicted and impeached as any other witness in the case."

Thus, we note our legislature by these two statutory clauses, which are utterly contradictory in practice, has gone farther in favor of the restricted judicial construction, as well as farther against it, than has the legislature of any other state in the Union. This contradiction in practice arises from the now well-settled rule that in cross-examination the defendant may be asked if he has ever been convicted of a felony or other crime. State v. Spivey, 191 Mo. 87, 90 S. W. 81; State v. Blitz, 171 Mo. 530, 71 S. W. 1027; State v. Thornhill, 174 Mo. 364, 74 S. W. 832. This, of course, upon the theory of impeaching his credibility as a witness; an impeachment effected indubitably by a plain violation of the clause of the statute limiting defendant's cross-examination. We are not criticizing the rule or learning in the cases cited; we are merely suggesting the palpable contradiction, arguendo, as a reason why, if we are to be logical, we should be uniformly logical. For many years, and in practically every jurisdiction in the American Union, it has been vehemently urged in perhaps more than a hundred cases that the right of the state to cross-examine a defendant who at his own request, and not otherwise, takes the stand as a witness in his own behalf, is limited by the constitutional inhibition against self-incrimination. But, without citing cases, it may be said that this question is now well settled against the contention urged. The contention that, absent a statute such as we have, cross-examination is limited by the constitutional rule against self-incrimination, has been exploded utterly on the ground that there is sufficient protection against self-incrimination, when it is provided that a defendant may or may not testify for himself, according as he may desire. If he desires to save himself from cross-examination, he may do so by refusal, failure, or neglect to become a witness for himself. This provision has been held to be an absolute protection so far as the constitutional right is concerned. The defendant waives the right of protection against self-incrimination by electing to become a witness for himself; so becoming a witness he may be cross-examined by the state, in the absence of a statute, to any extent, whether his answers may tend to convict him or not. When our statute conferring competency upon a defendant to testify for himself was first enacted, it did not contain, it will be noted, any provisions limiting the state in its right to cross-examine him. When this statute was enacted, the constitutional question of self-incrimination arising from an unlimited privilege of cross-examination had not been settled by adjudication. Evidently the law-makers when they placed this clause in our present statute were laboring under the fear that the absence of such a provision would invade the defendant's constitutional rights. By the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

terms of the clause of our statute forbidding cross-examination, the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination is expressly provided, without the necessity for a reference of the point to a judicial construction now well and abundantly settled.

Section 5243, supra, of our statute, as do the statutes of a great majority of the other states in the Union, in substance, provides that "if the accused shall not avail himself . . . of his . . . right to testify . . . on the trial of the case, it shall not be construed to affect the innocence or guilt of the accused, nor . . . raise any presumption of guilt, nor be referred to by any attorney in the case." Nothing is clearer, when we consider the history of this legislation, when we consider that at common law the defendant could not testify in his own behalf, and that the two sections of our statute were intended to modify the common law, and when we consider the rule that this modification of the common law ought to go no further in its construction than its terms expressly provided, than that there is no legal or statutory prohibition against comment by the prosecuting attorney in any case, if in fact the accused does avail himself of his right to testify. In logic and reason it is no argument against this view that the state, by an express statutory provision, is precluded from cross-examination of the defendant upon any matter other than that about which he shall himself testify in his examination in chief. The right of the defendant to testify when he takes the stand as to all and singular the pertinent facts and issues is absolutely unlimited. If a witness in a case shall have testified to statements made by a defendant, or shall have testified to incriminating facts and circumstances, it is absolutely in the power of the defendant to contradict, or explain, or put his own construction on such facts and statements and circumstances. As a witness upon the stand, defendant has the power to touch upon any phase or feature of the case, and it is no valid argument to say that this provision put into the statute, as would appear, on account of the fear of the lawmakers that absent such a provision the cross-examination of the defendant might trench upon his constitutional rights against self-incrimination, in any way affects this condition. Other states, as we have seen, without having in their statutes the provision that a defendant testifying for himself "may be contradicted and impeached as any other witness in the case," have, yet with practical unanimity, held that, if a defendant avails himself of his right to testify, he then stands as any other witness, and his silence in explaining and his failure to deny or contradict incriminating facts, statements, or circumstances may be fully commented on by the prosecuting attorney. It is our duty to construe our own statutes as we find them in the light of their language, intent, and logic. There is no valid reason for the construction which has long been put by this court upon this provision of our statute. It is in absolute conflict with the rule announced by the text-writers, and diametrically in conflict with the holdings of at least forty-six states in this Union on this identical question. In Iowa, as has been noted, there is a statute making the prosecuting attorney guilty of a misdemeanor if he refers to the failure of the defendant to take the stand and testify in his own behalf, but if the defendant does take the stand, and does make himself a witness for himself, the right of comment upon the defendant's failure to deny, or contradict incriminating facts, statements, or circumstances is left absolutely open to the state. State v. Tatman, 59 Iowa, 471, 13 N. W. 632. Time and again, ever since the rule announced in State v. Graves, 95 Mo. 510, 8 S. W. 739, which is now criticized, was first enunciated, this question has been up for ruling. It needlessly, and in the writer's view erroneously, reverses more cases than any other single point which we are called on to review. It is no new doctrine that is here announced (State v. Anderson, 89 Mo. 330, 1 S. W. 135) and even subsequent to the holding in State v. Graves, supra, it was said by Judge Sherwood in State v. Musick, 101 Mo. loc. cit. 271, 14 S. W. 214, that "these statements made by the state's witnesses were not denied by defendant, and therefore stand admitted, as much so as if the defendant had admitted them in terms. His previous preparations; his threats; his coming from behind the counter with weapon drawn and ready, as well as Burnett's vain efforts to interpose, all stand admitted." In that case and therefore in this utterance all of the judges of this court apparently agreed; for it was an opinion in banc, in which all concurred. Indeed, for eleven years after the statute in question was first passed by our legislature, the right of the state, through its prosecuting attorney, to comment, when the defendant took the stand as a witness for himself, upon his failure to deny or explain incriminating statements, facts, or circumstances was never denied. State v. Emory, 79 Mo. 463; State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 447; State v. Hopkirk, 84 Mo. 288; State v. Anderson, 89 Mo. 330, 1 S. W. 135. For years subsequent to the rendition of the opinion in State v. Graves, supra, where the contrary doctrine to the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

one discussed here was first enunciated in this court, the cognate rule above referred to of presumption arising as a matter of law from the failure of the defendant to deny incriminating facts or circumstances was fully recognized. State v. Musick, 101 Mo. 271, 14 S. W. 212; State v. Paxton, 126 Mo. 514, 29 S. W. 705; State v. Alexander, 119 Mo. 461, 24 S. W. 1060; State v. Patrick, 107 Mo. 174, 17 S. W. 666; State v. Taylor, 134 Mo. loc. cit. 127, 35 S. W. 92; State v. Good, 132 Mo. loc. cit. 125, 33 S. W. 790; State v. Jackson, 95 Mo. loc. cit. 657, 8 S. W. 749. It is difficult to see why, if such a presumption is as a matter of law entertained against a defendant when he takes the stand as a witness in his own behalf, such presumption might not be commented on by the prosecuting attorney in a case where the defendant likewise becomes a witness in his own behalf. We concede that, if there were any restrictions whatever placed upon the defendant as to the nature or extent of his testimony when he has elected to become a witness for himself, then there would be some reason in the rule. But there is no such restriction upon him. His right to explain, deny, and contradict is as unlimited as the rules of evidence, and as broad as the issues pertinent to the matter under inquiry. In order to reach this conclusion, we must perforce read into § 5243 words that have not been placed in that section by the legislature. We must make the first clause of that section read: "And if the accused shall not avail himself of his . . . right to testify, on any question, point, fact, or circumstance, then," etc. When we consider that the statute in question changes the common law, it is difficult to see our warrant for reading into this section words that the legislature has not in express language placed therein. We conclude that the case of State v. Graves, supra, which enunciated the rule that no comment shall be made by the prosecuting attorney or other counsel for the state on the failure of the defendant to testify about, or to deny or contradict, any statement, fact, or circumstance in the case, as well as other cases in this state which announce the same rule, following the case of State v. Graves, ought to be overruled and no longer followed in this behalf. We conclude, therefore, that the point made by defendant touching the comment of the prosecuting attorney, so far as the objection thereto was applicable to the facts, was allowable, and that the court committed no error in the premises.

4. The defendant Larkin, with whom the above views considered we are alone concerned, contends that under the facts in this case the giving of instruction No. 6 set out in the statement herein was error. This instruction was based upon the theory that defendant Larkin in some wise "provoked, or voluntarily sought, brought on, or engaged in the quarrel or difficulty with the deceased, with the purpose of taking advantage of him, and of taking his life, or of doing him some great bodily harm." Can it be said upon the facts in evidence upon this record that there was testimony upon which to bottom this instruction? That in a proper case a proper instruction as to voluntarily provoking or seeking a difficulty may be given, we have no doubt. This question is so well settled that we need cite no authorities in support thereof. But in order to make proper the giving of such an instruction as this, which, if the facts support it, practically takes away from the defendant the right of self-defense, depends on the facts and circumstances of the case; and the pertinent inquiry here is whether there was in the record sufficient facts to show that defendant Larkin did voluntarily engage in the difficulty which resulted in the death of deceased. The testimony for the state shows that Larkin on the night in question had been at the home of deceased for no good purpose. The whole trend of the testimony indicates that he sustained, and had been for some weeks sustaining, illicit intercourse with the wife of deceased, Larkin's codefendant here. The testimony indicates that as a rule this illicit intercourse was not had in the home of the deceased, but that the defendants adjourned to some suitable spot in the vicinity. Such an adjournment was apparently had on this occasion; for we note that after some conversation in the kitchen both of the defendants left the house of deceased. Whether they left together or not is not clear from the record. From this lack of clearness arises, it would seem, the apparent contradiction between the testimony of defendant Larkin and the testimony of Miss Carrow. Whether they went together to the fatal thorn tree or not, or whether Mrs. Harris went by herself to the thorn tree after she and Larkin left, and later was joined there by Larkin, makes no difference. They had both left the house of deceased. The facts show that they were seeking the darkness, and not light; that they were evading a probable difficulty, and not seeking to bring it on. The fact that Larkin and his codefendant had left the premises of deceased and gone out to uninclosed and unimproved property presumably, and so far as the record shows, belonging to others, shows that so far as the physical encounter was concerned defendant Larkin was avoiding the same, and not bringing it on or seeking to bring it on. Had he remained in the home of deceased, where he had no right to be, and where he unlawfully was, there might be some sort of a peg upon which to hang such a theory. But he left the home of deceased and went with or met (it matters not which) his codefendant and guilty paramour at a place distant therefrom and where he might well be supposed to have believed the deceased would not come, and of which he might well have believed the deceased would have no knowledge. The whole testimony shows that the deceased came back to his home, armed himself, and left his home armed and threatening; that he hunted up defendant, and whether deceased fired first or defendant fired first is, outside of whatever corroborating circumstances there may be in the loudness of the respective reports of the pistols, a matter resting on defendant's testimony alone. Since the defendant Larkin at the point where the difficulty occurred was not on the premises of deceased, but on the premises of others, distant from the home of deceased, wherein does this case differ from a case which would have been presented if deceased, hearing that defendant Larkin was in company with the wife of deceased upon a public street, or any other public place, or even private place, should have armed himself as he did, and go threatening defendant Larkin as he did, to seek him and kill him?

It is true that under the well-settled law in this state murder in the second degree is to be presumed from the simple fact of the wilful intentional killing of one man by another, nothing further appearing (State v. Lane, 64 Mo. 319; State v. Gassert, 65 Mo. 352; State v. Stoeckli, 71 Mo. 559; State v. Frazier, 137 Mo. 319, 38 S. W. 913; State v. Anderson, 98 Mo. 461, 11 S. W. 981; State v. Harris, 76 Mo. 361), yet such presumption, while it attaches to the acts of the defendant here, does not prohibit him from showing, if he may, and can, that in such killing he acted in self-defense. It is not the duty of this court to enforce what is very commonly called the "unwritten law." The legislature of this state has not seen fit to enact into a statute this "unwritten law." It is our duty to enforce the law as we find it, and as written by the legislature, and not as we might otherwise write it, or as we might desire it to be. If the uncontradicted facts, as shown by the state in this case, are true, the inferences arising therefrom corroborate the statement of defendant Larkin. The written law is, and the law which we must enforce says, that even if the deceased had discovered his wife and her codefendant

Larkin in flagrante delicto, and, being overcome by his passion, had shot and killed defendant Larkin, that yet under the strict letter of the law he would not go acquit. He would have been guilty even then, however human his passion and failing in that behalf would have been, and however much it might be said that the sympathies of a man for men might go out to him; he would yet have been guilty of manslaughter in the second degree. State v. Holme, 54 Mo. 153. The theory of the state in this case that no right of self-defense existed under the facts here in favor of defendant Larkin is not tenable. Such a theory would be tenable only if the law were that if deceased had killed Larkin, instead of Larkin having killed deceased, that deceased would be guilty of no crime, or at least of no felony. But since, as we have seen, even had the facts been thus reversed, instead of as they are, deceased would not have been guiltless, but, on the contrary, would have been guilty of manslaughter in the second degree, so, the right of self-defense still inured to Larkin, however outrageous and morally reprehensible and indefensible his conduct and actions might have been, and in fact were. The court properly instructed, therefore, under the facts and circumstances shown in evidence, that Larkin was entitled to his right of self-defense, and so instructing the court ought not, under the facts shown by the record, to have given instruction No. 6, and thus have limited defendant's right in this behalf. In our view, under all of the facts and circumstances in this case, the giving of instruction No. 6 constitutes such error as must result in the reversal of this case.

As this case is to be retried, we might say that there is no merit in the objection of defendant to the introduction of the beer bottles, about which defendants so bitterly complain. Nor is there any objection to the comment of the prosecuting attorney as to the failure of the daughter of defendant Ida Belle Harris to testify in this case, although it is a matter of inference clearly arising from the fact that she was perhaps not in a position to see what occurred at the immediate place of the homicide. Underhill, Crim. Ev. 68. In passing, it may be said, since this case is to be retried, that many points rest in dark and obscure inference only. If it be a fact, as urged in argument of learned counsel for defendant, that there is a difference in the loudness of reports of pistols of different calibers, this point might be elucidated rather than left in vague inference, as it now appears of record; and if it be the office of courts, as we assume it is, to search out and find the truth, some definite and certain evidence might be shown upon the retrial as to the condition of the pistol of deceased; whether it was loaded or unloaded; whether, if it be a fact, that it had been recently fired or not, and the place of finding such pistol. Such showing would tend materially to elucidate the relative positions of the state and the defendant, and to show, it may be, more unmistakably, his guilt or innocence.

Upon the submission of this case, suggestion ore tenus of the death of defendant Ida Belle Harris pending her appeal was made, but, the state not confessing the fact, the point was laid aside for proof, which, being subsequently furnished, shows the fact of her death, and as to her therefore the cause abates.

It results from what has been said that this case ought to be reversed and remanded for a new trial as to defendant Roy Larkin. Let it be so ordered.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

CATHERINE E. DUFFY, Appt.,

v.

BANKERS' LIFE ASSOCIATION OF DES MOINES.

(— Iowa, —, 139 N. W. 1087.)

Insurance — failure to forward application — negligence.

1. An insurance company is chargeable with the negligence of his agent in failing for an unreasonable time to forward an application and medical report for acceptance or rejection.

Trial — jury — delay in passing on application for insurance.

2. The jury must determine whether or not a delay of a month by an insurance company in passing upon an application for insurance, when it passes upon other applications from the same locality in nineteen days, is unreasonable.

Insurance — negligence of applicant — effect.

3. One who has applied for insurance and passed a satisfactory examination, upon the assurance that the insurance will be in force from the time of the medical examination, is not per se in fault in failing to make inquiry in case the policy is not promptly issued.

Note. — As to liability of insurance company for negligent delay in passing upon or issuing policy until after loss, see note to Boyer v. State Farmers' Mut. Hail Ins. Co. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 164.

Evidence — sufficiency — issuance of insurance policy.

4. That an application for insurance, if passed on, would have been accepted, may be found from evidence that the applicant was young, his character good, his occupation not hazardous, and that he had passed a satisfactory examination and been recommended by the examining physician.

Insurance — failure to act upon application — liability.

5. An insurance company which is acting under a state franchise is liable in damages for losses caused by its failure promptly to act upon an application for life insurance received upon its own solicitation, and accompanied by the requisite premium.

Parties — neglect to act upon application for insurance — right to sue.

6. The administrator, and not the beneficiary named in the application, has the right of action for neglect of an insurance company to act upon an application for life insurance within a reasonable time, so that the opportunity to obtain insurance is cut off by the death of the applicant.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Poweshiek County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for neglect to act upon an application for life insurance. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bray & Shifflett and O. M. Brockett, for appellant:

The solicitation and receipt of the application and membership fee, and issuance of the receipt therefor, created a binding obligation upon the part of the insurance company to act honestly and promptly in the due course of its business upon said application; the breach of such obligation or duty was an actionable wrong, and resulted in a cause of action arising therefrom for the resulting damages.

W. 1026.

Such obligation or duty having been created by the transaction between the applicant and the company for a consideration, and for the benefit of the plaintiff as the proposed beneficiary, the cause of action arising from its breach inures to her, and she is the owner and holder thereof.

Mr. I. M. Earle, for appellee:

Where it is expressly agreed in the application that there shall be no contract of insurance until the delivery of the policy, mere delay cannot become actionable, because applicant knows there will be no contract until he gets his policy. If the delay seems unusual, he can make inquiry; if unreasonable, he can revoke his application.

There can be no recovery for the loss against an insurance company, unless, either,

1st. There was a contract of insurance, or

2d. The applicant had the right to suppose there was such contract.

It cannot rest on "negligent failure to contract."

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the widow of Joseph M. Duffy, who departed this life July 9, 1911. He had applied to the defendant association on June 8th preceding for a certificate of membership therein, stipulating the payment of an indemnity of $2,000 upon his death; but the association had failed to accept or reject the application, and, in this action, recovery of that amount as damages is sought by plaintiff, who was named as proposed beneficiary in the application, on the ground "that defendant negligently failed to take any action upon said application before the death of said Joseph M. Duffy, and negligently failed to either to issue to him a certificate of insurance as provided for therein, or to reject said application and give him notice thereof in sufficient time to enable him to procure other insurance," and, in consequence of such negligence, she was deprived of the benefit of the insurance. The widow, as a duly appointed and qualified administratrix, filed a petition of intervention, wherein she prayed judgment for damages to the estate of deceased, on the grounds: "That defendant's said agent carelessly and negligently failed to send the application of said decedent to the home office of the defendant association after he had been examined by defendant's examining physician at Tama, Iowa; that, in consequence of such negligence on the part of said agent, no policy or certificate of life insurance was issued to said applicant by the defendant association; that, if said application had been forwarded by said agent to the home office of the defendant association as soon as said applicant was examined by defendant's examining physician at Tama, Iowa, the defendant association would have issued and delivered a policy or certificate of life insurance for $2,000 to said applicant before he died, and such insurance would have been in force at the time of his death." At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and this is the only ruling of which complaint is made.

The facts admitted or proven on the trial first should be stated. The defendant is a mutual assessment insurance association. T. P. Rogers, at the time in question, was its general agent, and had authority from the association to take the application and receive the notes hereinafter mentioned. Duffy's application for membership in the association closed in words following:

I agree to accept the certificate of membership issued hereon, and that the same shall not take effect until said certificate

(signed by the secretary or assistant secretary) is issued and received by me during my continuance in good health. This application and the certificate issued thereon, together with the articles of incorporation and by-laws (not reducing the insurance provided), which may be hereafter adopted, shall constitute the agreement or contract between me and the said association. I certify that I have carefully read the foregoing application. [Signature of the applicant in his own handwriting]

Joseph M. Duffy.

This was at the date mentioned, and at the same time the applicant executed to Rogers his promissory note for $17 as membership fee required to be paid when making such application, and delivered to Rogers a guaranty deposit note for $34 required by the articles of corporation and by-laws of defendant. For these Rogers gave Duffy a receipt in the words following:

The Bankers' Life Association of Des Moines, Iowa.

I have this day taken the application of Mr. J. M. Duffy, of Tama, Iowa, for $2,000 insurance in the Bankers' Life Association, upon which he has given his guaranty note for $34, and paid in cash January 9, 1912, $17, all of which is to be returned promptly if the application is declined. The first quarterly payment on the insurance applied for will be due January 31, 1912.

Dated at....., June 8, 1911.

On the back of this receipt, this appears: "Agents should not promise that certificate will be issued in less time than is reasonably assigned to do the work, as disappointment may result, especially as frequently occurs an extra amount of business comes in a bunch. The home office does all it can to expedite the issue, and the agent can add material help if he will see that all applications are properly completed and full information given. If delay is unusual, write for cause."

Rogers informed Duffy at the time that he could go to the office of Dr. Thompson within a day or two for examination, and the application would then be sent to the association, and explained to him that the notes would be returned if the applications were rejected. To his inquiry as to how soon the insurance would be in force, Rogers responded, "Upon the passage of the physical examination required by their physician." Rogers left the application with Dr. Thompson the same day, and two days later Duffy called and was examined by that physician, who informed the applicant that he had passed a satisfactory examination, and that he (the doctor) had recommended him for membership of the association.

As required by defendant's rules, the physician mailed to Dr. Will, medical director of defendant, on the same day, a slip of paper signed by him showing that he had made the medical examination of Duffy, and this reached defendant's office June 12, 1911. Rogers had been in the habit of calling at Thompson's office for the application with the examination, and the doctor left these on the desk for him, where it remained until he learned that Duffy had drowned, whereupon the physician mailed them to defendant. The medical examination disclosed that Duffy, who was thirty-two years of age, was in fine physical condition. He is conceded to have been a man of good habits, good financial ability, and of good moral character. He had done all that was required of him to obtain the insurance. The defendant was actively engaged through its agents in soliciting members of the association to whom certificates of insurance might be issued, and on an application of one Herman, procured by Rogers, June 5, 1911, defendant issued a certificate June 24th following. The defendant paid the $17 note out of its funds, and caused it to be canceled July 28, 1911, after the association had been advised of the claim now made against it in this action, and it tendered the surrender of the guaranteed deposit note.

It is to be observed that the petition does not proceed on the theory that, from the retention of the application and unreasonable time without acting thereon, acceptance of the application is to be presumed, nor on the theory that defendant is estopped from denying such acceptance because of having misled the applicant in some way. See Winchell v. Iowa State Ins. Co. 103 Iowa, 189, 72 N. W. 503. The action is not based on contract, either express or implied, but solely on tort; the theory of the plaintiff being that, having solicited and received the application for insurance, it owed the applicant the affirmative duty either of rejecting the application, or of accepting it within a reasonable time, and upon breach of such duty it is liable for all damages suffered in consequence of such breach. Let us first ascertain whether the evidence was sufficient to carry the issues involved in such a claim to the jury.

I. Might defendant have been found to have been negligent? The association was responsible for the conduct of Rogers when acting within the scope of his agency, and it is admitted that he allowed the application to lie on the physician's desk a month lacking a day, though it was his duty to forward it promptly to the association. But he was not alone at fault, for the association was aware as early as June 12, 1911, that the application had been taken, and yet did nothing in the matter during the twenty-seven days intervening prior to his death. In the case of another application taken at about the same time and in the same vicinity, there was a delay of but nineteen days in issuing the certificate. We think whether defendant in the exercise of ordinary diligence should have passed on the application prior to Duffy's death was fairly put in issue. The association was bound by the acts of its agents, and chargeable with any consequences that resulted from the failure of Rogers to promptly forward the application and physician's report. In other words, if the association was under a duty to promptly act on the application, and notify Duffy, as we think it was, it cannot shield itself from the responsibility by the fact that the application and medical report had not been received by it, and therefore it could not act. See Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Neafus, 145 Ky. 563, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1211, 140 S. W. 1026. The possession of these by its agent had the same effect as if they were in the possession of the association at its home office. Assuming then that the application and medical report had been promptly forwarded by the agent, and that the application was not accepted or rejected within the time intervening prior to his death, it seems manifest that whether this was an unreasonable delay was for the jury to determine, and we so hold.

II. But it is argued that it was as much the duty of the applicant to inquire, as it was that of the insurer to give the information, and this or similar expressions will be found in several decisions holding that mere silence on the part of the insurer is not as strong evidence of acceptance as of rejection. Whether this were so or not, as bearing on whether an acceptance should have been inferred, it cannot be said that the duties of the parties were reciprocal. The applicant had done all he could or was required to do in the matter. He had the right to assume that the application would be forwarded immediately after the medical examination, and was so assured. This, with the suggestion that the certificate would be in effect after passing the physical examination, was well calculated to lull him into supposed security. Moreover, about all he could have done was to withdraw his application and apply to another insurer for a policy, and this, one who has applied to a company of his choice would quite naturally hesitate to do. Under the circumstances, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the deceased was at fault in not stirring defendant to action by inquiry as to the cause of delay, or in not withdrawing his application. At the most, this also was an issue appropriate for the determination of the jury.

III. Assuming, then, that the defendant was negligent, and Duffy without fault, as the jury might have concluded, can it be said that but for such negligence a certificate of insurance would have been issued? We think the jury might have found that, in all reasonable probability, had the association passed upon the application, it would have been accepted. Duffy was a young man of thirty-two years, his medical examination was satisfactory, and the physician had recommended him; his employment as a farmer was not hazardous, and his character all that could be desired. The association was actively soliciting members, and it seems to us that the record leaves little, if any, doubt but that, had the association ever passed on the risk, it would have been accepted and the certificate issued. As observed in Continental Ins. Co. v. Haynes, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 276: "It is to be assumed that the company will accept the risk if advantageous to it, which it must be, if fairly and honestly contracted for, because that is the business in which it is engaged, and that is the object for which its agent acted, and therefore to allow it, under the reservation of the right to approve, to reject simply because a loss has occurred, would destroy the mutuality of the contract and inflict upon one party the misfortune he had provided against."

Contingencies might have arisen, as suggested by counsel for appellee, which would have led to a different conclusion, as, upon inquiry, it might have been ascertained that applicant was so venturesome or reckless in his conduct as to render him an undesirable risk. It is enough to say that the record contains no intimation that such was the fact, and it ought not to be inferred that other than the truth would have been elicited by any inquiries which the insurer might have prosecuted. If the applicant was of such disposition or temperament that the association would not, if it had acted, have accepted the application and issued the certificate, then no injury can be said to have resulted from the delay. Whether or not in all reasonable probability the certificate would have been issued, had the association acted on the application, can only be determined from the record as presented to the court.

But it is said that a certificate or policy of insurance is simply a contract like any other, as between individuals, and that there is no such thing as negligence of a party in the matter of delay in entering into a contract. This view overlooks the fact that the defendant holds and is acting under a franchise from the state. The legislative policy, in granting this, proceeds on the theory that chartering such association is in the interest of the public, to the end that indemnity on specific contingencies shall be provided those who are eligible and desire it, and for their protection the state regulates, inspects and supervises their business. Having solicited applications for insurance, and having so obtained them and received payment of the fees or premiums exacted, they are bound either to furnish the indemnity the state has authorized them to furnish, or decline so to do within such reasonable time as will enable them to act intelligently and advisedly thereon, or suffer the consequences flowing from their neglect so to do. Otherwise the applicant is unduly delayed in obtaining the insurance he desires, and for which the law has afforded the opportunity, and which the insurer impliedly has promised, if conditions are satisfactory. Moreover, policies or certificates of insurance ordinarily are dated as of the day the application is signed, and, aside from other considerations, the insurer should not be permitted to unduly prolong the period for which it is exacting the payment of premium without incurring risk. What was said in Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Neafus, supra, is pertinent: "If in this case there was evidence that the company was induced to reject the application for the sole reason that Neafus had died before it acted upon it, or to show that his application, except for the fact of his death, would have been approved, we would have a very different question. We think there is a sound and well-defined distinction between a case in which the application under no circumstances would have been accepted, and a case in which it would have been accepted except for the fact that the applicant died before it was acted upon, and after the company had a reasonable time in which to act. While the application and receipt are to be treated merely as a proposal for insurance, that it is with the company at its election to accept or reject, it may well be said that the company must act honestly and fairly on the application submitted to it, and which it impliedly at least agreed to accept, if satisfactory to it; and that if an application is satisfactory, and the company, if it had acted in a reasonable time, would have accepted the risk, it should not be allowed, after holding the application for an unreasonable time, to reject it, solely because of the death of the applicant. But, treating the case as we find it in the record, the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

delay, however unreasonable it may have been; cannot be construed into an acceptance of an application that no well-managed company, in the ordinary course of its business, would have accepted."

In Boyer v. State Farmers' Mut. Hail Ins. Co. 86 Kan. 442, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 164, 121 Pac. 329, recovery for the amount of insurance applied for was awarded, because of negligent delay in not issuing the policy until after the loss, and in a note to the case as reported in 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 164, the annotator says that "whatever the decision of the jury may be on this question [delay], it cannot be doubted that the proposition that an insurer should be held liable for a loss sustained by an applicant for insurance because of the negligence of the insurer's agent in failing to forward the application within a reasonable time is sound."

In Walker v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 51 Iowa, 679, 2 N. W. 583, the trial court instructed the jury that, if the agent had only the power "to receive and forward applications to the company for their approval or rejection, then, as such, he would be held to the use of ordinary diligence, and the defendant would be liable for his negligence in the performance of such duty; and if you find that said agent neglected to forward such application for rejection or approval within a reasonable time, considering all the circumstances, then the defendant must be held liable for any loss occasioned by such neglect." Of this, the court said: "It may be, but the point we do not decide, that defendant is liable for the neglect of its agent, as contemplated in this instruction; but in order to recover for such negligence, the action must be based thereon and the petition must so declare." And the instruction was held to be erroneous for that no such issue was raised on the pleadings. We are inclined to the opinion that the principle announced in this instruction is sound, and that the facts of the case were such as to require its application.

IV. The application named plaintiff as his beneficiary, and, had the certificate issued, likely she would have been named therein as such. But there was no contract, and the negligence, if any, was that of failing to discharge a duty owing the deceased. Had the certificate issued, whether plaintiff or someone else were beneficiary would have been optional with the insured, and as the injury, if any, was to him, his representative alone can maintain the action for resulting damages. See Schmidt v. Northern Life Asso. 112 Iowa, 41, 51 L.R.A. 141, 84 Am. St. Rep. 323, 83 N. W. 800.

As to plaintiff the judgment is affirmed. Because of the error in not submitting the issues to the jury, the judgment against the intervener is reversed.

Preston, J., takes no part.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, Reapt.,
v.

BENJAMIN ROSENTHAL, Appt.

(197 N. Y. 394, 90 N. E. 991.)

Receiving stolen goods — statutory provision — liability.

1. A statute providing for punishment of Note. — Receiving stolen property: statute making failure to inquire as to possessor's right, equivalent to guilty knowledge.

PEOPLE v. ROSENTHAL seems to be a case of first impression as to the precise question under annotation, and the decision in that case, that a statute which makes junk dealers guilty of criminally receiving stolen property where they purchase wire and metal stolen from railroads, telegraph, and telephone companies without making diligent inquiry as to the possessor's right to sell same, is constitutional, would seem to be based on a just and proper construction of the constitutional provisions claimed to have been violated.

In affirming the judgment of the New York court of appeals in PEOPLE v. ROSENTHAL the Supreme Court of the United States (228 U. S. 280, 57 L. ed. 212, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 27) said: "When it is conceded that such a dealer may be properly subjected to punishment as a criminal if he receives stolen property without actual knowledge that it has been stolen, and merely because charged with notice of circumstances such as would have put an honest or prudent man upon inquiry, it needs little argument to vindicate legislation with respect to particular kinds of personal property that the legislature, in its wisdom, presumably deemed to be more susceptible of theft than other property, when that legislation but adds the further requirement of diligent inquiry by the dealer with respect to the right of the seller.

"It is urged as a criticism that the statute directs the junk dealer's inquiry to the question of the legal right of the seller to sell rather than to the question of an original larceny. It ought to be unnecessary to say that if goods have in fact been stolen, a diligent inquiry into the right of the present possessor to make sale or delivery of them will very surely tend to disclose the larcenous origin of his title. In- 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

one who received stolen property knowing it to have been stolen, or who, being a junk dealer, buys or receives certain kinds of property without ascertaining by diligent inquiry that the person selling it has a right to do so, does not, by the latter provision, make the receiver liable to punishment unless the property had been stolen.

Junk dealers — statute — regulation — equal protection of the laws.

2. Confining to junk dealers the duty of making inquiry as to ownership before purchasing certain kinds of property, under penalty of punishment for receiving stolen property in case it proves to have been stolen, does not deprive them of the equal protection of the laws.

Same — equal protection of the laws.

3. The legislature may, without being guilty of unconstitutional class legislation, require junk dealers to make inquiry as to direct questions in such a case will very probably bring out the truth as readily and as surely as the plump inquiry—"Did you steal these goods?" Or at least, the legislature might so presume. For of course all such matters rest in legislative discretion.

"Counsel suggests that diligent inquiry by a junk dealer respecting the legal right of one offering certain wire or other goods for sale might lead to perplexing questions that only a court of last resort could properly determine. The obvious answer is that a method of inquiry that would bring to light, in rare instances, even the occult and doubtful point in a vendor's title, would, if systematically adhered to, be reasonably sure in a greater number of instances to develop the fact that the goods under investigation had been acquired by theft.

"We have said enough to indicate the character of the arguments employed in the effort to show that the act of 1903 is wholly arbitrary and constitutes so groundless an interference with the citizen's liberty of contract as to bring it within the denunciation of the due process of law clause of the 14th Amendment. It seems to us that the object of the legislation is well within the legitimate bounds of the police power of the state."

The statute considered in PEOPLE v. ROSENTHAL has some analogy in statutes which make an act or thing in itself harmless a substantive offense; e. g., statutes requiring curtains on the doors or windows of saloons to be drawn back so as to expose the interiors during the hours the saloons are required to be closed. There is also an analogy on the civil side to be found in bulk-sales statutes, declaring that sales of goods in bulk shall be fraudulent and void where the purchaser fails to make diligent inquiry as to creditors of the vendor. Generally as to constitutionality and construction of such statutes, see notes in 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 331, and 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 160.

the ownership of certain classes of property offered for sale which, because of its peculiar nature and situation, is peculiarly subject to larceny without possibility of its being adequately watched and guarded.

Receiving stolen goods — duty to investigate — test of liability.

4. The legislature may make the proper discharge, by junk dealers, of the active duty of making inquiry as to the ownership of property offered to them for sale, the test of their criminality for receiving stolen property, in case the property proves to have been stolen.

Former jeopardy — second indictment.

5. One indictment for an offense is not a bar to a second, where the statute provides that the second shall supersede the first.

Same — absence of arraignment.

6. One is not put in jeopardy by an indictment upon which he is not arraigned and to which he does not demur or plead.

(February 8, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Monroe County Court convicting him of receiving stolen goods, and from certain orders directing a resubmission of the case to a grand jury, denying a motion to quash the indictment, and denying a motion in arrest of judgment. Affirmed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

Appeal from an order of the appellate division of the supreme court in the fourth judicial department, entered August 5, 1909, which affirmed a judgment, of the Monroe county court rendered upon a verdict convicting the defendant of the crime of receiving stolen goods without diligent inquiry; and affirmed three orders, the first made by the county judge of Monroe county directing a resubmission of the case to a grand jury, the second from an order of the Monroe county court denying a motion to quash the indictment, and the third from an order of said court denying a motion in arrest of judgment.

On the 26th of March, 1908, the defendant was indicted by a grand jury in attendance at a trial term of the supreme court sitting in the county of Monroe, for the crime of criminally receiving stolen property, in that he, being a junk dealer, purchased stolen copper wire belonging to a telephone company, without ascertaining by diligent inquiry that the person or persons selling the same to him had a legal right to do so. The indictment was sent to the Monroe county court for trial, and on the 7th of May, 1908, while the indictment was still 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) in force, but before any plea had been entered or motion made in relation thereto, upon the application of the district attorney, founded on his own affidavit, the county judge of Monroe county made an order at chambers directing that the charge be resubmitted to the grand jury of that county then in session in connection with a trial term of the supreme court. On the 23d of May a second indictment was found, containing four counts, the first of which was for substantially the same crime described in the indictment found on the 26th of March preceding. After the second indictment had been sent to the county court, and on the 11th of June, 1908, a motion was made to quash the same upon the ground that the grand jury had no jurisdiction to find it. On the 18th of June said motion was denied, and on the 15th of December the defendant pleaded guilty to the first count of the second indictment; the other three counts being dismissed. When arraigned for sentence, he made a motion in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the count in the indictment to which he had pleaded guilty, and that the facts stated in that count do not constitute a crime. The motion was denied, and the court sentenced the defendant to be imprisoned in the Monroe county penitentiary for two months, and, in addition thereto, that he pay a fine of $250, or, in default thereof, that he be committed to said penitentiary for thirty days additional. Thereupon the defendant appealed from the judgment of conviction, from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment, from the order of the Monroe county judge resubmitting the case to the grand jury, and from the order denying his motion to quash the indictment. The appellate division unanimously affirmed the judgment and each of said orders, and the defendant now appeals to this court.

It makes a test of criminality something which seldom can be ascertained by the junk dealer, and imposes on the junk dealer the possibility of a criminal prosecution in connection with every innocent transaction he undertakes.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment in question was found under § 550 of the Penal Code as amended in 1903 by chapter 326 of the Laws of that year. As amended it reads as follows: "Sec. 550. Criminally receiving property.—A person who buys or receives any stolen property, or any property which has been wrongfully appropriated in such a manner as to constitute larceny according to this chapter, knowing the same to have been stolen or so dealt with, or who corruptly, for any money, property, reward, or promise or agreement for the same, conceals, withholds, or aids in concealing or withholding any property, knowing the same to have been stolen, or appropriated wrongfully in such a manner as to constitute larceny under the provisions of this chapter, if such misappropriation has been committed within the state, whether such property were stolen or misappropriated within or without the state, or who being a dealer in or collector of junk, metals, or second-hand materials, or the agent, employee or representative of such dealer or collector, buys or receives any wire, cable, copper, lead, solder, iron, or brass used by or belonging to a railroad, telephone, telegraph, gas or electric light company without ascertaining by diligent inquiry that the person selling or delivering the same has a legal right to do so, is guilty of criminally receiving such property, and is punishable, by imprisonment in a state prison for not more than five years, or in a county jail for not more than six months, or by a fine of not more than $250, or by both such fine and imprisonment." The part printed in italics was added by the amendment, no other change being made, and the section, as thus amended, was re-enacted in the Penal Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 40), § 1308. The defendant claims that the amended portion does not describe an offense, and that it is unconstitutional, because it applies only to junk dealers, protects only the property of railroad, telephone, telegraph, gas, and electric light companies, makes a test of criminality something which can seldom be ascertained by the junk dealer, and imposes on him the possibility of a criminal prosecution in connection with every transaction he undertakes, as well as the necessity of ascertaining the legal right of the seller, regardless of the fact whether or not the property has been the subject of a larceny.

The first question to be considered is, What does the amendment mean? The entire section, including the amendment, consists of a single sentence divided only by commas. It provides for the punishment of any person who receives stolen property knowing it to have been stolen, or who corruptly and for a consideration conceals any property knowing it to have been stolen, and then, in the same sentence, for the punishment of a person who, being a dealer in junk, buys or receives stolen wire or metals of a certain kind belonging to a railroad or other company named, without making diligent inquiry to ascertain that the person selling the same had a legal right to do so. While the amendment alone does not read in that way, we think that when the entire sentence is read together, as obviously it should be, it shows this to have been the intention of the legislature. Prior to the amendment, the legislature had provided for the punishment of one who receives stolen property knowing it to have been stolen, which under our decisions means not only actual knowledge, but also constructive knowledge, through notice of facts and circumstances from which guilty knowledge may fairly be inferred. People v. Wilson, 151 N. Y. 403, 45 N. E. 862; People v. Downing, 84 N. Y. 478, 485. It had also provided for the punishment of one who corruptly conceals property knowing it to have been stolen. By an act passed the day before the amendment in question, it had defined the "junk business" as "the business of buying or selling old metal," and had required junk dealers, except in cities of the first class, not only to take out a license, but, when purchasing such property, to procure a written statement from the seller "as to when, where, and from whom he obtained" the same, and file it with the sheriff or chief of police. Laws 1903, chap. 308. By the next chapter, passed on the same day, it had prohibited junk dealers from purchasing from "any child under the age of sixteen years." Laws 1903, chap. 309. These provisions, however, still left a dangerous loophole for unscrupulous junk dealers, who might outwardly conform to the law and yet be guilty of receiving stolen property knowing or having reason to know it had been stolen, when it would be difficult, if not impossible, owing to the nature of the business and the way it is carried on, to prove knowledge or circumstances imputing knowledge. The legislature is presumed to have been familiar with current history and the decisions of the courts, which show that property of a certain kind, such as copper, brass, iron, etc., is frequently stolen from railroad, telegraph, and similar corporations, which cannot adequately protect it because it is scattered through the country along extensive lines of transportation or communication, and which is exposed to view and caption by the evil-minded, who find their best market in the shops of certain junk dealers. These secondhand materials are usually of such shape and form as to indicate at a glance use and ownership by a corporation of the kind specified. The legislature obviously intended to afford the special protection needed by owners of this kind of property by placing those dealing in it, when secondhand, under the risk of buying at their peril unless they make diligent inquiry to ascertain whether those offering it for sale had the legal right to sell it. This intention, while somewhat awkwardly expressed, as well as the intention to make the entire sentence apply to stolen property, is reasonably clear when the history of legislation, the evil needing redress, and the context are taken into account. The successive steps taken by the series of statutes show that the object of the legislature was to afford all the protection possible against the evil of receiving stolen property when the receiver either knew or should have known that it was stolen. By adding the duty of diligent inquiry before purchasing, it protects the junk dealers who in good faith comply with the statute, and provides for the punishment of those who do not.

Under this construction, the attack upon the substance of the indictment has no foundation, for the statute upon which it rests is not open to objection under either Constitution, state or Federal. The legislature had the power to confine the amendment to junk dealers, because they are way wise and furnish the chief, if not the exclusive, market for stolen property. It had power to provide special protection to property of a certain kind widely used and owned by all corporations of a certain class, because such property, owing to its situation and nature, and such owners, owing to the impossibility of adequately watching and guarding it, need special protection as shown by long experience. While it makes the proper discharge of an active duty a "test of criminality," all that it requires is good faith and honest inquiry, and that is no more than is required by the common law in some cases, especially in the purchase of commercial paper under certain circumstances. The junk dealer is not responsible for the truth of what he ascertains by inquiring, but he runs the risk if he purchases without diligent inquiry to ascertain the truth. The legislature had the right to declare a junk dealer who purchases stolen property of a kind that is the constant subject not only of larceny, but of sale to junk dealers, guilty of a crime, whether he actually knew it had been stolen or not, provided he did not try to find out by making diligent inquiry.

The second indictment was regularly found, and it superseded the first. The Revised Statutes provided that "if there be at any time pending against the same defendant, two indictments for the same offense, or two indictments for the same matter, although charged as different offenses, the indictment first found shall be deemed to be superseded by such second indictment, and shall be quashed." 2 Rev. Stat. 1st ed. pt. 4, chap. 2, title 4, art. 2, § 42. The first indictment, therefore, was not of itself a bar to the second. People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. 9, 14, 28 Am. Dec. 501. The section quoted was expressly excepted from the repealing act passed on the 5th of June, 1886, and is now § 292a of the Code of Criminal Procedure, Laws 1886, chap. 593, p. 829; Laws 1909, chap. 66, § 1, p. 84.

The people take nothing from the order of resubmission, which was a nullity, as the county judge held and as all now concede. No order to resubmit, however, was necessary, for the grand jury had jurisdiction to reindict without one. The defendant was not put in jeopardy by the first indictment, as he was not arraigned thereunder, nor did he demur or plead thereto. If he had demurred and the demurrer had been sustained, a second indictment could not have been lawfully found without an order of resubmission as authorized by the Code of Criminal Procedure, which has modified the practice at common law in this regard to some extent. Code Crim. Proc. §§ 327, 329. By the express command of the statute a judgment sustaining a demurrer is a bar to a further prosecution for the same offense unless such an order is made. Id. § 327. No order to resubmit is required, however, unless the defendant has been put in jeopardy under a former indictment. Even if the indictment is set aside on motion, it is not a bar to a further prosecution, although the defendant is entitled to be discharged from custody, "unless the court direct that the case be resubmitted to the same or another grand jury." Id. §§ 317, 320.

We find no error in the record that affects the judgment of conviction. The appeal from the order of resubmission is dismissed, but the other orders and the judgment of conviction are affirmed.

INHABITANTS OF MARION.

(— Me. —, 86 Atl. 980.)

Municipal corporation — obstruction of navigation — liability.

1. A municipal corporation which obstructs navigation in a navigable stream by the construction and maintenance of a bridge across it without legislative authority is liable in damages to one specially injured by the obstruction.

Nuisance — obstruction of navigation — special injury.

2. An injury different from that suffered by the public at large from the obstruction of a navigable stream, which will entitle the person injured to damages, is shown by the fact that he was in possession of certain logs which he had contracted to float past the obstruction, and that his use of the stream was unreasonably interfered with by the obstruction, so that he was compelled to incur expense in hiring extra hands and to suffer delay in his work.

A bridge in a public highway is not necessarily a nuisance, even if it occasion some inconvenience.

2 Farnham, Waters, p. 1290.

Messrs. C. B. Donworth and E. C. Donworth for plaintiff.

Haley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendants' negligence in carelessly constructing and maintaining two bridges, with the abutments thereto, across Cathance stream in the town of Marion, and by permitting them to fall into a condition of dilapidation, and by negligently omitting to provide said abutments with proper and suitable wings, and that thereby the navigation of said stream was unreasonably obstructed.

Cathance stream is alleged to be a non-tidal, floatable stream, a public highway through the town of Marion, and that during the time complained of the plaintiff was engaged in floating logs and lumber down said stream to a mill pond below said bridges, and that by reason of the obstruction, caused by said bridges and abutments, the passage of said logs and lumber was greatly obstructed and delayed, and the plaintiff put to the expense of employing more men than he otherwise would have done but for said obstruction, and put to other expenses, which are specified in the declaration.

At the return term of the writ the defendants filed a general demurrer to the declaration, which, after joinder by the plaintiff, was overruled by the presiding justice. To this ruling the defendants excepted, and the case is before this court upon their exceptions.

The defendants rely upon two rules of law to sustain their demurrer:

First. That a common-law action cannot be maintained to recover special damages sustained by one against a municipal corporation or a town for damages received through its neglect or omission to perform a public or corporate duty, and that the statutes of this state do not authorize an action for the causes set forth in the declaration.

Second. That the cause of complaint, viz., an obstruction to the navigation of Cathance stream, constituted a public nuisance, and the plaintiff has not suffered such special damages thereby as gives him the right to maintain this action.

1. The general rule is that municipal corporations are not liable to a private action for their neglect to perform, or their negligent performance of, corporate duties 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

imposed by statute; but if the acts complained of are not authorized by statute, and are done by authority of the municipal corporation, or are afterwards ratified by the corporation, they are liable, as an individual would be for the same wrongful acts. Keeley v. Portland, 100 Me. 265, 61 Atl. 180, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 440; Woodcock v. Calais, 66 Me. 234; Anthony v. Adams, 1 Met. 284; Small v. Danville, 51 Me. 359; Deane v. Randolph, 132 Mass. 475; Thayer v. Boston, 19 Pick. 511, 31 Am. Dec. 157. The law only exempts them from neglect, or their negligent performance of, their public or corporate duties imposed by statute.

The declaration alleges, and the demurrer admits, that Cathance stream is a navigable stream and a public highway for all persons to go upon, and that the town constructed and maintained the bridges and the abutments in such condition that they were an obstruction to the navigation of said stream.

Navigable streams are public highways, that all persons have the right to pass over, to carry and to float logs, timber, and other merchandise upon; and, they being public highways, cities or towns have no right to obstruct the navigation thereof, unless they are given the right, or the duty is imposed by statute. As stated in Com. v. Coombs, 2 Mass. 492: "A navigable river is a common right, a public highway; and a general authority to lay out a new highway must not be so extended as to give a power to obstruct an open highway already in the use of the public." Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 71; State v. Anthoine, 40 Me. 435; State v. Freeport, 43 Me. 198; Rogers v. Kennebec & P. R. Co. 35 Me. 319; Cape Elizabeth v. Cumberland County, 64 Me. 456.

The building and maintaining of the bridges complained of not being duties imposed upon the town by the general law, the town cannot justify their construction or maintenance, if an obstruction to navigation, except by an act of the legislature; and the pleadings do not show that they were authorized by the legislature to erect and maintain the bridge. The declaration does contain the allegation that the town "was liable to keep in repair, and did then and there maintain them;" but the liability alleged is a statement of law which the demurrer does not admit. There are no facts stated in the declaration which authorize that conclusion.

In Cumberland & O. Canal Corp. v. Portland, 62 Me. 504, the court said: "The declaration avers, and therefore the demurrer admits, that the city of Portland did the acts complained of. Those acts are, prima facie, acts of trespass. No justification or excuse being shown, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment." In this case the declaration avers and the demurrer admits that the defendants did the acts complained of. They were acts that obstructed the navigation of the public highway. Even when a town is authorized by the legislature to erect a bridge across navigable waters, unless it is constructed as authorized by the act in a reasonable and proper manner, and it is an obstruction to navigation, the town is liable. The legislative authority, under color of which bridges are built across navigable streams, contemplates its being done in a reasonable manner, and does not justify their erection so as to obstruct navigation, unless it is reasonably necessary so to do, or the act expressly authorizes the construction in such a manner as to obstruct navigation; for damages that result, or a careless or unreasonable exercise of their power, are not treated as having been contemplated by the act conferring the authority. Perry v. Worcester, 6 Gray, 544, 66 Am. Dec. 431; Deane v. Randolph, 132 Mass. 476; Wood, Nuisances, §§ 750, 754, and 757.

2. Has the plaintiff alleged that he sustained special damages, different from those suffered by the community at large, either to his person or property, from the public nuisance alleged in the declaration to have been created by the obstruction of Cathance stream? If he has, he has stated a cause of action; otherwise he has not.

The declaration alleged that on April 1, 1909, and on each and every other day between said date and the 1st day of June next following, he was in possession of 1,600,000 feet of logs, lumber, and timber, with the owners of which he had contracted to float and drive down said Cathance stream, passing through and under said bridges to the mill pond of the Dennyville Lumber Company, and also alleged the same facts as to the year 1910, except that in 1910 the amount of logs, lumber, and timber is stated to have been 1,200,000 feet, and that by reason of the unreasonable obstruction of said stream caused by the negligent acts of the defendants, above referred to, the use of said stream was thereby unreasonably interfered with, and he was put to the expense of hiring additional men, and was delayed in floating the logs, lumber, and timber, and thereby incurred other additional expenses.

To sustain their position the defendants rely upon cases which state that the party bringing the action must have sustained damages different from those sustained by the community at large, and urge upon us the case of Blood v. Nashua & L. R. Corp. 2 Gray, 137, 61 Am. Dec. 444, as a case on 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

all fours with the case at bar. In that case there was a stone bridge erected by the defendants across Stony brook, and the plaintiffs owned a mill privilege on that stream, and the erection of the bridge prevented the floating of logs to the mill of the plaintiffs. The case was sent to referees, and they awarded, subject to the opinion of the court, among other things, "damage caused by it being rendered more laborious and expensive to get logs, for the use of . . . [its] mill, from Merri-mac river up Stony brook, under the stone bridge, than it had been under the pile bridge," and the court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to the damages found by the referees for that cause, stating: "The obstruction of a public right of way is a public, not a private, wrong; it may affect those near the obstruction much more than the rest of the public; but the damage sustained by those near it differs in degree only, not in kind."

The case does not show that the plaintiff had been put to any expense, or that he had attempted to use the passage. The fair inference from the report of the referees is that they awarded the damages because it had made the way impassable, not for special damages that he had actually sustained.

In this case the damages alleged are damages suffered by the plaintiff different from those suffered by the community at large. The community only suffered the damage of not having the stream open to navigation,—a damage common to all. The plaintiff suffered the same damages that the community suffered, and, in addition thereto, he alleges other damages by reason of the obstruction to navigation; those damages being the expense that he was obliged to incur to pass the logs and lumber over the public highway, to wit, Cathance stream.

It is alleged that the plaintiff sustained special damages by attempting to use the public highway, and for those damages, being special and different from those suffered by the community, if the allegations of the declaration are proved, unless the obstruction was lawful, he can maintain this action. *Smart v. NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

ROBINSON ROGERS et al., Appts.

(— N. C. —, 78 S. E. 293.)

Jury — number — waiver in criminal case.

One who pleads "not guilty" to an accusation of murder is entitled to be tried by a jury of twelve men, which he cannot waive even by consenting to proceed with eleven in the jury box when one is found mentally unfit.

Note. — Effect of consent of defendant in criminal case to proceeding with less than twelve jurors.

This note is supplemental to the note to State v. Bates, 43 L.R.A. 59, and in so far as concerns cases where the trial was commenced before a full jury, to the note to Jennings v. State, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 862.

For validity of waiver of jury trial in criminal action, see the note to Re McQuown, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1126.

For right to substitute another for a juror becoming disabled or incompetent in a criminal case, see the note to Dennis v. State, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 36.

The defendant in felony cannot consent to proceeding with less than twelve jurors, either at the beginning of the trial (Thompson v. State, 170 U. S. 343, 42 L. ed. 1061, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 620, a case arising in a territory of the United States), or later, after the trial has commenced before a full jury (State v. Simons, 61 Kan. 752, 60 Pac. 1052; STATE v. ROGERS).

So, it was held in Jones v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 303, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1097, 106 S. W. 345, that a provision of the Constitution to the effect that if, pending the trial, a juror died or was disabled from sitting, the remainder of jurors should have the power to render a verdict, did not authorize the defendant in a murder case to consent to the discharge of a juror on account of a death in his family.

(It may be noted that in the Thompson Case, supra, the only waiver was by non-action, but the decision of the court was put on broad grounds.)

In this connection reference should be made to a Louisiana case where it was held that an accused might not assent, either by consent or nonaction, to a jury of twelve where the Constitution provided that his offense should be tried before a jury of five, or by the court if the jury was waived, State v. Beebe, 127 La. 493, 53 So. 730, where there was nonaction on the part of the accused, and the charge was an assault with a dangerous weapon with intent to murder.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Haywood County convicting them of manslaughter. Reversed.

Statement by Brown, J.:

Before impaneling the jury, the solicitor announced that he would not ask for a verdict of murder in first degree. One of the jurors was taken ill, and the trial proceeded with eleven jurors. The defendants were convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to the penitentiary. In apt time they moved in arrest of judgment as well as for a new trial upon the ground that they were not tried by a lawful jury of twelve men. His Honor, upon such motion, rendered the following judgment:

The same was held on a writ of habeas corpus in State v. Reeves, 128 La. 37, 54 So. 415.

It is a general rule that the full number of jurors may be waived in misdemeanor, and this has been recently held where the trial commenced with twelve jurors (Com. v. Beard, 48 Pa. Super. Ct. 319; Com. v. Hawman, 48 Pa. Super. Ct. 343), and where the statute so provided (State v. Wells, 69 Kan. 792, 77 Pac. 547).

But, on the other hand, it was held in Dickinson v. United States, 86 C. C. A. 625, 159 Fed. 801 (a case which commenced with the full number of jurors), that a defendant on trial for an offense which, while declared by the United States Revised Statutes to be a misdemeanor, is an infamous crime, may not waive the full number of jurors on his trial.

There is some difference in the authorities as to whether an accused who may waive a jury can consent to less than the lawful number of jurors. In People v. Lane, 124 Mich. 271, 82 N. W. 897, where the statute permitted a waiver of juries in cases before a justice of the peace, it was held that as an accused might entirely waive the trial by jury he might consent to be tried by less than the statutory number of six.

So, in Mackey v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 151 S. W. 802, it was held that the statute allowing a jury to be waived in misdemeanor cases allowed the accused in such cases to agree to a jury of less than the statutory number of six.

And in Dalton v. State, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 85, 116 Pac. 954, the court was of the opinion that one who had a right to waive a jury of twelve might agree to be tried for a misdemeanor by a jury of six.

But it is the rule in New York that the fact that the defendant may waive a trial by jury in a misdemeanor case does not give him the right to consent to trial by less than the statutory number of six, and that such consent will be a waiver of a jury. People v. Bent, 151 App. Div. 734, 136 N. Y. Supp. 276.

B. B. B.

"Findings of Fact.

"As the ground for a new trial contained in said two affidavits of defendants, to wit, that they were tried by a jury composed only of eleven men, the court is of the opinion that the defendants are not entitled to any finding of fact on this matter, and so holds; but, if the supreme court is of a contrary opinion, then he makes the following findings of fact:

"That this case was called for trial on Wednesday morning of the first week, when the solicitor moved for a continuance on the ground of the absence of two witnesses to the shooting; one being sick in bed in Canton and the other in South Carolina. Defendants resisted the continuance and insisted on a trial at this term, and the court denied the motion for continuance. That the entire afternoon was consumed before a jury was selected. That the defendants did not exhaust their peremptory challenges. That the jury, after being impaneled, was in charge of an officer for the night, who was duly sworn. That Thursday morning, before any evidence had been offered, the solicitor asked that the jury be excused, and, in the absence of the jury, stated to the court that, since the adjournment, he and counsel for the defendant had discovered that one of the jurors selected was subject to fits; that he had recently been in Johns Hopkins Hospital and had a part of his brain removed, and that he was liable to lose his mental balance if subjected to much mental strain; and that in the opinion of counsel he was not mentally competent to sit on the jury. That the state was willing to call in another juror or to make a mistrial or to get an entirely new panel. That counsel for defendants insisted on proceeding with eleven men, and thereupon it was agreed in open court by the defendants speaking in open court through their counsel and the solicitor for the state that the case would proceed with eleven jurors, and that the clerk should make no record of the fact that one of the jury had been excused by consent. That defendants waived their right to have a full panel, and that no point should ever be raised that only eleven men were in the jury box. And thereupon the court excused said juror and directed the trial to proceed. That the two defendants are men of more than ordinary intelligence; that McCracken is about twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age, and the defendant Rogers, about forty years of age, and their families are prominent and wealthy. That both these defendants are possessed of sufficient mental capacity to understand and did understand that both they and their counsel were entering into said agreement and electing to proceed with eleven jurors by their assent, and that the court consented to this course.

"These defendants were represented by four able and experienced counsel, one of whom has filled the office of solicitor for two terms. That the trial proceeded through Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and on Monday the court delivered the charge to the jury; that the defendants were present during this time, during the sessions of court (being under good bonds, the court did not order them in custody during the progress of the trial); that the jury returned their verdict Monday afternoon. At the request of defendants' counsel, the court gave them until Wednesday of the second week before pronouncing the judgment of the court, and on Wednesday the defendants again stated that they were not ready, and asked for another day, so the court gave them until Thursday, A. M. On Thursday the defendants filed said affidavits, and this was the first time it was suggested that they would attempt to repudiate their solemn agreement. That the defendants were represented by the same counsel throughout the entire term of court. That the defendants did not ask to discharge their original counsel, nor did said counsel ask to withdraw from the case, but the same counsel who made the agreement made the motions aforesaid for a new trial.

"Wherefore the court is of the opinion that, by their conduct, defendants are estopped to set up the claim that there were only eleven men in the jury box, and the court denies the motion, and the defendants except. Wherefore the court denies the motion, and the defendants except."

There can be no waiver of a trial by twelve jurors, the constitutional number.

E. 57; State v. Scruggs, 115 N. C. 805, 20 S. E. 720; State v. Stewart, 89 N. C. 563, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 111; State v. Holt, 90 N. C. 749, 47 Am. Rep. 544.

Brown, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

It is elementary that a "jury," as understood at common law and as used in our Constitutions, Federal and state, signifies twelve men duly impaneled in the case to be tried. A less number is not a jury. Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 873, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580. In Lamb v. Lane, 4 Ohio St. 167, Chief Justice Thurman said: "That the term 'jury,' without addition or prefix, imports a body of twelve men in a court of justice, is as well settled as any legal proposition can be." Opinion of Justices, 41 N. H. 550; United States v. 1,363 Bags of Merchandise, 2 Sprague, 85, Fed. Cas. No. 15,964; United States v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 123 U. S. 113, 31 L. ed. 138, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77. In State v. Scruggs, 115 N. C. 805, 20 S. E. 720, it is held that "the jury provided by law for the trial of indictments is composed of twelve men; a less number is not a jury, and a trial by jury in a criminal action cannot be waived by the accused." In State v. Stewart, 89 N. C. 564, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 111, an indictment for assault and battery, Justice Ashe says: "It is a fundamental principle of the common law, declared in 'Magna Charta,' and again in our Bill of Rights, that 'no person shall be convicted of any crime but by the unanimous verdict of a jury of good and lawful men in open court.' Art. 1, § 13. The only exception to this is where the legislature may provide other means of trial for petty misdemeanors with the right of appeal. . . . The court here has undertaken to serve in the double capacity of judge and jury, and try the defendant without a jury, which it had no authority to do, even with the consent of the prisoner,"—citing 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 759. In State v. Holt, 90 N. C. 750, 47 Am. Rep. 544, an indictment for cruelty to animals, it is held that a jury trial cannot be waived by the defendant in a criminal action.

The defendant may plead guilty, or nolo contendere, or autrefois convict, and of course the impaneling of a jury is unnecessary; but when he pleads not guilty in cases, such as this, where a trial by jury is guaranteed by the organic law, he must be tried by a jury of twelve men, and he cannot waive it. State v. Moss, 47 N. C. (2 Jones, L.) 66; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128. It would have been much safer for his Honor to have followed the settled precedents of this court, and have discharged the jury and impaneled another.

Innovations in settled methods of procedure are generally unwise, especially in criminal cases. In this connection it is well to remember the words of Chief Justice Merrimon: "A greater danger arises from practices and precedents that insidiously gain a foothold and power in courts of justice, by inadvertence and lack of due consideration. . . . In the economy of time, the hurry of business, lack of attention, hasty consideration, irregular and unwarranted methods of trial are adopted, allowed, tolerated, and thus vicious practices spring up, creating sources of danger to constitutional right." State v. Holt, supra.

New trial.

Clark, Ch. J., dissenting:

The Constitution, art. 1, § 13, provides: "No person shall be convicted of any crime but by the unanimous verdict of a jury of good and lawful men in open court." Section 19 of the same article provides: "In all controversies at law respecting property, the ancient mode of trial by jury is one of the best securities of the rights of the people, and ought to remain sacred and inviolable." The right to trial by jury is beyond controversy, both in civil and criminal cases.

There can be no controversy either that the jury here referred to means "twelve men," not because there is any reference to trial by jury in Magna Charta, or that it would have any authority if there was, but because our Constitution, made by our people for our own government, provides for a jury, and the word "jury" must be given the signification which it had at that time, which was a jury of "twelve men." In some states a jury now may consist of less than twelve and in several a unanimous verdict is not required. The Supreme Court of the United States in passing upon this matter has held, in several cases, that the number that should compose a jury, and whether unanimity should be required or not, is entirely a matter for the people of each state, and that the 14th Amendment does not impose any restrictions upon the states in this regard. The requirement in the 5th and 6th Amendments to the Federal Constitution of a jury trial is held also to apply only to the Federal courts. This matter has been fully discussed and has been settled in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292; Caldwell v. Texas, 137 U. S. 692, 34 L. ed. 816, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Leeper v. Texas, 139 U. S. 462, 35 L. ed. 225, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 577; Brown v. New Jersey, 175 U. S. 172, 44 L. ed. 119, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77; and many other cases.

In Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 44 L. ed. 597, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 448, 494, in sustaining a conviction by a jury of eight as provided by the Constitution of Utah, Mr. Justice Peckham reviews the authorities to the above effect, approves them, and says, among other things: "It is emphatically the case of the people by their organic law, providing for their own affairs, and we are of opinion they are much better judges of what they ought to have in these respects than anyone else can be. The reason given in the learned and most able opinion of Mr. Justice Matthews, in the Hurtado Case for the judgment therein rendered, apply with equal force in regard to a trial by a jury of less than twelve jurors. The right to be proceeded against only by indictment, and the right to a trial by twelve jurors, are of the same nature, and are subject to the same judgment, and the people in the several states have the same right to provide their organic law for the change of both or either." See also Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 455 et seq.

Neither the Federal Constitution nor Magna Charta has any bearing upon the subject. There have been law writers and judges who have stated that Magna Charta, chap. 39, guaranteed the right of trial by jury; but this view originated at a time when historical statements were received with less investigation than at present. Magna Charta was but one of several agreements made between King John (and later by his son Henry III.), on the one side, and the insurgent barons, on the other. Magna Charta was sealed (not signed) on Friday, June 19, 1215, in the meadow of Runnymede (then a little island) on the river Thames 3 miles below Windsor Castle and in sight from its towers. It was an agreement between the King, on the one hand, and the great barons, on the other. The words therein, judicium suorum parium, had no reference to a trial by jury. McKechnie, Magna Charta, 158, 456, 457; 1 Pollock & M. History of English Law, 392, 581. About fifty years before, at the Assizes of Clarendon, 1166, Henry II. instituted the germ of the grand jury which at first consisted of twelve men (1 Pollock & Maitland, 131); but thorough investigation has shown that the petty jury was not known in England till nearly 150 years after Magna Charta. At first the verdict was rendered by a majority; that is seven was a valid verdict. Britton, I. 31. There had been further back, in remoter times, instances in which the witnesses were called upon to aid the judicial officer in passing upon a criminal offense. But that cannot be mistaken for the jury, which, when gradually instituted, soon became of the fixed number of twelve, and from which witnesses are excluded. Magna Charta could not refer to the "jury," which was then unknown.

Besides, the word judicium does not mean "jury," but "judgment." McKechnie, Magna Charta, 407. What the barons meant in Magna Charta was not that everyone should have the right to an impartial trial by jury, for at that time juries were unknown, and the common people had indeed less consideration from the mail-clad barons than from the King. What the barons did stipulate for was a "special privilege" for themselves. The King, when in need of money, had been in the habit of sending his officials and judges to try charges, most often trumped up, against wealthy barons, and extorted large supplies out of them. Therefore this stipulation in Magna Charta granted the special privilege that, when the King had any charge against one of their order, he should not send his judges against them, but the charge must be tried by men of their own order, i. e., by barons. They were to be convicted and sentenced, not by the King's judges, as the common people were, but they were subject only to judicium suorum parium; i. e., to the "judgment of their equals." The common people might be tried by the judges, who were all appointed by the King and removable at his pleasure. But they made him agree that when he had any charge against barons they should be tried and judged "by their peers;" that is, by men of their own order. The judges were commoners, and not the peers or equals of the barons, who would have scorned the idea of being tried by them. 1 Pollock & M. History of English Law, 152, 539, 581. The judges were the equals of other freemen and could try them. As to the vast masses of the people who were not even freemen, they were guaranteed no trial except in the barons' courts, who were practically their owners. The barons, therefore, in stipulating for a trial of "every freeman" by their peers, were stipulating for a special privilege exempting them from the jurisdiction of the King's courts. This privilege, under the circumstances, may have been very necessary for their protection, for the judges were the King's agents. But the provision cannot be lauded as guarantying to us "trial by jury," which was then an unheard of institution, and to which the barons would under no circumstances have submitted. In McKechnie on Magna Charta, the original sources of information are marshaled and interestingly discussed.

King John possessed no power he could confer upon or withhold from the people of this state. No agreements made between him and his barons, which were constantly broken, can restrict or bind us. Magna Charta and other similar contracts between them are of interest as historical documents of a stage far below ours in the development of human rights. They confer no rights upon us, still less do they restrict our right to self-government. We base our right to this, not upon the grant of any King, but upon the inherent power to govern ourselves, restricted only by the Constitution and laws which we ourselves have made. These old documents are useful only to explain the meaning of words which we have used.

It is universally held that in civil cases trial by jury is simply a right or privilege, and can be waived, unless there is some statute forbidding it. 24 Cyc. 149; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1097; and numerous cases cited by both. Embraced in these decisions is also, as a corollary, the proposition that in civil cases by consent less than twelve may find a verdict.

In criminal cases there is a wide diversity in the courts. In some states it is held that a jury can be waived in all criminal cases, as in civil cases, and in others it is held that a jury cannot be waived except in misdemeanors, and in still others it has been held that a jury cannot be waived in any criminal case. There is nearly the same diversity as to the right, in criminal cases, of the defendant to agree that the verdict may be rendered by less than twelve men, or dispensing with unanimity, except that there are two or three states which, while holding that a jury cannot be waived, yet hold that by consent of the defendant the jury may consist of less than twelve men, when, as in this case, otherwise there would be a mistrial. The authorities on these propositions may be found in 24 Cyc. 150, 153, and 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1098, in numerous cases there cited. For centuries in criminal cases a defendant retained his right to the ancient mode of "trial by battle," and could not be tried by a jury except by his consent. Hence the formula we still retain, "How will you be tried," and the reply, "By God and my country," i. e., by a jury. 1 Legal Hist. Essays, 657.

As the right to a trial by jury is guaranteed equally by the Constitution in civil and in criminal cases alike, it is difficult to understand why, if it is a requirement, and not merely a privilege, it can be waived in one class of cases, and not in the other. This distinction is not based upon the Constitutional phraseology, but upon the view which has happened to be taken by the incumbents of the bench in each state. Among the states which hold that a jury trial can be waived in criminal cases are Arkansas, Connecticut, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Nevada, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, and Pennsylvania. Among the cases on the point whose reasoning is most worthy of consideration are State v. Kaufman, 51 Iowa, 579, 33 Am. Rep. 148, 2 N. W. 275, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 626; Com. v. Dailey, 12 Cush. 80; Murphy v. Com. 1 Met. (Ky.) 365; State v. Sackett, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

39 Minn. 69, 38 N. W. 773; Com. v. Sweet, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 136; State v. White, 33 La. Ann. 1219; and there are others.

In this state it has been held that, while in civil cases a jury trial can be waived, this cannot be done in criminal cases. State v. Stewart, 89 N. C. 564, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 111; State v. Holt, 90 N. C. 749, 47 Am. Rep. 544. State v. Scruggs, 115 N. C. 805, 20 S. E. 720, holds, as in State v. Holt, that a jury trial cannot be waived; but it does not directly pass on the point whether by consent a verdict may not be rendered by a lesser number, though that is a reasonable inference.

There can be no reason shown, upon the face of the Constitution, why a jury trial should be held to be a privilege in civil cases but an ironclad requirement in criminal. We, however have, as just said, no case in which it has been expressly held that the trial, at the request of the defendant, cannot proceed with eleven jurors. It should seem that it could, as the Constitution also guarantees the defendant a right to a "speedy trial." Among able opinions to this effect are: Shaw, Ch. J., in Com. v. Dailey, 12 Cush. 80; State v. Sackett, 39 Minn. 69, 38 N. W. 773; Simpson, Ch. J. in Murphy v. Com. 1 Met. (Ky.) 365. To similar purport: State v. Borowsky, 11 Nev. 119; Connelly v. State, 60 Ala. 89, 31 Am. Rep. 34, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 238; State v. Kaufman, 51 Iowa, 578, 33 Am. Rep. 148, 2 N. W. 275, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 626. The following cases also hold valid the waiver of any jury in criminal cases: State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 349, 33 Am. Rep. 27; Dillingham v. State, 5 Ohio St. 280; Edwards v. State, 45 N. J. L. 419; Ward v. People, 30 Mich. 116, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 565; State v. Mansfield, 41 Mo. 470; State v. Cox, 8 Ark. 436; and there are others.

It was at the instance and by the request of the defendants in this case that, one of the jurors becoming incapacitated, no mistrial was entered, and it was agreed that the case should proceed with eleven jurors and that no entry should be made. The judge finds as facts that "the solicitor moved for a continuance on ground of the absence of two witnesses to the shooting; one being ill and in bed, and the other in South Carolina. The defendants resisted the continuance and insisted on a trial at this term, and the court denied the motion for continuance. The defendants did not exhaust their peremptory challenges. The jury was impaneled and an officer sworn, Wednesday. The next morning, before any evidence had been offered, the solicitor asked for the withdrawal of a juror because, since the adjournment, he and the counsel for the defendants had ascertained that one of the jurors was subject to fits and that counsel did not think he was mentally competent to sit on the jury; that the state was willing to call in another juror, or to make a mistrial, or to get an entirely new panel. Counsel for defendants insisted on proceeding with eleven men, and thereupon it was agreed in open court, the defendants speaking in open court through their counsel, and the solicitor for the state, that the case would proceed with eleven jurors, and that the clerk should make no record of the fact that one of the jury had been excused by consent; the defendants waived their right to have a full panel, and stated that no point should ever be raised that only eleven men were in the jury box; and thereupon the court excused said juror and directed the trial to proceed. The two defendants are men of more than ordinary intelligence, McCracken being twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age, and the defendant Rogers about forty years of age, and their families are prominent and wealthy. Both these defendants are possessed of sufficient mental capacity to understand, and did understand, that both they and their counsel were entering into said agreement and electing to proceed with eleven jurors by their assent, and that the court consented to this course. These defendants were represented by four able and experienced counsel, one of whom has filled the office of solicitor for two terms." The trial occupied four days. No objection was made as to the juror being excused until two days after the verdict. The defendants did not ask to discharge their counsel, nor did counsel ask to withdraw, and the same counsel who made the agreement made the motion in arrest of judgment upon the ground that it was invalid.

The prisoners have had every right and privilege which is guaranteed them by the Constitution. They thought it was to their benefit to proceed with eleven jurors, and asked that it should be done. The courts may well scrutinize closely all offers to waive a jury trial in criminal cases, because the defendants may act unadvisedly in some cases, and the consequences may be serious; but this should not cause the Constitution to be construed differently as to the trial by jury in civil cases and in criminal cases.

In the present case the court finds as facts that the prisoners were men of intelligence and means, and were represented by several able counsel, one of whom was formerly solicitor for that district for eight years. The prisoners do not show that they suffered any detriment in the course of the trial. They have had a fair trial, and 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

they have been deprived of no constitutional right.

A defendant has a constitutional right to a speedy trial by jury. Yet he waives this provision by obtaining a continuance. A plea of guilty dispenses with a jury trial altogether. Why, therefore, cannot a defendant agree to accept a verdict by eleven jurors when he has competent counsel and is himself intelligent, and both his counsel and himself think it for his interest to do so? Especially when this is done with the consent of the court and the solicitor representing the state. There is nothing to indicate that the prisoners suffered any prejudice from the absence of the other juror, and they ought not to obtain any benefit by their breach of good faith.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

ALBERTA BENNETT, by Next Friend,
Appt.,
v.

NASHVILLE TRUST COMPANY.

(— Tenn. —, 153 S. W. 840.)

Trust — modification by equity — hastening payment.

Equity may direct the present payment to the beneficiary of the income of a fund placed in trust to accumulate until she reaches a specified age, if intellectual promise, the need of education, and necessitous circumstances, unforeseen by the testator, have wrought such a change in her condition that the creator of the trust would have so directed had he foreseen the situation in which she finds herself.

Note. — Power of court to hasten enjoyment of trust fund.

The question with which this note is concerned is as to the power of a court of equity to break in upon the terms of a trust which neither expressly nor impliedly authorizes such a course to be taken, by directing all or a part of the income or principal of the trust estate to be handed over to or expended for the benefit of the beneficiaries of the trust before the time fixed for its enjoyment. It does not include decisions as to the power of the court to break in upon the terms of the trust in other ways; as, by authorizing leases for a longer term than is permitted or contemplated by the creator of the trust, or by authorizing the sale of trust property and reinvestment of the proceeds for the purpose of increasing the income therefrom.

As to the power of the court to change the number of trustees designated in the instrument creating the trust, see note to Barker v. Barker, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 802.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Davidson County dismissing a bill filed for permission to use the income of a trust fund for the alleged necessities of the minor beneficiary. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James T. Miller for appellant.

Mr. T. M. Steger for appellee.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Charles B. Weakley, of Davidson county, left a will containing the following clauses pertinent to the issues for determination, to wit:

"Fifth. To Alberta Bennett I give one thousand ($1,000) dollars to be held by my executor for her with all accumulations until Alberta attains the age of twenty-five years, when said sum with all accumulations is to be paid to her."

"Ninth. I nominate and appoint the Nashville Trust Company as executor of this my last will and as testamentary trustee to execute the directions herein contained, and my said executor is hereby vested with full power to sell and dispose of any part or all of my estate for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the will."

In intervening clauses various devises and legacies were made, to which the language in the latter portion of the ninth clause refers.

Alberta Bennett, a minor, by next friend, filed a bill in equity in which it is alleged

As to the right of a trustee to execute a lease to extend beyond the terms of the trust, see note to Hubbell v. Hubbell, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 497.

As to the power of the court to control discretion vested in a trustee, see note to Trout v. Pratt, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 398.

The cases all agree that where peculiar circumstances have arisen not expressly provided for by the trust instrument, and not anticipated by its author, the court in the emergency that has arisen has jurisdiction to sanction acts by the trustees which in ordinary circumstances they would have no power to do. As said in Curtiss v. Brown, 29 Ill. 201, in which the question was as to the power of the court to order the sale of nonproductive property: "Exigencies often arise not contemplated by the party creating the trust, and which had they been anticipated would undoubtedly have been provided for, where the aid of the court of chancery must be invoked to grant relief imperatively required; and in such cases the court must, as far as may be, occupy the place of the party creating the trust, and do with the fund what he would have dictated had he anticipated the emergency."

It is not the convenience or even the benefit of the beneficiaries which will move the court to hasten enjoyment of trust funds, but the necessity of varying the terms of the trust in order to give effect to the ultimate intention of its creator. See St. Paul's Church v. Atty. Gen. 164 Mass. 188, 41 N. E. 231; Mills v. Michigan Trust Co. 124 Mich. 244, 82 N. W. 1046; Ruggles v. Tyson, 104 Wis. 500, 48 L.R.A. 809, 79 N. W. 766, 81 N. W. 367; and Biddle's Appeal, 99 Pa. 525, elsewhere set forth.

This power is most frequently exercised where property is held in trust for infants who have not sufficient means for their maintenance or proper education.

In one of the early decisions upon this subject (Harvey v. Harvey, 2 P. Wms. 21), a father had devised all his property to his eldest son; charged with the payment of a sum of money to each of his younger children when they should attain the age of twenty-one years, but made no provision for their maintenance during minority. Application having been made in behalf of the younger children for maintenance, the master of rolls decreed that they should recover maintenance, observing that "these being vested legacies, and no devise over, it would be extreme hard that the children should starve when entitled to so considerable legacies, for the sake of their executors or administrators, who, in case of their deaths, would have the said legacies. That in this case the court would do what, in common presumption, the father if living would, nay ought to have done, which was to provide necessities for his children. That a court of equity would make hard shifts for the provision of children; as where younger children were left destitute, and the eldest an infant, equity would make such a liberal allowance to the guardian of the eldest, as that he might thereout be enabled to maintain all the children; and for the same reason, the court would likewise take a latitude in this case; that since interest was pretty much in the breast of the court, though the will were silent with regard to that, yet it should be presumed that the father who gave these legacies intended they should carry interest, if the estate would bear it: for everyone must suppose it to have been the intention of the father, that his children should not want bread during their infancy. Nay, that for this reason it had been held that, though a legacy were devised over in case of the legatee's dying before twenty-one, yet the infant legatee ought to have interest allowed him during his infancy, in order for his maintenance, with this difference only, that where the estate has appeared to be small, the court, in whose discretion it always lies to determine the quantum of interest, has ordered the lower interest."

And in Aynsworth v. Pratchett, 13 Ves. Jr. 321, where the infant beneficiaries of a trust created by the will of their father were entitled to the fund absolutely upon majority, and only £30 each per annum was given by the will to their mother for their maintenance, and her own income was only £100 under the will, an increase of the

that she, the minor beneficiary, is a girl of intellectual promise now in high school in Nashville, and that it is necessary in order to the completion of her education that permission be granted to use currently the income of the trust fund affected by clause 5 of the will. The situation and necessitous condition of the minor are set forth.

The Nashville Trust Company, trustee, answered that it was advised that it was its duty to hold the fund under the fifth clause, with accumulations, until the minor complainant arrived at the age of twenty-five years; no other disposition being warranted.

The special chancellor to whom the cause was submitted decreed that a court of chancery was powerless to grant the minor the relief prayed, he being of opinion that the will unalterably fixed the status of the trust so that no allowance could be made for the minor's necessities, or to her at all, until she arrived at the age indicated by the will.

Nothing else appearing, it may be conceded that the special chancellor properly construed the fifth clause to effect a postponement until her twenty-sixth year of a distribution to or use by the minor of the income from the trust fund.

But is it a sound contention that under no circumstances can a court of equity order any part of such accumulations to be presently applied to the necessities of the amount granted for maintenance was allowed.

The fact that the testator has provided a common fund for the support and education of the beneficiaries and the support of their parents will not preclude the court from increasing such allowance beyond the amount contemplated by the testator, where an additional allowance is needed for their maintenance and education. Newport v. Cook, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 332.

In Hallinan v. Hearst, 133 Cal. 645, 55 L.R.A. 216, 66 Pac. 17, it was held that a minor beneficiary of a fund, contributed by the public to aid the families of members of the fire department who were killed in the discharge of their duty cannot compel payment of his share faster than it is required to relieve his necessities and contribute to his support.

Where there is a legacy by a parent to his children, or a grandparent to his grandchildren, or by one standing in loco parentis, equity may decree an allowance of interest if necessary for the support of the infant, whether the legacy be fixed or contingent on the attainment by the infant of a certain age. Seibert's Appeal, 19 Pa. 49; Leiby's Appeal, 49 Pa. 182; and see Mole v. Mole, 1 Dick. 310, where maintenance was allowed to an infant out of a legacy bequeathed to him by his father, although the will was silent as to maintenance, but directed an accumulation until he attained twenty-one years; and if he died before, the whole was given to another. But compare Kime v. Welfft, 3 Sim. 533; Lomax v. Lomax, 11 Ves. Jr. 48, 8 Revised Rep. 84; and Errington v. Chapman, 12 Ves. Jr. 20, hereinafter set forth, in which a contrary view appears to have been taken.

And where the welfare of the child requires, and especially where the legacy is a small one, the court will permit an encroachment upon the principal. See Barlow v. Grant, 1 Vern. 255; Ex parte Green, 1 Jac. & W. 253; Longwith v. Riggs, 123 Ill. 258, 14 N. E. 840; Re Muller, 29 Hun, 418; Stephens v. Howard, 32 N. J. Eq. 244; and Re Potts, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 340.

was held that the capital of infant remaindermen's estate may be broken in upon for their maintenance and education where the life tenant joins in the application.

In Stephens v. Howard, 32 N. J. Eq. 244, the court said: "The source of the power is easy to trace. It is found in the fact that the infant is the absolute owner of the property, no other person having either a present or prospective legal interest in it; and that, if the present enjoyment of the property is withheld, the infant must suffer, possibly for the advantage of some person who has no interest in the infant and was never thought of by the testator as a possible recipient of his bounty."

But in Walker v. Wetherell, 6 Ves. Jr. 473, the master of the rolls doubted whether the capital of an infant's estate should be broken in upon for purposes of maintenance and education, although the power of the court to authorize it was conceded.

Where under the provisions of a will the income only of a trust estate is to be used for the support of the beneficiaries, who were testator's wife and child, the court will not order a trustee to sell a portion of the estate to raise funds for that purpose, although it is likely that if the testator could have looked into the future and foreseen that the estate would not be productive of sufficient income, he might have framed his will differently. Mills v. Michigan Trust Co. 124 Mich. 244, 82 N. W. 1046.

In Ruggles v. Tyson, 104 Wis. 500, 48 L.R.A. 809, 79 N. W. 766, 81 N. W. 367, it is said that the fact that it would be for the best interest of infant owners of the estate in remainder to allow them an immediate benefit therefrom to maintain and educate them does not warrant a disturbance of the scheme intended to postpone such benefit to a later time; but that it is the necessity that something shall be done to guard against the danger that the title in remainder may be prevented from reaching them at all, which calls into activity the equity power of the court.

It has also been held in numerous instances that equity may make an allowance out beneficiary, however exigent, imperative, and unanticipated they may be?

In the minor's bill of complaint, it was asked that proof be taken to show the character and extent of her necessities. If a reference had been ordered and executed respecting such, and it had appeared that circumstances unforeseen by the testator had wrought such a change in her condition as that she was practically destitute, is it a sound contention that the arm of equity is too short to reach to and remedy her plight by a current application towards her needs, of the income from a fund that is her own; and this because of the restriction imposed by the testator on mere management? We think not.

It is to be noted that what is asked in complainant's behalf will not, on grant, affect the rights of any other legatee or beneficiary under the will. The quantum of her estate as cestui que trust is not to be enlarged. The court's action to the end sought would merely touch the management or mode of user, and would not proceed to even that limited extent if it were not made clearly to appear in proof that an exigency existed not contemplated by the creator of the trust, which, had it been in anticipation by him, would in likelihood have been provided for. A court of equity, acting in loco parentis or occupying the place of the trust creator, in such case, does what it conceives would have been done by the creator had he foreseen the situation of his beneficiary, in a substitution of another of the income of a trust estate for the support of an infant cestui que trust although the instrument creating the trust contains no provision for maintenance and there is a direction that the income shall accumulate. Mole v. Mole, 1 Dick. 310; Rhoads v. Rhoads, 43 Ill. 239; Knorr v. Millard, 52 Mich. 542; 18 N. W. 349; Read v. Patterson, 44 N. J. Eq. 211, 6 Am. St. Rep. 877, 14 Atl. 490; Tompkins v. Tompkins, 18 N. J. Eq. 303; and Newport v. Cook, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 332; Pitts v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. 21 R. I. 544, 48 L.R.A. 783, 79 Am. St. Rep. 821, 45 Atl. 553.

It is within the power of a court possessing general equity powers to authorize a trustee to appropriate the interest, or even part of the principal, of a fund placed in his hands for accumulation, in trust for a minor until such minor arrives at full age, for the education and maintenance of such minor, where there is no other property of the minor adequate for these purposes, where the minor is of tender age, without any parent living, and where there is no devise over, and no third person interested in the fund. Re Potts, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 340.

In Havelock v. Havelock, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 807, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 778, 44 L. T. N. S. 168, 29 Week. Rep. 859, where there was an absolute direction for accumulation for twenty-one years of property worth £10,000 a year, thereafter to be held in trust for a certain person and for his eldest son and other sons in tail, it was held that as the father was possessed of only a moderate income, the sum of £2,700 per annum should be allowed him for the benefit of his two infant sons.

In Rhoads v. Rhoads, 43 Ill. 239, in speaking of the power of the court to anticipate the time of payment of a legacy left by a parent on trust to accumulate for his children, so far as it may be shown to be necessary for the maintenance of the beneficiaries, the court said: "This does not subvert the will, or tend to defeat the intention of the testator, for his children were the darling objects of his solicitude, and were he living, he would undoubtedly make ample provision for them. A court of chancery may do what it is evident from the will the testator would do if living."

The same rule applies where the beneficiary, although of full age, is feeble-minded. Longwith v. Riggs, 123 Ill. 258, 14 N. E. 840.

As a general rule, an allowance will not be made where the interest of the beneficiary is a contingent one, or where, though vested, it is liable to be defeated by the happening of some event before the period fixed for enjoyment, so that the right of some other person will be affected by the allowance,—unless, indeed, all persons likely to be affected join in the application. This rule, however, is subject to certain qualifications. One of these exists where the beneficiaries compose a class some of whom will absolutely take the fund, and all have an equal chance of taking or surviving. Another is that if there is a clear intention to be gathered from the whole instrument that the beneficiary is to have maintenance, the court will order it, though there is a gift over. So, also, where the gift is by a parent or grandparent to children having no means of maintenance; although the cases are at variance on this point.

In Marshall v. Holloway, 2 Swanst. 432, Lord Eldon said: "The court has never gone farther than this, that though the words of the will do not authorize the application of interest to the maintenance of the infants, yet if it can collect before it all the individuals who may be entitled to the fund, so as to make to each a compensation for taking from him part, it will grant an allowance for maintenance; but if the will contain successive limitations under which persons not in being may become entitled, it is not sufficient that all the parties then living, presumptively entitled, are before the court, for none of the living may be the parties eventually entitled to the enjoyment of the property. In such a case, the order would be, in effect, to give for the maintenance of one person the property of another."

In Kime v. Welcott, 3 Sim. 533, where there was an express direction for accumulation during minority of infants (the tes-course of management in order to the complete realization of his purposed bounty. If this be not competent to be done by a court of equity, it is not difficult to contemplate a situation in which the testator's purposed benefit would be defeated entirely; for example, a seizure of the beneficiary by a disease that would inevitably make her its victim before she had reached the age of twenty-five years.

The concept and doctrine may be of comparatively recent declaration and application, but the principle involved commends itself to the court as consonant with justice and the development of an equity system along lines of sound polity.

In Denegre v. Walker, 214 Ill. 113, 105 Am. St. Rep. 98, 73 N. E. 409, 2 Ann. Cas.

tator, their father, understanding that other ample provision had been made for the children, which proved to be a mistake), with a gift over if no child lived to be twenty-one years of age; and it appeared that there was the possibility of issue unborn who might be entitled to the accumulated fund, —it was held that it would not be proper to affect their rights by an allowance for maintenance.

In Lomax v. Lomax, 11 Ves. Jr. 48, 8 Revised Rep. 84, where a petition was presented for maintenance out of the interest of a legacy to the children of testator's daughter, to be vested when the youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years, Lord Eldon refused the application, saying: "If all die under twenty-one and a child not yet in existence should come into existence and attain that age, that child clearly would take the whole interest as well as the principal. Therefore I may [not] give it to these children who may never become entitled to it."

In Errington v. Chapman 12 Ves. Jr. 20, where legacies with interest were given to grandchildren on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, with a gift over in case neither attained that age, maintenance was refused, though it appeared that the father was unable to furnish it.

But compare, with the three cases last preceding, Mole v. Mole, 1 Dick. 310; Seibert's Appeal, 19 Pa. 49; and Leiby's Appeal, 49 Pa. 182, ubi supra.

Where there is a devise over, the court will not direct an allowance for the maintenance and education of a minor to be made out of the fund to which he is to become entitled at majority. Re Potts, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 340.

Where there is a gift over in case of the death of legatees before becoming of age, an allowance will not be made, although they are in straitened circumstances. Miles v. Wister, 5 Binn. 477. In this case the court said: "The word 'share' will very properly comprehend the aggregate sum of principal and interest, and I cannot conceive any reason why the testator should intend to separate one from the other in the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

787, quoting from Marsh v. Reed, 184 Ill. 263, 56 N. E. 306, the supreme court of Illinois, having under consideration the validity of a ninety-year lease of premises by a trustee in respect of which the testator had stipulated in his will "that no lease or demise shall be for a longer term or period than ten years," said: "The donor clothed the trustee with authority to rent the property and to collect the rents therefrom during the continuation of the trust, and in so doing placed a limitation upon the duration of any lease of the property to be made by the trustee. The effect of the decree is to enlarge the powers of the trustee in this respect, leaving the subject-matter of the trust in all other respects unimpaired. In other words, the decree devise over. That being the case, it would be a manifest violation of the will, to order the payment of the interest to any of the legatees during their minority; it would be paying to one person what, in case of death during minority, was directed by the testator to be paid to another. The withholding the interest may be extremely inconvenient to the legatees, who appear to be pinched for a living, though not entirely destitute of support. But they must remember that their relation from whose bounty these legacies flow had a right to direct the course of them."

It is essential to the granting of an application for maintenance and education that the infant should have such an absolute title or interest in the trust or its income that the right of no other person will be affected by the allowance. Unless he has such an interest, the consent of any person entitled in remainder, whose estate may be diminished in value by the allowance, must be had before the application will be entertained. Pitts v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. 21 R. I. 544, 48 L.R.A. 783, 79 Am. St. Rep. 821, 45 Atl. 553.

So, also, in Re Davidson, 6 Paige, 136; Re Ryder, 11 Paige, 185, 42 Am. Dec. 109; and Deen v. Cozzens, 7 Robt. 178, it was held that the court has no power to allow maintenance to infants out of a fund which may, on the happening of a contingency, belong to some other person.

Where the interest of minor remaindermen in a trust estate is a contingent one, equity will not make an allowance to them for their maintenance and education from the trust estate during the existence of the life tenancy. Ruggles v. Tyson, 104 Wis. 500, 48 L.R.A. 809, 79 N. W. 766, 81 N. W. 367.

In some cases maintenance has been allowed where there was a direction for accumulation of income during the minority of infants, with a gift over in case none attained full age (Greenwell v. Greenwell, 5 Ves. Jr. 194; Cavendish v. Mercer, 5 Ves. Jr. 195, note, 5 Revised Rep. 27; and Fendall v. Nash, 5 Ves. Jr. 197, note); though Lord Chancellor Loughborough in the case does not defeat the trust, but was entered upon the theory that its provisions were necessary to carry into execution the design of the donor. The requirement that the leasing should be for periods not longer than ten years was, no doubt, dictated by the belief of the donor that the rental value of the property would increase, and that short terms of letting the property for rent would best conserve one of the ends he designed to secure; namely, to provide an income for his wife and his children. The business judgment of the donor was no doubt correct at the time, but in this instance, as is so frequently true in other cases, it is demonstrated that it is not within the power and judgment of man to infallibly anticipate future events and direct that which shall be the wiser course to be pursued in after years. The question being one which relates merely to the better or more judicious mode of managing and controlling the subject-matter of the trust in order that the design and wishes of the donor may be more completely accomplished, the stringent rule which properly obtains when the application is to divest the trustee of title to the property which is the subject-matter of the trust and vest such title in direct opposition to the will of the donor ought not to be given full application."

In Knorr v. Millard, 52 Mich. 542, 18 N. W. 349, it was held that, where a bequest is contingent upon the coming of age of the first cited observed that he feared it would be his will, and not the testator's.

But in Errat v. Barlow, 14 Ves. Jr. 202, 9 Revised Rep. 273, Greenwell v. Greenwell and Fendall v. Nash, supra, were disapproved by Lord Eldon, who states: "The result is that if the chance of surviving [among several children] is equal among all, and no other interest that upon any contingency would take effect would be defeated, maintenance shall be allowed out of the interest; but it is impossible to give it where, in any event, under the operation and construction of the will, that interest may possibly belong to other persons."

But the court will decree an allowance for the education of beneficiaries out of a trust estate directed to be accumulated, where, although there is an executory limitation over in event of death of any of the beneficiaries without issue before the time fixed for enjoyment, they compose a class some of whom will absolutely take the fund, and all have an equal chance of taking or surviving. Newport v. Cook, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 332.

Wherever children born and to be born have a common interest in a fund, the fund if necessary may be applied for the maintenance of the children. Haley v. Bannister, 4 Madd. Ch. 275, 20 Revised Rep. 299.

And in Ex parte Kebble, 11 Ves. Jr. 604, 8 Revised Rep. 250, Lord Eldon said: "The case in which maintenance has been allowed, though not given by the will, is where there are children some or one of whom must take the property and all have an equal chance by surviving and a present interest, but cannot be done if there is a gift over; or if the children are not all the persons among whom it is to go."

So, also, in Knorr v. Millard, 52 Mich. 542, 18 N. W. 349, where testator directed that a bequest to the children of a certain person or their survivors should be placed at interest by the executor and equally divided when they became of age, the children of any child dying under age to receive their parent's share, it was held that advances from the accumulation so provided for, if necessary for the support of the beneficiaries, might be made by the court on proper application. It was said: "But inasmuch as these bequests are not contingent except as to time of payment, and as the chances of all the children are equal, the power has been recognized in the court of chancery, in its administration of trusts, to provide for making necessary advances out of the income when the infants are otherwise likely to suffer, even where by the terms of the trust itself an accumulation is contemplated. . . . Our statutes have expressly provided for the application of this same doctrine to trusts in land. Comp. Laws § 4106 [How. Stat. § 5556]. We see no reason why, on a proper original application to the circuit judge sitting in equity, on a petition with sufficient showing, he may not, if in his opinion the exigency warrants it, give such relief as will be proper, under such safeguards and conditions as will secure its honest use."

An allowance necessary for the maintenance of an infant may be ordered by a court of equity out of the income of a trust in the residue of an estate, created by a will giving the trustee discretion to apply a portion of such income to the education of the infant, but making no provision for his maintenance, where the mother of the infant is the only other person entitled to any other part of the income, and she joins in a request for the allowance. Pitts v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. 21 R. I. 544, 48 L.R.A. 783, 79 Am. St. Rep. 821, 45 Atl. 553.

If there is a clear intention to be gathered from the whole will that the beneficiary is to have maintenance, the court will order it, although there is a gift over. Longwith v. Riggs, 123 Ill. 258, 14 N. E. 840. In this case the beneficiary was a feeble-minded daughter of the testator, for whom he devised a share in his estate in trust to apply the annual income therefrom to her support, further providing that upon her death the estate bequeathed to her should be equally divided among the other children.

The power of a court of equity to provide for the maintenance and education of an infant beneficiary out of a trust fund where no provision therefor has been made by the creator of the trust is in some legatee, a court of equity has power to provide advancements out of the income where a minor beneficiary is about to suffer, and and this although the trust itself contemplates an accumulation until such beneficiary comes of age the court saying: "We see no reason why . . . [the court] sitting in equity on a petition, with sufficient showing, . . . may not, if in . . . [its] opinion the exigency warrants it, give such relief as will be proper." See also, Re Potts, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 340; Re New [1901] 2 Ch. 534, 85 L. T. N. S. 174, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 710, 50 Week. Rep. 17; 39 Cyc. 316, 443.

As we conceive the true rule to be, indicated above, the court will only so direct a use of such income in behalf of a beneficiary where an exigency, nonexistent at the creation of the trust, has arisen, which exigency is one not then anticipated by the testator; for, if the testator saw or foresaw the plight of his beneficiary, and yet intended that his gift should be withheld until she matured in age, we would deem it to be beyond the power of the court to alter a purpose thus declared.

In dismissing the bill on the chancellor's construction of clause 5 of the will, without referring the case to the master for precedent proof and report as was prayed by complainant the court below erred. Reversed and remanded.

jurisdictions expressly affirmed and extended by statute.

In England, an act known as Lord Cranworth's act was passed in 1860, being 23 and 24 Vict. chap. 145, § 26, which provides: "In all cases where any property is held by trustees in trust for an infant, either absolutely or contingently on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, or on the occurrence of any event previously to his attaining that age, it shall be lawful for such trustees, at their sole discretion, to pay to the guardians (if any) of such infant or otherwise to apply for or towards the maintenance or education of such infant the whole or any part of the income to which such infant may be entitled in respect of such property, whether there be any other fund applicable to the same purpose, or any other person bound by law to provide for such maintenance or education or not."

This provision was superseded and extended by the conveyancing and property act (44 and 45 Vict. chap. 41) section 43 of which provides: "Where any property is held by trustees in trust for an infant, whether for life or for any greater interest, and whether absolutely or contingently on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, or on the occurrence of any event before attaining that age, the trustees may at their sole discretion pay to the infant's parent or guardian (if any), or otherwise apply for or towards the infant's maintenance, education, or benefit the income of that property or any part thereof, whether there is any other fund applicable to the same purpose or any person bound by law to provide for the infant's maintenance or education or not. . . . This section applies only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the instrument under which the interest of the infant arises, and shall have effect subject to the terms of that instrument and to the provisions therein contained."

Such "a contrary intention" is not evidenced by a direction to accumulate the income of an infant's trust fund, such direction being held to be intended to preserve the income, and not to prevent the application of it to their benefit if necessary. Re Thatcher, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 426, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1050, 32 Week. Rep. 679.

In New York, it is provided by statute that where the rents and profits of real estate or the income of personal property are directed to be accumulated for the benefit of a minor, when such minor shall be destitute of other means of support or education the supreme court at special term, and, where such accumulation has been directed by a last will and testament, the surrogate court of any county in which such last will and testament has been admitted to probate, upon the application of such minor or his guardian, may direct a suitable sum out of the moneys accumulated to be applied for his support or education.

This provision was applied in Re Fritta, 19 Misc. 402, 44 N. Y. Supp. 344, where a will was construed as creating a trust for the accumulation of the rents and profits of an estate during the minority of the devisee.

And in Re Wagner, 81 App. Div. 163, 80 N. Y. Supp. 785, this statutory provision was held applicable notwithstanding a gift over in event of the death of the beneficiary before arriving at the age of twenty-one years; the court basing its conclusion upon the circumstance that under the provisions of the New York statutes a direction to accumulate, to be valid, must be for the benefit of an infant and terminate at or before the expiration of the minority, so that in any event the infant must be entitled to the income.

A like conclusion was reached in Re Lehman, 2 App. Div. 531, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1086, although the will contained a gift over in event of the death of the legatee during minority.

While the power of courts of equity to hasten enjoyment of a trust fund is most frequently exercised for the benefit of infants, it has also been exercised in other cases where the exigencies of the situation have seemed to demand it.

In Pennington v. Metropolitan Museum of Art, 65 N. J. Eq. 11, 55 Atl. 468, a testator had given real and personal property in trust to apply the income therefrom (1) to the payment of all taxes and assessments and other impositions upon the trust fund; (2) to the payment of $500 annually to each of two persons as long as he should live; (3) to use and apply the remainder in improvements upon the real estate held in trust, and, if there should still remain a balance, to pay it to the Metropolitan Museum of Art for the purpose of founding or increasing an endowment fund. Upon the death of the longest liver of the two annuitants, the entire trust estate was given to the Metropolitan Museum. The income of the whole fund having become insufficient to discharge the annual taxes imposed upon the real estate in the trust, and there being no reason to anticipate that the income would thereafter become sufficient to pay the taxes and other impositions, thereon, the Metropolitan Museum, upon a bill for relief filed by the trustees respecting the disposition and management of the trust fund, joined with the trustees in praying that it might be put in immediate possession of the real estate in the trust, undertaking to exonerate the trustees thereafter from the payment of any taxes, etc., thereon. It appeared that if the trustees could be relieved from the burden arising from the requirement to pay the impositions on the real estate included in the trust, the income from the personality included therein would not only suffice to pay the annual legacies, but would leave a large surplus. The value of the trust estate was so large that it was clear that the testator's sole purpose could not be to secure the annual payment of the comparatively paltry sums given to the annuitants; but in probability he contemplated that the income from the personal estate and such of the real estate as produced income would always be sufficient to satisfy the primary charges imposed thereon and the annual sums directed to be paid, and that his purpose was to keep the nonimproved and nonincome-producing real estate in the trust until its termination, when the ultimate beneficiary would receive it with the benefit of the unearned increment. To grant the prayer that immediate possession of the real estate might be given would, therefore, effect a change in the scheme of the trust as devised by the testator. It was held that if the testator did not anticipate and provide for the income being exhausted by the impositions upon the real estate, and if by a change of the scheme of the management of the trust the benefits intended for the annuitants and the residuary beneficiary might be carried out, a court of equity, with the consent of the latter, had the power to direct and instruct the trustees to so change the scheme of the trust as to effectuate the testator's intention. The court said: "It cannot, however, be open to doubt that a court of equity, in dealing with trusts, has a right to break in upon and thwart the expressed will of the creator of the trust in some cases. A notable example of such a case is 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

when the trustee, to whom the creator of the trust has expressly given power of management and control, becomes incompetent, or is misconducting himself, to the peril of the trust and those interested therein, this court has never hesitated to remove such a trustee and to substitute its own appointee. The reason for such action is evidently necessity, and its purpose is to carry out the expressed intention of the creator of the trust, which intention is imperiled if his appointment of a trustee cannot be revoked for good reasons, and a trustee substituted by the decree of the court. If trustees disclose a situation of their trust in which a slavish adherence to the terms of the trust will operate to wholly prevent the benefits intended by its creator, and they seek instructions and directions as to their duty, I think that instruction and directions for a course of conduct which, though differing from that prescribed by the terms of the trust, will actually carry out the intent of the creator, may well be grounded upon and sustained by the necessity of the case. The benefits intended for the beneficiaries are the main subjects of consideration. The modes in which those benefits may be attained are incidental, and necessity may require a change of mode to produce the intended effect. The power of the court may well be exercised in a case of evident necessity. How far it may extend on other grounds need not be considered. It is not improper to add that I should find extreme difficulty in applying even the doctrine of necessity to a case where the creator of the trust has plainly disclosed an intent to limit the benefit he intended, by an adherence to a course of conduct expressly mapped out, in the management of the trust. In the present case, if we assume that the testator contemplated a situation such as now confronts the trustees, and made express provision for it, how could it be maintained that any necessity existed requiring the court to direct the trustees to take another course of conduct on the mere ground that it would be more beneficial than that course which the testator prescribed?"

In Re Colson, Kay, 133, 2 Eq. Rep. 257, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 155, 2 Week. Rep. 111, where a testator created a trust in certain personal property, to continue for sixty years, or, if the law would not allow that, then during the lives of his two sons, and of the survivor, and for a further period of twenty-one years, the income of which was to be used in keeping in repair property devised to his sons in tail, and further directed that the surplus income should be paid to the person who should for the time being be in possession of such property under the devise in his will during the continuance of the trust, and after the expiration thereof he directed the trustees to pay over the trust fund, one half to the person then in possession of each of the farms devised, provided that such persons were one of his sons or a descendant of one of his sons, and, if not, then he gave it over.

The sons by joining with their eldest sons in a disentailing deed having cut off the entail, it was held that as the testator intended that whoever took the estates for an absolute interest should have the fund as well, and the law having enabled the parties to accelerate the interest in the real estate, the enjoyment of the fund must be accelerated also.

Where there is an absolutely vested gift made payable at a future event, as upon the legatee's attaining a certain age, or upon the decease of an annuitant, with a direction to accumulate the income in the meantime and pay it with the principal, the court will not enforce the trust for accumulation, in which no person has any interest but the legatee. Wharton v. Masterman [1895] A. C. 186, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 369, 11 Reports, 169, 72 L. T. N. S. 431, 43 Week. Rep. 449; Saunders v. Vantier, 4 Beav. 115; Josselyn v. Josselyn, 9 Sim. 63; Rocke v. Rocke, 9 Beav. 66; Gosling v. Gosling, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 265, 5 Jur. N. S. 910; Coventry v. Coventry, 2 Den. & S. 470, 13 L. T. N. S. 83, 13 Week. Rep. 985; Re Jacob, 29 Beav. 402.

This principle is as applicable where the legatee is a charity as where he is an individual. Wharton v. Masterman [1895] A. C. 186, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 369, 11 Reports, 169, 72 L. T. N. S. 431, 43 Week. Rep. 449.

It is difficult to tell whether this doctrine is based upon the idea that the postponement of enjoyment is invalid for repugnancy to the gift, or whether it is simply an exercise of the power of equity over the trust. The former idea seems to have been entertained by the vice chancellor in Gosling v. Gosling, Johns. V. C. (Eng.), 265, who said: "The principle of this court has always been to recognize the right of all persons who attain the age of twenty-one to enter upon the absolute use and enjoyment of the property given to them by a will, notwithstanding any directions by the testator to the effect that they are not to enjoy it until a later age,—unless, during the interval the property is given for the benefit of another. If the property is once theirs, it is useless for the testator to attempt to impose any fetter upon their enjoyment of it in full so soon as they attain twenty-one. And upon that principle, unless there is in the will, or in some codicil to it, a clear indication of an intention on the part of the testator, not only that his devisees are not to have the enjoyment of the property he has devised to them until they attain twenty-five, but that some other person is to have that enjoyment,—or unless the property is so clearly taken away from the devisees up to the time of their attaining twenty-five as to induce the court to hold that, as to the previous rents and profits there has been an intestacy,—the court does not hesitate to strike out of the will any direction that the devisees shall not enjoy it in full until they attain the age of twenty-five years."

But where the testator has devised his estate in trust for all his children to be accumulated for fifteen years, the court will not direct the trust fund to be paid over to the beneficiaries who are or who shall become of age, on the ground that one of the sons has no trade or profession by which to live and no means, and one of the daughters is a widow, with a family of small children, and without means except as may come to them through the estate; although it may, on a proper case being made out, order the trustee to anticipate the time of payment under the will so far as it may be shown to be necessary for the maintenance of the devisees. Rhoads v. Rhoads, 43 Ill. 239.

Where an accumulation of a trust fund for a charitable purpose is directed, the courts will interpose to prevent an unreasonable accumulation. See Brigham v. Peter Bent Brigham Hospital, 67 C. C. A. 393, 134 Fed. 513; Girard Trust Co. v. Russell, 102 C. C. A. 592, 179 Fed. 446; Duggan v. Slocum, 34 C. C. A. 676, 63 U. S. App. 149, 92 Fed. 806; Woodruff v. Marsh, 63 Conn. 125, 38 Am. St. Rep. 346, 26 Atl. 896; Odell v. Odell, 10 Allen, 1; St. Paul's Church v. Atty. Gen. 164 Mass. 188, 41 N. E. 231.

To authorize interference by a court of equity with an accumulation directed by a testator for a charitable purpose, the accumulation should be unreasonable, unnecessary, and to the public injury. It is not enough that the trustees are not desirous to continue it, or that anyone in behalf of the charity asks that it be not continued. The court must be satisfied that there is a good cause why the testator's directions should not be carried out. St. Paul's Church v. Atty. Gen. 164 Mass. 188, 41 N. E. 231.

In Biddle's Appeal, 99 Pa. 525, where a testator devised his estate in trust to permit a certain person to occupy certain premises during her lifetime, and out of the income of the rest of his estate to pay insurance, taxes, and divers annuities, and after the death of the life tenant and of the annuitants to convey and transfer the whole estate, with the accumulations, to a charity, the court refused to sanction a transfer, before the death of the life tenant and the annuitants, of the residue remaining after setting aside a fund the interest whereof was sufficient to pay such taxes, insurance, and annuities. The court said: "Why, then, shall the clear and explicit directions of the testator be disobeyed? His right to postpone the time when the hospital shall enjoy the fruit of his bounty cannot be denied. It is not in conflict with any principle of public policy, of religion, or morality, and does not impinge on any statute. Full effect must therefore be given to the clear intent of the will. Bainbridge's Appeal, 97 Pa. 482. Reasons satisfactory to the testator induced him to withhold all aid from the hospital until the time when the whole trust of the executors was to be determined. In giving construction to this will, we need not seek for the motive of the testator. It was not necessary for him to state it, and he has not. His beneficiaries have no right to inquire his reasons for giving at once to some, and after a long interval, to others. He may have thought it for the best interests of the hospital to withhold his aid until he could give it the whole residuary fund of his large estate. He may have thought its future necessities would be greater than the present. In the absence of reasons stated by him, we must not conjecture some, and thereby prevent the reasonable and natural meaning of the language used. As was said in Bainbridge's Appeal, supra, the testator may have thought, as the good man of the honest house said to the laborer who complained of the inequality of the payment, is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? It is of no consequence that we may think the testator might well have given a portion of his estate to the hospital on his death, or at some earlier period of time, than expressed in his will. He thought otherwise, and the opinion of others as to what he ought to have done cannot be substituted for what he did do."

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

MOBILE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY,
App't.,

v.

MRS. SALLIE D. MORELAND.

(— Miss. —, 61 So. 424.)

Damages — punitive — refusal to permit passenger to leave train.

Punitive damages may be awarded against a railroad company which refuses to stop a train upon request at a flag station at which a passenger is entitled to alight.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wayne County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's refusal to permit plaintiff to leave its train at her destination. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Carl Fox, for appellant:

By reason of an inadvertent failure to stop a train at a station where a passenger has a right to disembark, the railroad company does not lose all of its rights with respect to the running of the train.

Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Hardie, 100

Miss. 132, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 740, 55 So. 42, 967.

It is not required to stop between stations.

Mississippi & T. R. Co. v. Gill, 66 Miss. 39, 5 So. 393.

Mr. J. M. Boone, also for appellant:

Where the act is done without any bad intention, there is no ground under which punitive damages can be awarded.

Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Hoeflich, 62 Md. 300, 50 Am. Rep. 223, 8 Am. Neg. Cas. 348; Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Hardie, 100 Miss. 132, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 740, 55 So. 42, 967; Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Lowry, 100 Miss. 860, 57 So. 289.

Messrs. Heidelberg & Heidelberg for appellee.

Cook, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Shubuta and Boyce are two near-by villages, situated on the railroad of appellant. Plaintiff below, appellee here, purchased a ticket at Shubuta which entitled her to carriage from that station to Boyce, and then embarked upon one of appellant's passenger trains. This ticket was delivered to the conductor of the train. Boyce was a flag station, at which the trains did not stop to take up passengers unless flagged; but tickets were sold from other stations to Boyce, and whether it was a flag station, or a station at which all trains stopped, can have no significance in this case, as appellee had the same right to have the train upon which she had taken passage stopped long enough for her to disembark, as she would have had had her destination been a regular stop. When the train reached Boyce, appellee, discovering that she was being taken by her station, immediately informed the flagman that she had a ticket to Boyce, and asked that the train be stopped. The flagman replied that he would not stop the train. Appellee insisted, telling him that she was anxious to stop in order that she might send her daughter to Shubuta to take her place at the bedside of a grandchild, then dangerously ill. The flagman still declined to stop the train, but leisurely left the coach, apparently in search of the conductor, and soon thereafter the conductor came into the coach, where he found appellee in tears and much distressed. Appellee besought the conductor to stop the train, telling him also, why she desired to reach her daughter immediately. The conductor also refused to stop the train, because, in his opinion, he would by doing so violate the laws of the state.

Appellee then said that she would see if something else could not be done, and, according to her testimony, the conductor "sneeringly" said, "You can sue the company." Appellee was carried on to the next station and furnished transportation back to Boyce, after having remained at this station about three hours. It appears from the evidence of the conductor that he could have stopped the train when requested in about one-half minute. The excuse given for failure to stop the train at Boyce was inadvertence and forgetfulness. It seems that the conductor at first denied that appellee had a ticket, but, discovering his error, he finally admitted the fact. In this state of the record, the trial court by its instructions authorized the jury to find exemplary damages. The verdict of the jury was for plaintiff, assessing her damages at $500.

The instruction authorizing the jury to find punitive damages is complained of by appellant, and Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Hardie, 100 Miss. 132, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 740, 742, 55 So. 42, 967, is relied on for a reversal. Without commenting on this case, we think it is easily distinguishable from the present case. In that case the passenger demanded that the train be backed to the station, and the court decided, for the reasons given in the opinion, that she did not have the right to make this demand under the circumstances disclosed by the record. Whether the court correctly announced the law in that case is not now before us, as in this case the passenger merely preferred the reasonable request that she be permitted to get off the train, and she did not even demand that she be put off at the place where the company contracted with her to stop its train long enough for her to alight with safety. The record shows that appellee's rights under her contract of carriage were entirely ignored, and when an opportunity was offered appellant's servants to right the wrong they capriciously and orsually declined to make amends.

It is insisted that there was an utter absence of evidence to establish any inference of insult; and while we do not concur with appellant's counsel in this contention, we think under the undisputed facts of this case the refusal of appellant's servants to comply with appellee's reasonable demand, courteously made, was tantamount to a wilful and wanton disregard of appellee's contractual rights and defendant's plain duty as a common carrier of passengers.

Affirmed.

Landlord and tenant — cropper — abandonment of crop — effect.

A cropper forfeits all interest in the crop by voluntarily abandoning it without reasonable cause or excuse.

Note. — Tenant's or cropper's abandonment of crop as affecting rights and interests therein.

I. Introduction, 53.

II. Voluntary abandonment.

a. Croppers, 53.

b. Tenants.

1. Rights of landlord or tenant in general, 55.

2. Rights as against purchaser, creditor, or lienor, 56.

c. Miscellaneous, 58.

III. Involuntary abandonment, 59.

I. Introduction.

This note includes cases of voluntary and involuntary abandonment, in other words, cases where the cropper or tenant was ejected, as well as where he voluntarily abandoned the crop or premises. It does not, however, deal with the general question of "away going" crops or emblements, where the question was as to the tenant's right to growing crops upon his leaving the premises at the expiration of his term. Cases of tenancies at will are also excluded, the same being included in a note to Evans v. Watkins, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 404, on right of tenant at will to crops. The note does not deal with the question of the respective rights of a tenant and purchaser of the premises at foreclosure or execution sale, except where it appeared that the sale was followed by an abandonment or eviction of the tenant.

Upon the question in general as to the right to emblements as between landlord and tenant, see notes to Lafferty v. Schuykill River East Side R. Co. 3 L.R.A. 124, and Batterman v. Albright, 11 L.R.A. 800.

As to measure of damages for forcing cropper from premises, see note to Crews v. Cortez, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 714.

II. Voluntary abandonment.

a. Croppers.

As to relation of a cropper to the landowner, i. e., as servant or tenant, see note to Bourland v. McKnight, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 698.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Charleston County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover a share in a crop which had been raised by plaintiff on defendant's land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edwin J. Blank, for appellant:

Plaintiff was a mere laborer in the employ of the defendant, and he had no interest in the crop.

Carpenter v. Strickland, 20 S. C. 1; Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C. 82, 40 Am. Rep. 680.

Mr. F. F. Herndon for respondent.

Hydrick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought this action to recover the value of his share of a cotton crop raised on defendant's land, and also the value of certain small crops which belonged to him individually. He alleged that defendant compelled him to leave his place in August, and refused to allow him to gather the crops, and that defendant had gathered and appropriated them to his own use. Defendant denied that he had compelled plaintiff to leave, and alleged that, having violated the terms of the contract, plaintiff abandoned the crop and left, and he was put to the expense of raising and harvesting it, and, after deducting said expense and plaintiff's indebtedness to him, there was nothing left of plaintiff's share.

There was sharp conflict in the testimony as to whose fault caused the breach of the contract. Defendant's attorney requested the court to charge: "It is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show by prepon-

In 12 Cyc. 979, a cropper is defined as one who, having no interest in the land, works it in consideration of receiving a portion of the crop for his labor; and it is said that if the language of the contract imports a present demise of any character, by which any interest in the land passes to the occupier, or by which he obtains the right of exclusive possession, the relation of the parties becomes that of landlord and tenant; but if the contract does not contain language importing a conveyance of any interest in the land, or by its express terms the general possession is reserved by the owner, the occupant becomes a mere cropper; that a cropper has no legal possession of the premises further than as an employee, and that, before division, the whole crop is the property of the landowner, and the cropper has no legal title to any part thereof which he can assign or convey, or which can be subjected to the payment of his debts.

The rule laid down in SALLEY v. COX, that if a cropper, without reasonable cause, voluntarily abandons a crop, he loses all interest therein, is supported by the decision in Thigpen v. Leigh, 93 N. C. 47, where the point in issue was whether one who had an agricultural lien upon the crop for advances to the cropper could recover from the landowner, who had cultivated and marketed it after its abandonment, a balance remaining after deducting the rent and expenses of caring for the crop; and it was held that since, by his advances, the plaintiff acquired no right of property in the crop, but only the right to have his advances repaid out of the cropper's share, and the cropper had lost all interest by his abandonment, there was nothing left upon which the lien could operate and out of which the demand could be satisfied, and therefore the lienor could not recover. The latter had declined an offer of the landowner to allow him to carry the crop to completion, but this is referred to only as showing that the justice of the case in this instance was also with the landowner. For a somewhat similar case, where the relation of the parties was that of landlord and tenant, see Wheat v. Watson, 57 Ala. 581, under "Tenants," infra.

But it has been held that where a cropper justifiably abandons a crop by reason of the landowner's refusal to comply with the contract, and the latter takes possession and disposes of the crop, he must account to the cropper for the value of his share. Young v. Gay, 41 La. Ann. 758, 6 So. 608, where the cropper abandoned the crop on account of the landowner's failure to advance money according to the contract for removing the crop, and it was held that the landowner who disposed of the crop, must account to the cropper for his share, determined in this instance according to the value of the crop as it stood in the field when the contract was terminated by the wrongful act of the landowner.

A farm hand who had agreed with the owner to work for a certain length of time, in consideration of a stated sum per month and the use of an acre of land, and who, after planting a crop upon the acre, leaves the service without cause, forfeits his interest in the growing crop. Butler v. Rice, 17 Hun, 406. It was held that the landowner was entitled to the crop, although, in a previous action by him against the laborer for damages for breach of contract, he had recovered for the seed and for work done upon the land in preparing it for the crop.

In the abstract reported in the case of Kenna v. Nugent, Ir. Rep. 7 C. L. 464, it was said that, "where the herd of the evicted tenant held as a part of his wages and had sown with oats and potatoes 3 roods of the evicted farm, . . . the evicted tenant was entitled to avail himself of these crops as emblements."

Since, until division, the landowner is the legal owner of the entire crop, he can recover in replevin that part of it which the cropper harvests and removes against his objection, where it has been cared for by him after abandonment by the cropper. Kelly v. Rummerfield, 117 Wis. 620, 98 Am. St. Rep. 951, 94 N. W. 649.

derance of evidence that he executed his part of the agreement as alleged in the complaint; and if he has failed to do so, or did not carry out and execute his part of the agreement, or voluntarily abandoned said crop, you must find for defendant." The court declined to charge this request, but charged, in response thereto, as follows: "If the plaintiff had a contract with the defendant and abandoned the crop, and made it necessary for the defendant to gather it, the defendant would be allowed to charge whatever it cost him to gather the crop. I will go to that extent and charge you that."

We think his Honor erred in so charging; for in the connection in which it was given, the instruction necessarily implied that, even though plaintiff voluntarily abandoned the crop, he would be entitled to share in the surplus, after payment of all expenses of gathering it. When a cropper voluntarily abandons a crop, without fault on the part of the landowner, he forfeits all interest therein. 12 Cyc. 981. A moment's reflection, in which the situation of the parties to such a contract is considered at its various stages, from the making to the completion thereof, will show that the rule announced by the circuit court might work great injustice to the landowner. Suppose, for instance, the cropper voluntarily abandons his crop and contract in the early spring, just after it is planted; under this ruling, the landowner would be compelled either to lose the fertilizer and seed which had been put into the ground, and, perhaps, also the use of his land and the stock and implements which he had procured and set apart for

b. Tenants.

1. Rights of landlord or tenant in general.

Where a tenant renting on shares unjustifiably abandons a growing crop, under circumstances which amount to a surrender or termination of the lease, he loses all interest in the crop. Kiplinger v. Green, 61 Mich. 340, 1 Am. St. Rep. 584, 28 N. W. 121; Preston v. Smallwood, 48 N. Y. S. R. 199, 20 N. Y. Supp. 504.

In Kiplinger v. Green, supra, the court said that the particular name or nature of the plaintiff's holding could make no difference in the law applicable to the case; that whether the contract was called a lease or a cropping agreement, its construction and its effect, as far as the plaintiff's claim to the crop was concerned, were the same; that whatever right he could legally claim must rest upon the provisions of the contract, and when he voluntarily abandoned the farm and forfeited the contract, he could no longer claim any rights under it; that there was no theory of the law under which one could recover a share of the crop under a contract which he had, upon his own motion, repudiated; and that when he abandoned the premises and surrendered the contract, the crop became a part of the land and went with it.

In Bettis v. Key, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 128 S. W. 1160, the rule was laid down that if it appears from the evidence, taken as a whole, that a tenant upon shares intended to abandon the crop, although he did not abandon the premises, the landlord had the right to enter and save the crop; and it was held accordingly that an instruction was error that, unless the contract gave the right of re-entry, the landlord had no right to enter the premises to work the crop, unless the tenant abandoned it and the premises, and by his acts and declarations clearly showed his intention to the landlord not to occupy further the premises and work the crop.

In Carpenter v. Jones, 63 Ill. 517, it was said that annual crops planted by a tenant whose tenancy is for an uncertain period are regarded in many respects as personal property, liable to become part of the realty if the tenant voluntarily abandons or forfeits possession of the premises.

Under a lease providing for a cash rent to be paid out of the first of the crop picked by the tenant, a landlord has the right, upon the tenant's abandonment of the crop at the commencement of the picking season, to gather and prepare it for market and deduct the expense of preserving it from waste and preparing it for market, as well as the rent. Fry v. Ford, 38 Ark. 246.

But it has been held that a landlord has no right to pick a tenant's crop without his consent, although the landlord is to receive a certain share of the crop as rent, and it is wasting and likely to be destroyed unless promptly gathered. Wadley v. Williams, 75 Ga. 272. It does not appear, however, that there had been a total abandonment by the tenant.

A landlord is not entitled to compensation for gathering his share of a crop, if it is through his own fault that the tenant fails to gather it. Garnett v. Jennings, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1712, 44 S. W. 382.

In Cunningham v. Skinner, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 97 S. W. 509, it was said that when the tenant abandoned the crop, the landlord had the right and authority to take charge of it, gather and market it, and apply the proceeds to an indebtedness due him from the tenant.

And in Myer v. Roberts, 50 Or. 81, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 194, 126 Am. St. Rep. 733, 89 Pac. 1051, 15 Ann. Cas. 1031, the court said that when the estate of a tenant is forfeited, or the tenancy terminated by some act of his, and the landlord re-enters, the tenant is not entitled to the growing crops, but they pass to the landlord with the title to the land. The issue in that case, however, was as to the rights of the landlord against one whose labor had matured the crop through the aid of an injunction wrongfully issued.

the use of the cropper, or employ other help and carry the crop to completion. Yet, if he did the latter, he would have to share the profits with the cropper, whose abandonment of his crop and breach of his contract were without cause or excuse. A different rule would apply if the abandonment was due to his misfortune or to some just cause; but where it is done voluntarily, and without reasonable cause or excuse, the cropper is certainly not entitled to share in the crop so abandoned.

It is but fair to the learned judge to say that the request above quoted was improperly presented, in that it was done orally, and in the midst of the charge, and therefore he had no opportunity whatever to consider it. Under the circumstances, he would have been fully justified in refusing to consider it at all.

The rule of court requires that requests to charge must be presented in writing, and before the argument begins. This was intended to give the trial judge opportunity to consider them during the argument to the jury. The rule also provides that, at the close of the argument, such additional requests as have been suggested by the course of the argument may be presented; and it would be proper for counsel, at the close of the charge, to present such additional requests as have been suggested by the charge, and that it is the proper time to call the attention of the court to errors or omissions in the charge which counsel reasonably suppose are due to in-

In Davis v. Eyton, 7 Bing. 154, 4 Moore & P. 820, 9 L. J. C. P. 44, it was held that a landlord who re-entered upon breach of a condition in a lease against incurring a debt upon which judgment should be rendered and execution issued was entitled to the growing crops, because the lease was forfeited by the tenant's own act.

If a tenant, after the expiration of his lease, expressly tenders to the landlord that part of the crop which remains unpicked, and declares his intention not to pick the same, and relinquishes his right thereto, he cannot afterward recover for it from the landlord, although the right of the tenant under some circumstances, to gather his crop after the expiration of the tenancy, is recognized. Huggins v. Reynolds, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 504, 112 S. W. 116.

Although, upon surrendering the premises before the end of a year, a tenant for cash rent who holds from year to year reserves a growing crop, he is not entitled to the same as emblements, where it matures after expiration of the year, the surrender is accepted, and the reservation is never assented to by the landlord. Hetfield v. Lawton, 108 App. Div. 113, 95 N. Y. Supp. 451.

The assignees of a bankrupt tenant, who refused to accept the lease, are entitled to a growing crop, where the lease provides that the tenant shall have a "going-off" crop "from the end or other sooner termination of said term." Ex parte Maundrell, 2 Madd. Ch. 315, Buck, Bankr. 83.

2. Rights as against purchaser, creditor, or tenant.

In Kiplinger v. Green, 61 Mich. 340, 1 Am. St. Rep. 584, 28 N. W. 121, while it was held that, by unjustifiably abandoning the premises and thereby forfeiting the lease, a tenant on shares lost all interest in a growing crop, the court said that, if one in good faith had purchased from the tenant his share of the crop before the surrender of the premises, he would have been entitled to harvest the crop under the tenant's agreement with the landlord, because of equities which the tenant could not assert after the rescission of the contract, the crop being considered, while the contract was in force, as personal property subject to sale or levy as such.

It has been held that one who purchases from a tenant a growing crop at a time when there has been no breach or forfeiture of a contract for cash rental acquires a valid title, although the tenant subsequently defaults and surrenders the premises to the landlord. Nye v. Patterson, 35 Mich. 413; Carney v. Mosher, 97 Mich. 554, 56 N. W. 935.

Where the landlord and tenant are tenants in common of a growing crop, the title of a purchaser of the tenant's share is not defeated by a subsequent agreement between the landlord and tenant terminating the lease, and providing that the landlord "shall retain all the crop." Crosby v. Woleben, 149 App. Div. 337, 134 N. Y. Supp. 328. The landlord was, however, allowed his expenses in harvesting and marketing the tenant's share.

In the absence of a forfeiture clause in a lease for noncompliance with its provision, a purchaser of a growing crop from a tenant, upon the latter's abandonment of the premises, acquires a valid title thereto, although the tenant has failed to do certain clearing which was the consideration for the lease. Dayton v. Vandoozer, 39 Mich. 749.

Where a tenant for a year sells a growing crop and surrenders possession of the premises to the landlord before the expiration of the year, the purchaser acquires no title if the crop is of such a nature that it does not mature until after the expiration of the term. Bain v. Clark, 10 Johns. 424. The ground of the decision, however is simply that a tenant for a fixed term, in the absence of special contract, has no right to emblements, and therefore that a purchaser from him acquires no title thereto.

In Enley v. Nowlin, 1 Baxt. 163, where a tenant upon shares, after the cultivation of the crop was completed, but before it was matured, sold his interest therein without the landlord's consent, and moved away, it was held that this was not a breach of the lease, so as to entitle the landlord, as advertence, oversight, and perhaps other causes. But the circumstances would be rare, indeed, which would warrant counsel in interrupting the judge while he is charging the jury, for such purpose.

Reversed.

Gary, Ch. J., and Watts and Fraser, JJ., concur.

Woods, J., dissenting.

The plaintiff, a share cropper on the land of the defendant in 1910, brought this action, alleging that about the 17th of August the defendant ordered him to leave the place and afterwards appropriated the entire crop to his own use. The defendant alleged: (1) "That plaintiff secretly disposed of a part of the crop, and, after being warned by the defendant not to repeat the performance, plaintiff abandoned said crop and disappeared without attending to the duties he assumed by agreement, and that defendant was put to the expense of raising and harvesting the crop;" and (2) "that, after deducting the costs and expenses of making and harvesting said crop, and the indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant, there was no profit to be divided, but, to the contrary, defendant sustained a loss." On the issues thus made, the plaintiff recovered judgment for $200, from which the defendant appeals.

The question of the rights of landowners and their croppers in their dealings with each other is interesting and important, be-against the purchaser, to the tenant's share in the crop.

A landlord who, contrary to the terms of the lease, is compelled to harvest his share of the crop, owing to the tenant's abandonment of the premises, is entitled to a lien for the value of his labor, upon the tenant's share as against a purchaser thereof, under a statute giving the landlord a lien for his rent upon all crops grown on the premises, since the labor in gathering the crop is a part of the rent which the tenant has agreed to pay. Secrest v. Stivers, 35 Iowa, 580.

It has been held that where a lease contains simply a condition against assignment thereof, a breach of the condition does not work a forfeiture of a growing crop so as to entitle the landlord thereto, as against one who, without actual knowledge of the condition, purchases the tenant's share, and at the same time takes an assignment of the lease. Collier v. Cunningham, 2 Ind. App. 254, 28 N. E. 341. The assignee was allowed to recover from the landlord the value of the share purchased, less the landlord's expenses in harvesting the crop, the landlord having evicted the assignee.

In Sallade v. James, 6 Pa. 144, where, after recovery of a judgment against him, the landlord rented land to a tenant for a term of two years at an annual rental payable in advance, and the tenant sowed a crop upon the land, but, pursuant to notice upon sale of the premises under the judgment, abandoned them at the end of the year, it was held that the purchaser was entitled to the growing crops.

Since the possessory right in the crop reverts to the landowner upon abandonment of the premises by a tenant renting on shares, a bill of sale of the crop from the tenant, which is not delivered to the vendee until after the abandonment, is within the statute of frauds rendering invalid a sale of personal property unless accompanied by possession. Maclary v. Turner, 9 Houst. (Del.) 281, 32 Atl. 325.

Upon abandonment of the premises, a landlord upon shares has a right to re-enter and harvest a crop in order to prevent its going to waste, and where his expenses in doing so exceed the market value of the crop, the tenant has no interest therein which his creditors can reach. Charles v. Davis, 59 Cal. 479.

In Shahan v. Herzberg, 73 Ala. 59, where the consideration appears to have been a cash rent, and the tenant voluntarily surrendered the premises to the landlord, to complete the cultivation and harvest of the crops, and to reimburse himself if possible for rent and advances, it was held that the tenant had no attachable interest in the crop, but that it passed to the landlord as an incident to the restoration to possession and to the termination of the tenancy.

Where the amount of the unpaid rent and the expenses of the landlord in completing cultivation and marketing a crop which has been mortgaged by a tenant and then surrendered to the landlord on account of arrears of rent, exceed the value of the crop, the mortgagee can recover nothing from the landlord. Clements v. Mathews, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 808, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 772.

Where there was a conflict in the evidence as to the circumstances under which a landlord on shares took possession of the land and harvested the crop, although he testified that the amount realized from the sale of the tenant's share was not sufficient to pay the costs of completing the leasing contract, it was held in Perry v. Beaupre, 6 Dak. 49, 50 N. W. 400, an action by a prior mortgagee of the tenant for conversion of the tenant's share, that there was no error in refusing to direct a verdict for the landlord, and in submitting the case to the jury.

Where a crop sowed upon rented land with the lessee's permission was abandoned by the sower, and harvested by the lessee after expiration of the lease, it was held that a creditor could not attach it as the property of the sower. Hall v. Shannon, 19 Mo. 401. The court said that, upon the abandonment of the land, the crop went with it as an incident; but that it was not necessary to decide whether or not the sower might not have an interest in the crop for the value of his services in planting it and for the seed.

cause a large part of the lands of the state is cultivated under contracts like the contract here involved.

According to the plaintiff's testimony, the agreement was that the defendant should furnish the land, the fertilizer, and live stock; that the plaintiff should cultivate and gather the crop, and that the crop should be equally divided. The only difference between the parties as to the contract was that the defendant testified that the plaintiff, in addition to cultivating and gathering the crop, was to pay $5 an acre rent. Taking the view of the contract most favorable to the appellant, it was a contract for the payment of wages in the form of a share of the crop, the plaintiff sustaining the relation to the defendant of a laborer for hire. The plaintiff had no right of property in the crop until it should be divided, and therefore could not maintain an action to recover his specific share before division, but did have the right to sue for breach of the defendant's contract to make a fair division and turn over his share of the crop. Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C. 82, 40 Am. Rep. 680; Carpenter v. Strickland, 20 S. C. 1; Loveless v. Gilliam, 70 S. C. 391, 50 S. E. 9. The action was therefore properly brought; and as the circuit judge charged, it necessarily involved an accounting between the plaintiff and the defendant as to their transactions under the contract.

The point mainly relied on to support the appeal is the refusal of the circuit

Where a tenant upon shares abandons the premises and surrenders the crop to the landlord, the latter has a right to sell it, and, as against an attachment creditor of the tenant, whose attachment was issued after the sale, may apply the proceeds to a debt due him from the tenant for advances and for preparing the crop for market. Gayle v. McDaniel, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 200.

Where a tenant for cash rent for a period of one year, with the privilege of three additional years, voluntarily abandons the premises before the expiration of the first year, upon their sale on execution against the landlord, he cannot recover from the purchaser for crops which matured after the expiration of the year, and which were harvested by the purchaser. Dircks v. Brant, 56 Md. 500. The court said the tenant occupied the same position as if the term had been only one year, and, in the absence of custom, he could not recover for out-going crops.

A case somewhat similar to Thigpen v. Leigh, 93 N. C. 47, under heading "Croppers," involving the rights of an agricultural lienor, is that of Wheat v. Watson, 57 Ala. 581, the decision, however, not going to the extent of that in the Leigh Case. In Wheat v. Watson, it was held that a lienor who had declared an offer by the landlord to take possession of a growing crop after abandonment of the premises by a tenant on shares could not attach it as the property of the tenant, the landlord having completed the cultivation. The court said that when the tenant abandoned the premises, it was not the duty of the landlord to let them remain unoccupied and unused, but that he might enter and occupy the property as owner; that it was proper for the landlord to offer the lienor the opportunity of taking the tenant's place, but it was not intended to say that the landlord was bound to do so, or that the lienor was bound to accede to the proposal. But it was not decided whether the lienor might not be entitled to a part of the value of the crops after they had been made and gathered, the court saying that if there remained a surplus besides the rent and expenses of completing the work, it might be that a claim upon this would arise in favor of the lienor.

In Beckwith v. Carroll, 56 Ala. 12, it was held that the expenses of a receiver in caring for a crop on land rented by a partnership, which certain members thereof were allowing to go to waste, should be taken out of the proceeds of the crop before payment therefrom of the landlord's rent; although the court said that, as between the landlord and the defaulting tenants, the latter were chargeable with such expenses.

In Bradford v. Roberts, 46 Colo. 330, 104 Pac. 391, it was held that a provision in a lease upon shares, that in case the lessee failed to do the necessary work, the lessor might do the same and deduct its cost or value from the lessee's interest in the crop, did not give the lessor a lien upon the lessee's interest for work done upon the lessee's abandonment of the farm, superior to the interest of a mortgagee whose rights were created prior to the abandonment.

c. Miscellaneous.

In the case of Reynolds v. Reynolds, 48 Hun, 142, the agreement under which the defendant cultivated upon shares the land of the plaintiff was held not to create the relation of landlord and tenant, and yet to constitute the parties tenants in common of the crop; and it was held that the defendant, by justifiable abandonment of the premises on account of the conduct of the plaintiff, although such conduct did not violate any express term of the agreement or amount to an expulsion, did not forfeit his interest in a growing crop. The court said that the plaintiff, by his action, justified the defendant in treating the contract as broken on the part of the plaintiff, and that the defendant could refuse a further performance on his part and abandon the premises without abandoning the contract; but it was also said that if the defendant had abandoned the premises without justification, the privity between him and the plaintiff would have been destroyed, and, as a legal consequence, the defendant would judge to charge the following request: "It is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show by preponderance of evidence that he executed his part of agreement as alleged in the complaint; and if he failed to do so, or did not carry out and execute his part of agreement, or voluntarily abandoned said crop, you must find for defendant." After refusing the request, the circuit judge said to the jury: "If the plaintiff had a contract with the defendant and abandoned the crop, and made it necessary for the defendant to gather it, the defendant would be allowed to charge whatever it cost him to gather the crop. I will go to that extent and charge you that; but, as I say, these are matters of everyday occurrence, that are peculiarly within your power to judge of. You are called upon to do justice between man and man, and you do that, and find a verdict accordingly."

The charge, I think, is well supported by both reason and authority. It is no doubt true that if a share cropper abandon the crop, or so behave as to incur a just discharge by the landlord, at the beginning of the crop year, the breach may be so complete as to warrant the landowner in rescinding, and declaring the contract and the cropper's rights under it at an end. But, on the other hand, if the crop be so advanced by the labor of the share cropper that his labor has been of material value to the landlord, the cropper does not forfeit all his share of the crop, but must submit to such deduction from his share have lost all title and interest in the growing crop.

In Harris v. Gregg, 17 App. Div. 210, 45 N. Y. Supp. 364, upon a concession to that effect, the parties were treated as tenants in common of a crop which the landlord converted after the tenant's abandonment of the farm, and on this ground the landlord was held liable for conversion of the tenant's share, although it was stated that if the plaintiff, in violation of his contract to work the farm upon shares, left it, he thereby lost his right to the emblements.

Where the contract of renting upon shares is such that the relation of landlord and tenant is not created, but the parties are tenants in common of the crop, an abandonment of the growing crop to the landowner does not entitle him to the entire crop, as against a prior mortgagee of the tenant's interest. Rogers v. Frazier, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 108 S. W. 727. The court said that when the renter abandoned the crop, the landlord had the right to take possession thereof, cultivate, gather, and prepare it for market, and to defray all necessary expenses incurred out of the renter's share; but that after setting aside his own share and a sufficient amount to pay his expenses in marketing the crop, the balance would be subject to the lien of the mortgage.

Under statute providing that leases created by parol shall have the force and effect of estates at will only, it was held in Chandler v. Thurston, 10 Pick. 205, that one who rented land upon shares by a parol contract, and absconded, leaving a growing crop, had no attachable interest therein; and that this was true whether the absconder be regarded as a mere laborer or as a tenant at will. The court said that the property in the crop followed the interest in the soil and became wholly vested in the landowner.

Upon the principle that where a tenancy for an uncertain period is terminated by the act of the tenant, he is not entitled to the growing crop as emblements, it was held in Talbot v. Hill, 68 Ill. 106, that a widow who, while in the possession of land of her deceased husband, sowed a crop thereon, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and subsequently joined in a suit for partition, and consented to a sale of the land and payment in lieu of dower, was not entitled as against the purchaser to the growing crop.

Upon the same principle, it was held in Bulwer v. Bulwer, 2 Barn. & Ald. 470, 21 Revised Rep. 358, that a parson who resigned a living was not entitled to growing crops.

And in Moyle v. Ewer, 2 Bulst. 183, it was said by Lord Coke that if a parson sows the ground and is afterwards deprived or resigns, if the corn is not severed at the time of his successor's coming in, he shall have the title.

In Dillon v. Wilson, 24 Mo. 278, the court said that if a widow in possession of land, rent free, sowed a crop and then married, there was no forfeiture of her lease or her crop; and if she afterward went and lived with her husband, that did not deprive her of her right to the crop; but that if the husband and wife abandoned the crop and gave it up to the landlord, and the husband afterward converted it to his own use, he would be liable in damages.

In Wicks v. Jordan, 2 Bulst. 213, it was said that if a widow who is to enjoy land during widowhood sows a crop, and afterward takes a husband, she will lose the corn, and the lord shall have it. To the same effect is Hawkins v. Skeggs, 10 Humph. 31, in which it was held that a widow to whom lands were bequeathed during her widowhood was not entitled to the crop growing thereon at the time of her marriage. In the latter case the court said that whenever an estate in lands is to be determined on a contingency, if that contingency happen by the act of God, or the adverse party, the tenant is entitled to all growing crops as emblements, but that the contrary rule prevails when the contingency happens from the act of the tenant in possession.

III. Involuntary abandonment.

As against a purchaser of a growing crop at execution sale against the tenant, a landlord who subsequently evicts the tenant and as will compensate the landlord for the injury inflicted by his breach. So, on the other side, if the landlord without good reason refuse to furnish any land or fertilizer, and thus entirely defeat the cropper's right to cultivate the land under the contract, he could recover of the landowner one half of the crop reasonably expected less any amount the laborer earned, or by reasonable efforts might have earned, during the crop year; and if the landlord should partially fail in his contract, but not to such degree as to warrant the laborer in considering it entirely breached, the laborer could not abandon the enterprise, but would have to proceed with his work, and recover from the landowner such damages as he had suffered from the partial breach. In any such case, it is always a question of fact for the jury to decide whether, under the evidence, a breach of the contract should be regarded final and complete, justifying the other party in treating the contract and his obligation under it at an end; or only such partial breach as to require that the party in default suffer an abatement from the consideration he was to receive, measured by the damage caused by the breach. This principle is stated and applied in Gray v. Handkinson, 1 Bay, 278; Martin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 70 S. C. 8, 48 S. E.

616; Godfrey v. E. P. Burton Lumber Co. 88 S. C. 132, 70 S. E. 396.

The rule has been applied as the just one in contracts between planters and overseers. As is well known, in former times overseers were usually employed for the entire year at a salary fixed for the entire year's service. The overseer's continuous service, like a share cropper's was important from the beginning to the end of the crop year; and his abandonment of the crop or misbehavior rendering his discharge necessary, like that of a share cropper often subjected the landowner to inconvenience and loss. In legal contemplation, the overseer's contract and that of the share cropper stand on the same footing, except that the overseer's wages were generally to be paid in money, while the share cropper gets as wages a part of the crop.

In Byrd v. Boyd, 4 M'Cord L. 246, 17 Am. Dec. 740, after much consideration the court laid down a rule, the justice of which is made manifest by the opinion of the court. In that case the overseer was discharged for using abusive language to his employer's daughter. Judge Huger charged the jury that, the contract being for the entire year, if the plaintiff had been properly turned away he ought to recover nothing, but if he had been turned off improperly he ought to recover the whole amount. The reasoning of Judge Johnson, harvests the crop without the purchaser's consent must establish the defense upon which he relies, that the tenant forfeited the lease before the sale, and that he, the landlord, thereby became entitled to the crop. Cheney v. Bonnell, 58 Ill. 268. The court said that the law does not favor forfeitures, and will not imply them from slight circumstances, but that they must be formally and clearly proved.

It was also held in Cheney v. Bonnell, supra, that the judgment in the proceedings to evict the tenant was not evidence of a forfeiture of the lease, where the record of the proceedings was not produced, and the oral evidence failed to show that there was any service on or appearance by the tenant.

Upon this principle, that forfeitures must be clearly proved, it was held in Sullivan v. O'Hara, 1 Ind. App. 259, 27 N. E. 590, that a tenant against whom judgment was rendered for the landlord in a suit to recover possession, and who left the premises, did not thereby lose his interest in a growing crop, where the judgment against him was not shown to be such as was necessary to effect a forfeiture and eviction for commission of waste, as claimed by the landlord, under a statute providing that in actions for waste judgment of forfeiture and eviction shall be given against the tenant in possession only when the injury to the estate in reversion is equal to the value of the unexpired term, or is done in malice. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And in Burket v. Miller, 25 Ind. App. 110, 55 N. E. 500, it was held that a judgment merely for possession of premises in an action of ejectment by a landlord against his tenant was not evidence in a subsequent action by the landlord against a third party to restrain the cutting of a growing crop, that title thereto was in the landlord.

In Hodgson v. Gascoigne, 5 Barn. & Ald. 88, it was held that after recovery in ejectment by a landlord against the tenant for arrears of rent, the tenant had no attachable interest in a growing crop planted by him subsequent to the commencement of the action. The court said that after the judgment in ejectment was obtained, the tenant should be considered in point of law as a trespasser from the date of the declaration in ejectment.

In Lane v. King, 8 Wend. 584, 24 Am. Dec. 105, it was held that a purchaser who took possession after foreclosure of a mortgage was entitled to a growing crop, as against a tenant who had knowledge of the mortgage at the time of the making of the lease.

A provision in a contract of lease that if the tenant "voluntarily or involuntarily" leaves the place, he shall forfeit the crop produced by him on the land, does not entitle the landlord to the crop, if, without the tenant's fault, he is forced by the landlord to leave the premises because he buys goods from a person other than the landlord.

in holding that, even if properly discharged, the overseer was entitled to recover for his services so far as they were beneficial to the landowner, is so clear and convincing, and so fully vindicates the charge of the circuit judge in the present case, that we quote from it at length: "The only ground necessary to be considered in this case is the supposed misdirection of the presiding judge in charging the jury that they were not at liberty, under any circumstances, to apportion the compensation of the plaintiff to the services actually rendered, and that they were bound to allow him the stipulated wages for the year or nothing. . . . The relation of employer and overseer is one which the state of the country renders almost indispensably necessary to every planter, and collisions do and must necessarily arise, and it is fit that there should be some settled rule on the subject. When the employer wantonly and without cause turns off his overseer, at a season of the year when it would be impracticable to get employment elsewhere, and his time is wholly lost, I should feel no hesitation in enforcing the rule rigidly, not only as a punishment, but as a just remuneration to the overseer; and so when the overseer abandons the employer without cause, or by his neglect inflicts a loss on him commensurate with the services which he has performed, he clearly deserves no compensation. There is, however, a third class of cases for which it is necessary to provide, and which are perhaps of the most common occurrence. They are those where the employer reaps the full benefit of the services which have been rendered, but some circumstance occurs which renders his discharging the overseer necessary and justifiable, and that perhaps not immediately connected with the contract, as in the present case. It happens frequently, too, that it becomes a question of great difficulty to ascertain with whom the first wrong commenced. I cannot reconcile it to my notions of natural justice that the overseer should not recover a compensation for the services, so far as they were directed, and which have been beneficial to the employer. And I am unable to discover any evil which is likely to result from submitting such a matter to the sound discretion of a jury of the country. As a matter of expediency I should be disposed to establish it as a rule. This conclusion is, I think, supported by the principle of the exception before noticed, and by the common case in which a party is permitted to prove by way of defense that, owing to some defect in the execution of the work and labor done and performed, the thing is not worth so much as was stipulated for; and the still more comprehensive principle

Williams v. Cocke, — Miss. —, 6 So. 774. The court said that the only "involuntary" leaving of the place, within the fair meaning of the term, must be construed to be an involuntary one forced upon the tenant by the landlord for good and sufficient cause; that, otherwise, the landlord would be the gainer by his own wrong.

In Hunter v. Jones, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 370, the general rule was laid down that a lessee who is ejected by his lessor for forfeiture of the lease on account of breach of a condition therein is not entitled to re-enter and gather a growing crop.

It has been held that where a tenant is ousted by a third party, his right and that of his landlord to the crop cease so far as the right is necessary to maintain an action of replevin for a crop harvested and removed by the party who enters; and that therefore they cannot maintain replevin; but if the entry was unlawful, they might maintain trespass quare clausum fregit, and after ejectment, recover for mesne profits. De Mott v. Hagerman, 8 Cow. 220, 18 Am. Dec 443.

As against a sublessee who, with knowledge that an action of ejectment is pending against the lessee, under a clause in the lease authorizing re-entry by the lessor in case the rent is not paid, sows a crop upon the land, the lessor is entitled to the crop upon being put into possession upon termination of the ejectment action in his favor, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

although at that time the crop has been harvested, but not removed from the premises. Sampson v. Rose, 65 N. Y. 411.

In Fagan v. Vogt, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 528, 80 S. W. 664, a tenant upon shares who had been evicted by his landlord before the expiration of the term recovered from the landlord the value of his share of the crop; and it was held, upon the principle that if one tortiously takes and converts the property of another, he cannot charge the rightful owner with the labor expended thereon whereby its value is increased, that the landlord was not entitled to charge the tenant with the cost of gathering the crop, which was to have been done by the tenant.

In Miller v. Havens, 51 Mich. 482, 10 N. W. 865, the court said that one who purchased a crop from a tenant, and whose rights were certainly not less than those of a sublessee, would be protected against a forfeiture afterward incurred by the tenant and a re-entry by the landlord. And it was held that a recovery of the land by the landlord through summary proceedings against the tenant was not a defense in an action by the purchaser against the landlord for the crop, where the tenant had no notice of the proceedings, and especially where the judgment appeared to be such that it might have been obtained upon other grounds than a breach of a condition in the lease that a partial failure of consideration is a good ground of defense. Cases of this description are of very frequent occurrence, and although this question has never been judicially determined, it may be clearly collected from them that the prevailing opinion is favorable to an apportionment. In some cases the jury have found the entire sum, but in most they have apportioned it when the circumstances justified it."

Again in M'Clure v. Pyatt, 4 M'Cord L. 26, the court said: "In the case of Boyd v. Byrd, decided at the last sitting in Columbia, which was an action by an overseer against his employer, the court determined after great deliberation that, although the contract was to pay a gross sum for the year's services, the jury might, when the parties had differed and separated before the end of the year, apportion the damages to the services actually rendered, if, upon a view of all the circumstances, that course was best calculated to effect substantial justice between them; and that case is referred to for the doctrine of law on the subject."

The authority of these cases was recognized in Eaken v. Harrison, 4 M'Cord L. 249, and Verner v. Sullivan, 26 S. C. 327, 2 S. E. 391.

Apply this established rule to the present case. When the plaintiff was discharged, or abandoned the crop, on August 17th, the season of cultivation was over, and nothing remained but the work of harvesting and preparing the crop for market. The loss to the defendant could not have been so complete as to warrant him in declaring a complete forfeiture of all the fruit of plaintiff's labor; but, under the rule above stated, it was for the jury to say what compensation the plaintiff ought to have, taking into consideration all the evidence of loss resulting to the landowner from his default. It seems to me clear that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

DUDLEY LUMBER COMPANY, Plff. in Certiorari,

v.

NOLAN BROTHERS LUMBER COMPANY FOR USE OF NATIONAL CITY BANK.

(— Tenn. —, 156 S. W. 465.)

Set-off — indorser of note — assigned claim of maker.

An indorser who, after notice of the assignment for value of an unmatured claim of the insolvent maker against himself, takes up the note which did not mature until after the assignment, may set off the amount against the claim in the hands of the assignee when it reaches maturity, under a statute permitting a defendant to plead in set-off between himself and the original party, under whom plaintiff claimed which by law has attached to the demand in plaintiff's hands and for which defendant would be entitled to recover against such original party.

(May 10, 1913.)

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a decree reversing a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County in defendant's favor in an action upon an account for lumber sold and delivered in which defendant sought to set off a note upon which he was liable as indorser for the vendor of the lumber. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jackson & McRee, for plaintiff in certiorari:

The debtor of an insolvent who assigns the obligation may set off, in the hands of the assignee, any indebtedness matured or unmatured, held by him against the assignor upon the day of the assignment.

Howe Sewing Mach. Co. v. Zachary, 2 Tenn. Ch. 478; Gregory v. Hasbrook, 1 Tenn. Ch. 220; Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 91 Tenn. 336, 15 L.R.A. 710, 18 S. A surety may proceed against an insolvent principal for indemnity before paying the debt upon which he is surety.

Miller v. Speed, 9 Heisk. 201; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Greer, 87 Tenn. 698, 4 L.R.A. 858, 11 S. W. 931.

The fact that the claim asserted as a set-off had not arisen at the time of the assignment will not prevent an equitable set-off, where it arises subsequently by operation of law or as the result of existing contracts.

Mr. H. R. Boyd for defendant in certiorari.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause is before this court on petition for writ of certiorari to the court of civil appeals to review a decree of that court reversing a decree in favor of the Dudley Lumber Company rendered by the chancery court of Shelby county. The case in the chancery court was heard upon an agreed statement of facts.

On March 24, 1910, Nolan Brothers Lum-insolvency proceedings upon right of set-off, see note in 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393.

As to the effect of immaturity of claim at the time insolvency occurs upon the right of set-off, see note in 17 L.R.A. 456; as to right to set off insolvent's obligation upon a claim in the hands of his receiver, or assignee, or trustee for creditors, see note in 23 L.R.A. 313.

At law—where surety discharges liability after commencement of suit on assigned claim.

At law an offset is generally limited to a subsisting obligation between the parties to the suit, and an assignee of a non-negotiable chose in action only takes subject to this right of offset as it existed at the time of the assignment and notice thereof to the debtor. Hence where the debtor is a surety for the assignor, even though the obligation was due at the time of the assignment, if he had not at that time paid same, he cannot, by subsequently making payment thereof, offset the amount paid, in an action at law against him by the assignee of the indebtedness to his principal.

Thus, in Cox v. Cooper, 3 Ala. 256, it is said that an offset to be good must be a subsisting demand at the time of the commencement of the action, and hence a surety has no right of set-off in so far as concerns his liability as surety, until he has discharged his obligation, and until that time, he cannot depend upon same as a set-off to a note payable to his principal and assigned to a third person, although he discharged his obligation as surety after the commencement of the action.

A demand to be available as a set-off in a court of law must be such as the defendant could, at the commencement of the suit, have made the foundation of a separate 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

independent action against the plaintiff. Hence a surety, discharging his obligation after the commencement of a suit against him by the assignee of his principal of a debt due the latter, has not a set-off available at law. Goldthwaite v. National Bank, 67 Ala. 549.

This doctrine is based upon the theory that the contingent liability of a surety is not a liability which he may use in offset to an action by the transferee of a note payable by him to his principal. Wood v. Steele, 65 Ala. 436.

The liability of a surety, being a mere contingent liability, is not sufficient, where nothing more exists at the date of the assignment by the principal of a claim against the surety and the former is solvent, to entitle the surety to offset as against the assignee the amount subsequently paid in discharge of his liability as surety. Follett v. Buyer, 4 Ohio St. 586.

A suretyship which was not discharged at the time of the assignment of a claim of the principal against the surety, nor at the time of the commencement of an action thereon by the assignee, is only a contingent liability, and does not constitute a demand held by the surety at the time of the commencement of the suit, within the meaning of a statute providing that "a set-off shall be allowed only in actions for money demands upon contract, and must consist of matter arising out of debt, duty, or contract, liquidated or not, held by the defendant at the time the suit was commenced, and matured at or before the time it is offered as a set-off." Eigenmann v. Clark, 21 Ind. App. 129, 51 N. E. 725.

Under a statute declaring that no demand shall be set-off, unless for the price of real or personal estate or for money paid, or ber Company executed its promissory note, payable to the Dudley Lumber Company, to mature May 24th. On April 29, 1910, the Dudley Lumber Company discounted this note with the Michigan Private Exchange Bank, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, indorsing the same. On May 10, 1910, the Nolan Company sold to the Dudley Company a bill of lumber to the amount of $577.24. On May 12, 1910, the Nolan Company, being insolvent at that time (as well as at the date of the execution of the note), assigned this account for lumber to the National City Bank of Memphis, and that bank on the same day gave due notice of the assignment. This account matured sixty days from the date of its creation. At the maturity of the note, May 24, 1910, the Nolan Company defaulted in payment, and the Dudley Company, under its obligation so to do as indorser, paid and took over the note. On July 10th, the date of the maturity of the account, the Dudley Lumber Company tendered the National City Bank the amount representing the difference between the account and the note, under a claim of a right to set-off as indorser thus forced to liquidate the note demand of the insolvent Nolan Company. The tender was declined by the bank, which brought suit in the name of the assignor on the assigned account.

The Dudley Company here assigns as error in the decree of the court of civil appeals the holding that it was not entitled money had and received, or for service done, or unless it is for a sum that is liquidated or that existed at the commencement of the suit and then belonged to the defendant, or unless it is due to him in his own right, an accommodation indorser or surety has no debt against the principal maker until he has paid the amount for which he is liable as surety or indorser, and if such payment is not made until after notice of an assignment of a debt owing to him by his principal, as against the assignee, he is not entitled to off-set payments subsequently made in discharging his obligation as surety. Backus v. Spalding, 129 Mass. 234.

And where a surety discharges his obligation after commencement of a suit against him by the assignee of a note payable to his principal, he cannot offset the amount so paid, and such payment constitutes no defense, in part or whole, to the action. Gildersleeve v. Caraway, 19 Ala. 246.

And right of offset at law is also denied a surety in Walker v. McKay, 2 Met. (Ky.) 294, who pays an obligation after he has notice that his principal has assigned a claim against him, on the theory that the set-off, to be available either in law or in equity, against an assignee, must have existed before notice of the assignment.

It is no defense at law by way of set-off to a suit by the indorsee of a note after maturity, that the maker of the note was the guarantor of a note executed by the indorser of the note in suit, although the note guaranteed is then over due and unpaid. Ligare v. Hayden, 51 Ill. App. 69.

A surety on a note must pay a judgment rendered thereon before he can offset same against the indorsee of a note made by him to his principal, although there was an agreement between himself and his principal prior to the transfer of his own note, that he should pay the note upon which he was surety and the amount thereof should be applied upon his own note. Billingsley v. Stratton, 11 Ind. 396.

Effect of express agreement for set-off.

The right of offset may be expressly stipulated for by a surety. In such case he may make the offset as against an assignee of the claim he owes the principal. Thus the maker of a non-negotiable note who guarantees notes of the payee under an agreement that he may offset against his note the amount he may have to pay by reason of his guaranty, where he is compelled to make good his guaranty, is entitled to make such offset against a transferee of his note although the transfer was made prior to his payment of his obligation as guarantor. Union Nat. Bank v. Hines, 177 Ill. 417, 53 N. E. 83. See Billingsley v. Stratton, supra.

Insolvency as entitling surety to offset at law.

It has been held that the assignee of a non-negotiable chose in action takes subject to the right of the debtor to offset the amount the latter is required to pay in discharge of a judgment rendered against him as surety for the assignor, where at the time of the assignment the latter was insolvent. Thompson v. McClelland, 29 Pa. 475. While, under the Pennsylvania practice, equitable defenses are admissible in actions at law, the court styles this set-off as a legal set-off.

In another jurisdiction, however, it is held that the fact that the principal was insolvent, and that his insolvency was known to the assignee of a claim against his surety at the time of the transfer, cannot confer upon the surety the right to set-off the amount paid by him in discharge of his obligation as surety in an action at law by the assignee, since the insolvency of the principal does not change the present rights of the parties, although it may render it more probable that the surety may, by payment, acquire some future claim against the assignor. Backus v. Spaulding, 129 Mass. 234.

to set off the note of the Nolan Company, so held by it, against the account.

It is contended that the insolvency of the Nolan Company, at the date of the assignment, makes a case for the application of the doctrine of equitable set-off, and that the Dudley Company, under the obligation of indorser at assignment date, was, prior to the account's maturity, compelled to pay the note, and is entitled to invoke that defense.

The debtor of an insolvent creditor, who has assigned for the benefit of creditors the obligation evidencing the indebtedness, may set off against the demand in the hands of the assignee any indebtedness, whether matured or unmatured, at the date of assignment. Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth

Nat. Bank, 91 Tenn. 336, 15 L.R.A. 710, 18 S. W. 822.

This right is based on the equity growing out of the insolvency of the assignor, at the time of the assignment; but the opinion in Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank indicates a distinction between the assignment where it is to a third party on purchase, as here, and where the assignment is one for the benefit of creditors. The court, in discussing the case of Spaulding v. Backus, 122 Mass. 553, 23 Am. Rep. 391, said that its "holding . . . is not necessarily inconsistent with the right of set-off as between the original parties, and appears entirely consistent with the decisions of this court that a right of set-off, to be so attached to the debt as to be available

Insolvency as entitling surety to equitable offset.

Insolvency by the weight of authority is held to be a distinct, equitable ground of set-off in favor of a surety as against an assignee of his principal, where the principal was insolvent at the time of the assignment, since under such circumstances the assignment gives to the assignee only the rights that the assignor had, and he is charged with all outstanding equities. Hence the discharge by the surety of his obligation, although subsequent to the assignment, may be used by him as an offset to an action by the assignee of an obligation held by his principal and assigned when insolvent. Eigenmann v. Clark, 21 Ind. App. 129, 51 N. E. 725.

As between the principal and surety, courts of equity always lend their aid for the protection of the latter. As soon as the surety's obligation to pay becomes absolute, as by insolvency of the principal, he is entitled in equity to require the principal debtor to exonerate him, and, since an assignee of a claim due the principal from the surety takes same subject to any defense which the surety might have against the principal at the time of the assignment, the surety may make an equitable offset to such claim, of the amount paid by him in discharge of his obligation as surety. Craighead v. Swartz, 219 Pa. 149, 67 Atl. 1003.

The insolvency of the principal introduces a new relation between him and his surety, whereby the latter is entitled to retain a debt due to the former, independent of the manner in which it was created, until the principal either releases him from or indemnifies him against his obligation. And where this equity exists at the time of the assignment by the principal of the claim against the surety, the right of the assignee is subject thereto, and if the surety subsequently discharges his obligation as such, he is entitled, in equity, to offset the amount thus paid against the claim of the assignee. Tuscumbia, C. & D. R. Co. v. Rhodes, 8 Ala. 212, cited with approval, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) in Goldthwaite v. National Bank, 67 Ala. 549, to the point that insolvency of the principal is a distinct equitable ground for the allowance of the set-off of demands which at law could not be made available.

Insolvency of the principal entitles the surety to equitable offset, as against the assignee of a debt due by the surety to the principal, of whatever the surety is required to pay in discharge of his obligation as surety, although the assignment is prior to the actual payment by the surety of this obligation. Williams v. Helme, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 151, 18 Am. Dec. 580.

And see DUDLEY LUMBER CO. v. NOLAN BROS. LUMBER CO. applying the doctrine to an obligation not due at the time it was assigned, and upon which the defendant was liable as surety.

But in Walker v. McKay, 2 Met. (Ky.) 294, it is held that to be available in equity as against an assignee, an obligation of the surety must have existed before the assignment, that is, the surety must have paid and discharged his obligation as such; since the principal does not become the debtor of the surety until the latter pays the debt for which he is liable as surety; hence he cannot set up and rely upon the mere fact that he is surety as entitling him to a discount against his own note, whether in the hands of his principal or an assignee; and insolvency alone entitles him to no greater or different relief. This is true, although the surety has paid the obligation of his principal, but not, however, until after he was notified of the assignment by his principal of the claim against him.

Fraud as entitling surety to equitable offset.

A surety against whom a judgment has been rendered for the default of his principal, which he has been compelled to pay, is entitled to the aid of equity to offset the amount thus paid on a judgment against him in favor of an assignee of his principal, where the assignment was simulated and fraudulent. Wood v. Steele, 65 Ala. 436.

against it in the hands of an assignee for value, must be complete and perfect at the date of the assignment. Gatewood v. Denton, 3 Head. 381; Litterer v. Berry, 4 Lea, 193; Catron v. Cross, 3 Heisk. 584." And later in the opinion the court proceeded to treat the case before it as if only the insolvent himself were resisting the set-off, as distinguished from one who took, for value, the assignment.

We deem, therefore, the question for solution in the case at bar to be one not passed upon by the court in that cited case, nor in any subsequent case decided by this court.

There can be no doubt that a surety or indorser, who pays his principal's demand, has status, as such, to enforce an equitable set-off against a demand sued by such principal himself, if that principal be insolvent. There is nothing in any contingent feature incident to the claim of a surety or indorser that defeats the right. Citizens' Bank v. Kendrick, 92 Tenn. 437, 36 Am. St. Rep. 96, 21 S. W. 1070, and authorities below cited.

What change is wrought by an assignment, for value, of the demand, followed by notice by the assignee? It was said in Taylor v. Deakins, 9 Lea, 523: "It is true, the general rule is that the assignee of negotiable paper for a pre-existing debt is not a holder in the due course of trade without notice, and hence with respect to existing equities he stands in the shoes of the assignor; but the assignee does not continue to stand simply in the shoes of the assignor, especially after notice, so that his right to enforce the payment of the debt may be defeated by the subsequent acts of the assignor or debtor."

In Moore v. Weir, 3 Sneed, 46, it was held that such an assignee's condition, as respects the maker of the demand assigned, is no better than that of the assignor, and a mutual debt existing at the date of the assignment, but maturing afterwards, is allowable as a set-off. And this in an action at law.

By the Code (Shannon, § 4639) it is provided that the defendant may plead demands matured when offered in set-off; and any equities between defendant and the original party (assignor) under whom plaintiff claims, which by law have attached to the demand in plaintiff's hands, and for which the defendant would be entitled to recover against such original party.

The indorser company in the case at bar was such before and at the time the account against it was assigned, and before suit was brought, and, when "offered in set-off," it had taken over the note. The assignor was insolvent at the time the note was executed and indorsed, as well as at the date of the assignment.

In this attitude the indorser had equities between itself and the insolvent assignor attached to the demand, afterwards assigned, so far forth that it could have enforced the retention for its indemnity of any funds belonging to the assignor, principal on the indorsed note, that might be in the indorser's hands; and this without having paid the note. Citizens' Bank v. Kendrick, supra; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 478.

We hold that the assignment did not operate to defeat the right of the indorser to stand and prevail upon its defense of equitable set-off. We have not here an effort to set off a demand purchased or acquired after the assignment, but the enforcement of a right that antedated the assignment.

The decisions as to when a surety or indorser has a claim which can be used as a set-off are conflicting. In Connecticut it has been held that a surety may set off the amount which he is compelled to pay for his principal after an assignment against debts which he owed the insolvent, and which had passed into the hands of an assignee, the court saying that in equity, in view of the insolvency of the principal, the surety could proceed to compel prompt payment, and that, when the surety did later move to that end, the motion related back to the first moment of the existence of the right, which was prior to the acquisition of any right by the assignee. Merwin v. Austin, 58 Conn. 22, 7 L.R.A. 84, 18 Atl. 1029.

A number of cases may be found to the effect that a surety or indorser, who has not, at the time of the assignment, paid the note, has no right to set off its amount against a debt due by him to the assignor. Huse v. Ames, 104 Mo. 91, 15 S. W. 965; Walker v. McKay, 2 Met. (Ky.) 294; Nettles v. Huggins, 8 Rich. L. 273; Chance v. Isaacs, 2 Edw. Ch. 348; also see Richardson v. Anderson, 109 Md. 641, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 394, 130 Am. St. Rep. 543, 72 Atl. 485.

But the contrary is held elsewhere. Craighead v. Swartz, 219 Pa. 149, 67 Atl. 1003; Beaver v. Beaver, 23 Pa. 167; Scott v. Timberlake, 83 N. C. 382; Williams v. Helme, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 151, 18 Am. Dec. 580; McKnight v. Bradley, 10 Rich. Eq. 557; Feazle v. Dillard, 5 Leigh, 31; Collins v. Jones, 10 Barn. & C. 777. Also see Smith v. Felton, 43 N. Y. 419; Coffin v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 560; Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 36 L. ed. 1059, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148; Armstrong v. Warner, 49 Ohio St. 376, 17 L.R.A. 466, 31 N. E. 877; Eigen-

We are of opinion that the latter rather than the former line of authorities is more in accord with the principle that underlies our statute and decisions. The element of the time of payment does not figure, if made before the set-off was pleaded; and, as we have seen, in contemplation of equity, rights will be taken to have inhered in the indorser anterior to the assignment. The assignee will not be treated as a quasi holder in due course for value as against such an indorser. Manifestly a court of equity should not hold itself powerless to relieve from loss, in a very real sense fixed on the indorser at the time of the assignment, merely because his demand was not matured in law on assignment date. The trend of the more recent cases appears to be towards the ruling here made, and away from the influence of the rules of the common law as to set-off, sometimes harsh in their exactness.

Chancellor Cooper in Howe Sewing Mach. Co. v. Zachary, 2 Tenn. Ch. 478, dealing with a demand assigned for value, cited with approval Smith v. Felton, supra; and in the latter case the court said: "Equity will look through the form of the transaction, and adjust the equities of the parties with a view to its substance, rather than its form, so long as no superior equities of third persons will be affected by such adjustment. . . . It is enough that justice and equity demand that the debts should be set off against each other, rather than that the defendants should be made to pay the note, and left to rely upon the estate of an insolvent debtor for the payment of the debt due them. Technical objections, which would be valid at law, will not avail to defeat equitable set-off. . . . The plaintiffs took title to the note, subject to the equitable claim of the defendants, as it existed at the time of the assignment, which was to set off their debt against the note to the amount of the latter, and the legal title will not avail to defeat this prior equity of the defendants."

The indorser company, in such situation as is here disclosed, is in the eye of equity potentially a creditor, and the assignee succeeded only to the rights of the assignor, subject to the prior equity.

The court of civil appeals held that the Dudley Company was not entitled to be treated as a surety, and that, because it came into possession of the note from the Michigan Bank, subsequent to the assignment of the account, "by reassignment, this amounted to a repurchase or new acquisition by it." This is an erroneous view, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) even if there had been a formal reindorsement by the Michigan Bank to the Dudley Company, since such reassignment would have been nothing further than an evidencing in form that was true in substance,—that the Dudley Company by payment was in command of the obligation that had been indorsed by it. But the only indorsement in fact made by the Michigan Bank was one to a Memphis bank for collection, and payment was made thereunder at the Memphis bank.

As a further ground of its decision adverse to the Dudley Company, the court of civil appeals states its opinion to be "that § 50 of the negotiable instruments act [Laws 1899, chap. 94] clearly indicates that the indorsee [Dudley Company, treated as such, as above] cannot urge as against an assignee the equities or rights attaching to a note between the date of its execution and its reacquisition by him."

The section referred to is as follows: "Where an instrument is negotiated back to a prior party, such party may, subject to the provisions of this act, reissue and further negotiate the same. But he is not entitled to enforce payment thereof against any intervening party to whom he is personally liable." This section should be read in connection with § 121, which provides: "Where the instrument is paid by a party secondarily liable thereon, it is not discharged; but the party so paying it is remitted to his former rights as regards all prior parties, and he may strike out his own, and all subsequent indorsements, and again negotiate the instrument," etc.

It is clear that there is nothing in the act that bars the indorser company, which paid the note, of its remedy against the maker; and the assignee of the account was not an "intervening party" within the meaning of § 50 of the act. In short, the provisions of the act have no pertinency to the facts of this case.

The writ of certiorari is granted, and the decree of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed. Decree here in accord with the one pronounced by the chancellor.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (In Banc.)

STATE OF MISSOURI EX REL. JOSEPH A. WRIGHT

v.
EUGENE McQUILLIN, Judge of St. Louis
Circuit Court.

(— Mo. —, 158 S. W. 652.)

Reference — right of referee to resign.

1. A referee is not an officer within a constitutional provision forbidding officers to resign.

Same — bias.

2. A referee should be permitted to resign for cause, such as bias or prejudice in the case.

(Brown and Walker, JJ., dissent.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to prevent respondent from forcing relator to proceed as referee in a case in which he had been appointed. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph A. Wright in propria persona:

The right to resign without the consent of the appointing power is settled.

Missouri Const. § 5, art. 14; State ex rel. Walker v. Bus, 135 Mo. 325, 33 L.R.A. 616, 36 S. W. 636; Reiter v. State, 51 Ohio St. 74, 23 L.R.A. 681, 36 N. E. 943; Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 378.

A referee may resign in the absence of a statute forbidding it.

34 Cyc. 809; Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 105 App. Div. 88, 93 N. Y. Supp. 849.

Where a judge or referee believes himself prejudiced, he has both the right and is under the duty of resigning.

23 Cyc. 590; 34 Cyc. 809; State ex rel. Lentz v. Fort, 178 Mo. 518, 77 S. W. 741; State v. Gilham, 97 Mo. App. 296.

The writ of prohibition is proper where there is merely an excessive and unauthorized application of judicial force in a cause otherwise properly cognizable by the court or judge in question.

Messrs. Fordyce, Holliday, & White and Fred Armstrong, Jr., for Eliza P. O'Hara:

A referee has a right to resign.

Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 105 App. Div. 88, 93 N. Y. Supp. 849; (Mo.) Const. § 5 art. 14; State ex

rel. Walker v. Bus, 135 Mo. 325, 33 L.R.A. 616, 36 S. W. 636; 34 Cyc. 809.

Bias and prejudice on the part of a referee disqualifies him from service.

Caldwell v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 30 Misc. 510, 63 N. Y. Supp. 841; Smith v. Dunn, 91 App. Div. 200, 88 N. Y. Supp. 307; New York Bank Note Co. v. Hamilton Bank Note Engraving & Printing Co. 71 App. Div. 611, 75 N. Y. Supp. 520.

A refusal to serve disqualifies a referee, and a resignation constitutes a refusal to serve.

Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 105 App. Div. 88, 93 N. Y. Supp. 849.

Mr. Edward C. Kehr, with Mr. Eugene McQuinn, for respondent:

"The whole subject of reference is governed by the statute."

Caulk v. Blyth, 55 Mo. 294.

The reference in this case is compulsory, and the parties having failed to agree, the court of its own motion appointed the referee. He accepted the appointment and qualified as such. He thereby became an officer of the court appointing him (Higgins v. Wright, 43 Barb. 461), and as such is subject to its orders and control. (Ford v. Ford, 53 Barb. 525; O'Brien v. New York, 84 N. Y. 657, 84 Hun, 50, 32 N. Y. Supp. 34).

Graves, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Original action in prohibition. The facts may be thus summarized: On April 5, 1905, there was pending in the circuit court of St. Louis city an action wherein Eliza P. O'Hara, executrix of the estate of Henry O'Hara, was plaintiff, and the firm of Berthold & Jennings were defendants. The suit and a counterclaim filed therein by defendants (both in large sums requiring an extensive accounting between the parties) rendered the case one for compulsory reference. This action fell by allotment to district No. 6 of the St. Louis city circuit court, over which respondent has presided since January 1, 1913. On April 5, 1905, respondent's predecessor appointed relator, Wright, as referee in said cause by the usual order in such cases made, and Wright qualified and proceeded to act, but to what extent does not appear in the record be-

Note. — Right of referee to resign.

There is a dearth of authority on this question.

The Louisiana statute, which provides that arbitrators shall not be allowed to resign their appointment without a good cause, is held to apply only to judicial arbitrators appointed to decide a cause already pending. Lallande v. Bonny, 13 La. 462.

In Brady v. Kennedy, 65 App. Div. 190, 72 N. Y. Supp. 507, and Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 105 App. Div. 88, 93 N. Y. Supp. 849 (referee appointed to take proof of certain facts), the right of a referee to resign is assumed.

J. D. C.

fore us in the instant case. It does appear that a previous referee had taken all the evidence in the case, and Wright was appointed on the death of the first referee. The facts we take from the respondent's return, in so far as they controvert the allegations of the relator's petition. This we do because the case is submitted here upon a motion for judgment on the pleadings. In such case, so far as the facts stated in the return controvert the facts stated in the relator's petition, the return must govern.

On December 31, 1912, the referee Wright, filed his written resignation in said cause, assigning as one of his reasons therefor that he was biased and prejudiced in the cause as to the plaintiff therein. Other reasons we omit. January 2, 1913, the defendants in the cause pending nisi filed their application for a rule upon the referee to report on said cause. This application on January 24, 1913, the court sustained in a summary way, and directed the referee to report forthwith his actions and proceedings in said cause. January 30, 1913, the plaintiff by proper motion and application asked the court to vacate its order of January 24, 1913, and either accept the resignation of the referee or remove him from office, because of his bias and prejudice against her, and appoint another referee in said cause. This application, which was duly verified by oath, contains among other things the following: "That said Joseph A. Wright, the present referee, is prejudiced and biased against plaintiff in this cause, and has expressed a prejudice and bias against plaintiff in this cause, and consequently is not a proper person to act as referee herein, and is not competent to render a report on the merits of the cause." This application, verified as aforesaid by the affidavit of one of plaintiff's counsel, was summarily overruled, and the referee left to make immediate report or take other steps. The referee in this situation applied to this court for a writ of prohibition, and an order to show cause was issued. The return of the respondent does not question the fact of Wright's prejudice and bias. It proceeds on the broad ground that the court can direct Wright to report until such time as the resignation is accepted or he is removed, and, although not in express terms, the return, in fact, denies the right of the referee to resign for any reason. Other matters will be left for the course of the opinion.

I am impressed that both parties to this action have an erroneous view of the law of the case. Relator urges an absolute and unqualified right to resign his position, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) and cites us to § 5 of art. 14 of the Constitution, and some case law. The constitutional provision cited has no reference to a referee. This provision has reference to officials of a different kind and character. The section does recognize the absolute right to resign in the class of officers to whom it refers, but relator does not belong to this class. The cases cited likewise do not support the contention, and for the same reasons. Whilst in a sense a referee is an officer of the court, he is not an officer within the meaning of this constitutional provision. A referee is thus defined in 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 2d ed. p. 219: "A referee is a person to whom a cause pending in court is referred by the court to take testimony, hear the parties, and report thereon to the court, and upon whose report, if confirmed, judgment is entered." Another authority, 34 Cyc. 774, thus defines "reference" and "referee." "A reference is a sending of a pending cause or some question therein by the court in which it is pending to a private person to hear and determine the cause or some question therein or to take evidence and report the same, with or without his opinion thereon, to the court. Before there can be a reference there must be an action pending, and generally only matters connected with the pending suit can be referred. The person to whom the reference is made is usually termed a referee; but various other names are given to such persons in different jurisdictions, there sometimes being, however, a difference between a referee and such other person. The term 'auditor,' 'commissioner,' 'arbitrator,' 'examiner,' 'assessor,' etc., are often used. A referee is to be distinguished from a master who is appointed only in equity suits pursuant to the old equity practice, although in some jurisdictions a referee in an equity suit appointed pursuant to statute is now termed a referee rather than a master. In so far such officers perform the duties of a referee, the difference in title may be disregarded, and the title of referee is therefore used generically throughout this article, except where there is a difference of importance between the particular officer and a referee."

No definition brings a referee within the class of officers held in view by the constitutional provision, supra. On the other hand, respondent apparently denies the right to resign in toto. To our mind the true rule lies between the two extremes. I do not believe that a referee should be permitted to resign for mere capricious or capricious reasons, but that there is a right to resign for good and sufficient reasons, I have no doubt. The right to resign is, in my judgment, a qualified, rather than an absolute, one. In other words, it is a right dependent upon the reasons for its exercise. If the reason assigned is good and valid the right is there, but not so if the reasons are otherwise. The right of the court to remove a referee for good cause, and the right of the referee to resign for good cause, should go hand in hand. If the one is recognized, the other should be recognized. The thing which would authorize the court to remove the referee should authorize the referee to resign, and force the acceptance of such resignation, if acceptance be necessary.

It is urged that our statute makes no provision for the resignation of a referee, and this is true. Nor does the statute provide for the court's removal of the referee for cause. The only statutory provision is one authorizing the court to appoint another referee in the event the first appointee dies or removes from the state. Rev. Stat. 1909, § 2000. Not a word is said about removing for cause, yet the courts all recognize that a referee may be removed for cause, and one of the chief causes is bias and prejudice. It is also true that our statutes make no specific provision for the resignation of a referee for good cause or reasons, yet it does not necessarily follow that such right does not exist. Our statutes, with regard to references and referees, are but additions to the old chancery idea of masters in chancery. The statutes merely broaden the common-law field for references. For this reason the statutes are not full and complete, but much is left to be gathered from the old chancery rules as to references in chancery. In chancery practice the right to remove a master in chancery for good cause was always recognized, and the same doctrine has been followed under statutory provisions for reference.

In 34 Cyc. 809, the law is thus stated: "A referee is subject to removal by the court, even where appointed by agreement of the parties, but only for good and substantial reasons. For instance, the referee may be removed because of prejudice or bias or misconduct, or by the expression of an opinion on the facts before the hearing." In Bowen v. Steere, 6 R. I. loc. cit. 253, Ames, Ch. J., says: "The motion to discharge the rule altogether, upon the ground that two of the referees, after their appointment and before they had heard the case of the claimant, expressed opinions unfavorable to it, demands, on account of the nature of the cause alleged, the careful consideration of the court. Whilst in modern times courts have been more liberal in overlooking honest errors in referees and arbitrators, and mere defects of form in their reports and awards, they have been more strict in requiring from them the integrity and impartiality which belongs to the judicial character. Cleland v. Hedly, 5 R. I. 163; Strong v. Strong, 9 Cush. 573. The partiality betrayed by the expression of an opinion by a referee for or against the case of either party before he has heard it would, unless the parties had agreed to waive impartiality in the tribunal selected by them, be a good cause to invalidate his report, and to discharge the rule which appointed him. Under such circumstances the court would be bound to presume, notwithstanding the referee swore that his prejudice did not sway him, that the report was not the result of his fair and deliberate judgment, but of preconceptions, which placed him beyond the influence of both law and fact. Fox v. Hazelton, 10 Pick. 275; Boston Water Power Co. v. Gray, 6 Met. 131."

So, in the case at bar, what court could say that a fair report had been given by the biased and prejudiced mind of the referee? This, too, in the face of admitted bias and prejudice. In the case of Goldberger v. Manhattan R. Co. 3 Misc. 443, 23 N. Y. Supp. loc. cit. 178, it is said: "Referees are judicial officers, charged with a responsible trust. They take the place of the jury as well as of the court, and their finding upon the facts is generally accepted as conclusive. Like jurors or arbitrators, they should be persons entirely unbiased and indifferent between the parties, or their competency to act may, in like manner, be challenged, and any secret understanding as to receiving fees in advance from one party (Russell, Awards, 129; Morse, Arb. 536; Redman, Awards, 93), or any other act of misconduct calculated to bias or influence any one of the referees in his conduct, or to prejudice either party, is generally regarded as ample cause for removal, and for setting aside the award when made. For examples of the stringency of this rule, see Forrest v. Forrest, 3 Bosw. 650; Dorlon v. Lewis, 9 How. Pr. 1; Yale v. Gwinits, 4 How. Pr. 253; Livermore v. Bainbridge, 44 How. Pr. 362, affirmed in 47 How. Pr. 354; Marie v. Garrison, 1 How. Pr. N. S. 32; Devlin v. New York, 7 Daly, 466; Carroll v. Lufkins, 29 Hun, 17; Burrows v. Dickinson, 35 Hun, 492; O'Brien v. Long, 49 Hun, 80, 1 N. Y. Supp. 695. Misconduct or bias upon the part of referees may be of two kinds,—either positive, as by some act that can be directly proved, or inferential, where the circumstances so strongly point to undue influence that the presumption alone will be taken as conclusive."

In the case at bar we have confessed bias toward one of the parties upon the part of the referee. The good faith of this confession is not questioned, and cannot well be questioned. To force a biased and prejudiced mind to try a cause would be a travesty upon justice. Other cases strongly recognizing the right of the court to remove a referee for bias and prejudice will be found cited in 34 Cyc. supra, and we need not go further. As above indicated: "The reason assigned by this referee is the very best of all reasons. The law contemplates a fair and impartial trial of all issues before a fair and impartial tribunal. Jurisprudence despises bias and prejudice in the administration of justice. Bias and prejudice saps the very life blood of even-handed justice. For that reason we exclude proffered jurors from service. For that reason circuit judges are temporarily dethroned, and new judges called to try the cases. In fact, bias and prejudice are shunned at every step of legal proceedings, and rightfully so. Now to the case at bar. The referee openly admits his bias and prejudice as against one of the parties litigant,—and he asks the court to relieve him of the situation to the end that untrammelled justice may prevail. Not only so, but the party aggrieved by the feelings of the referee moves to have him removed and another appointed, and both of these requests are summarily disposed of by the court by an order directing the referee to proceed to report. To my mind such condition is anomalous. All the case law holds that a referee should be removed for prejudice, and yet the court nisi held could neither resign nor be removed. If he can be removed for prejudice, as the case law holds, should we hold that he cannot resign for the same cause? If he can be removed for prejudice, he certainly should be permitted to resign for the same reason." In other words, if the law imposes upon the judge the duty to remove a referee for bias and prejudice, the same law should impose upon the referee the duty to resign for the same cause. This is particularly true because the referee more fully than any other has the knowledge of the condition of his own mind. Bias and prejudice is a good cause for the resignation of a referee, and when such reason is assigned for the act, the resignation should go as a matter of course and right, and not as a mere matter of grace. We shall, however, approach the question from another angle or viewpoint.

II. A referee is but an arm of the court, created by the court, to do things which the court could itself do but for the inconvenience and time. His qualifications should be along the lines of those required of a trial judge, because he performs duties that otherwise would have to be performed by such judge. Not only should his qualifications be along lines of those required of the trial judge, but the things which disqualify the one to act should disqualify the other. Bias or prejudice has always disqualified the judge in Missouri, and it should likewise disqualify the referee. As to the judge, the rule is tersely stated in 23 Cyc. 590, in this language: "A judge may take judicial notice of matters affecting his qualification, and refuse to act if disqualified within his own knowledge and without any extrinsic evidence of such disqualification; and it is not only the right, but the duty, of a judge to refuse to preside at the trial of a case in which he is disqualified, without regard to the manner of receiving information of his disqualification." So, in the case at bar, if the referee, acting in good faith (and there is nothing to the contrary in this record), discovered that he was prejudiced against one of the parties, he had the right to resign in the interest of justice and fair play. In some states the final reports of referees have been set aside on the ground of bias and prejudice upon the part of the referee.

We have in the case at bar the solemn admission of his bias and prejudice. We have also an affidavit to the same fact, and yet without further information the trial judge summarily directs the referee to proceed to determine the issue between the parties. This should not be,—in the interest of jurisprudence. A referee should have the right to resign for the same reasons and upon the same grounds as would authorize the court to depose him. That such grounds exist in this case is not denied by the respondent's return. With the trial judge it seems to have been a mere question of the right of a referee to resign under any circumstances, and he adjudged that the referee had no such right. We hold that where bias and prejudice is admitted, as in this case, the referee has the right to resign, and the trial court exceeded his authority in directing the referee to proceed further with the case.

Let the writ of prohibition go. Costs to be taxed to relator.

All concur, except Brown and Walker, JJ., who dissent.

JULIAN ZACHRY et al.

(139 Ga. 625, 77 S. E. 812.)

Corporation — right to hold property — who may question.

1. The general rule is that, where a corporation has acquired possession and title to property, its right to hold it cannot be questioned by a private citizen, but in such a case the state alone can make the question.

I. In general.

a. Generally.

The earlier cases on the question annotated are collected in the note to Hanson v. Little Sisters of the Poor, 32 L.R.A. 293.

The general questions connected with the right to challenge an ultra vires contract of a corporation are not considered herein, the note being confined, as indicated in the title, to the right to question the corporation's power to take and hold property. Promissory notes and other choses in action have in general been excluded, as well as the forms of security that may be taken to secure payment of the same. Some such cases have been included for purposes of illustration, but the note is not intended to be exhaustive of this class. Questions connected with the right to condemn lands have also in general been excluded.

Neither is the doctrine of estoppel treated, although some cases in which the right to contest the power of the corporation is placed on that ground have been included, but in such cases the true ground of decision is shown.

Same — land contract — defense to specific performance.

2. But where a state statute provides that corporations "shall make no contract, or purchase or hold any property of any kind, except such as is necessary in legitimately carrying into effect" the declared purposes of the corporation, the courts will not aid the corporation to compel specific performance of a contract for the purchase of land which it has no power under its charter to acquire and hold.

Appeal — conflicting evidence — reversal.

3. The evidence was conflicting on material questions of fact, and it does not so clearly appear that the contract sought to be enforced by the corporation was ultra vires as to require it to be so declared as matter of law, and to cause the reversal of

Generally, as to the right to contest the power of a foreign corporation to hold property, see note to Lancaster v. Amsterdam Improv. Co. 24 L.R.A. 322.

And as to who may take advantage of a statute rendering foreign corporations incapable of taking title to real property, see note to Hanna v. Kelsey Realty Co. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 355; and see also the case of Plummer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 362.

As to right to question the power of a corporation to take by will property in excess of its charter authority, see subdivision of note to Hanson v. Little Sisters of the Poor, supra; Hubbard v. Worcester Art Museum, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 689; and supplemental note to Kennett v. Kidd, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 544.

It is held generally in some cases that none but the state can be heard to question the right of a corporation to take and hold property.

Thus, the right of a corporation which has power to explore for gas, to take a lease of oil right, can be questioned only by the state, and not by a subsequent lessee of the same rights. Harris v. Independence Gas Co. 76 Kan. 750, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1171, 92 Pac. 1123. The court here treats the question more as to the power of the corporation to contract, than as to the rights in question, of power to take and hold property.

The lack of power of a water company to take and accept a grant of a right to maintain a telephone or telegraph system can be taken advantage of only by the public authority, and not by the successors in interest of the grantors. *Northeastern Teleph. & Teleg. The power of a corporation organized for the purpose of carrying on a general dry goods business, to take an assignment of claims for damages growing out of a conspiracy to defraud,—a matter outside the purposes of its creation, and not authorized by its charter,—can be questioned only by the state, and not by the defendant in the action for damages. *John V. the judgment refusing to grant an interlocutory injunction to restrain the corporation from proceeding under such contract.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Columbia County to review an order suspending a restraining order in a suit to cancel a contract for the sale of real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Hill, J.:

C. F. Kohlruss filed his equitable petition against Julian J. Zachry and the Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company, and alleged substantially as follows: Petitioner is the owner and in possession of 404½ acres of described land in Columbia county, near the town of Harlem, which land is worth $15,000. Petitioner borrowed $2,300 of Mrs. J. B. Wright, and gave as security for the debt a deed to this land, under the provisions of § 3306 of the Code of Georgia, and received from her a bond to reconvey title to the land when the debt was paid. In September, 1912, petitioner borrowed from Zachry (acting, as now it is claimed, for the Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company) the sum of $300, and gave his note therefor, payable sixty days thereafter. As security for the debt, he assigned the bond for title from Mrs. Wright; and at the same time he was requested by Zachry to sign some other paper, the nature of which he cannot

The power of a traction company to take and hold a grant of a right of way can be questioned by the state only, and not by a grantee of the traction company's grantor. Knowles v. Northern Texas Traction Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 121 S. W. 232.

The power of a corporation to take certain leases of street railway property can be raised only by the state, and not by the municipality, in an action to which the lessees and the lessors are parties, brought by receivers, in whom are vested, under the authority of the court, all the rights and franchises of the lessor corporations which the latter undertook to transfer to the lessees. Blair v. Chicago, 201 U. S. 400, 50 L. ed. 801, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427.

Apparently, it was on the theory that none but the state can question the right of the corporation to hold property, that Annell v. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. 223 Mo. 209, 122 S. W. 709, was decided. In this case it was held that minors who, through their lawfully appointed guardian, have sold land to a corporation and have received the consideration therefor, cannot question the power of the corporation to purchase and hold the land in question.

The power of a railroad company to purchase an island and establish thereon a resort for excursionists cannot be questioned by the grantor of the company, nor his legal representatives, who have retained the consideration paid upon the purchase. Shelby v. Chicago & E. I. R. R. Co. 143 Ill. 385, 32 N. E. 438. Nothing is said in this case as to the right to question being confined to the state.

The rule that none but the state can question the power of a corporation to hold property was recognized in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Askew v. Smith, 109 Wis. 532, 85 N. W. 512, where a landowner seeking to compel the removal of an obstruction from a lake by a railroad company which had no power to acquire a fee in its right of way, but only an easement, but to which a deed in fee had been made, the landowner claiming that, by 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

reason of the power of the railroad company to hold only an easement, he became a riparian owner, and was therefore entitled to object to the obstruction.

This doctrine was approved in United Waterworks Co. v. Omaha Water Co. 21 Misc. 594, 48 N. Y. Supp. 817, but in the reversal of the decision, in 164 N. Y. 41, 58 N. E. 58, nothing is said on this point.

An exception to the rule that only the state can question the power of a corporation to hold property is suggested in Illinois Steel Co. v. Warras, 141 Wis. 119, 123 N. W. 656, in case the inability to hold the property results from express statutory prohibition.

Another exception to the general rule is referred to in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 117 Mo. 261, 38 Am. St. Rep. 656, 22 S. W. 623, as existing where the attack by a private person is authorized by expressed legislative permission.

In speaking of the assignment of a cause of action, in Peru Plow & Implement Co. v. Harker, 75 C. C. A. 475, 144 Fed. 673, the court states that the title the corporation received may be a defeasible title, but until the state or the assignor directly attacked it, it is impervious to collateral attack by third parties, thus, apparently, recognizing that an assignor might question the power.

In Hopkins County v. St. Bernard Coal Co. 114 Ky. 153, 70 S. W. 289, where a number of persons who held a claim against a county, and who assigned the same to a corporation, subsequently joined with the corporation in a suit against the county to recover the claim, and no objection was made to the joinder of parties, and no question presented as to whether the corporation could have sued in its own name alone, it was held that the objection that its purchase of the claim was ultra vires, and therefore left no title in it to them, could not be maintained, since the original claimants were before the court and the money would go to them, if not to the mining company, and the county had therefore not been prejudiced by the form of the judgment.

state, as, at the time he signed the paper, it was in the town of Harlem and he was trying to catch a train then approaching, to return to Augusta. A copy of the paper was not given him. He had previously borrowed from Zachry $300, and had given his note therefor, and he was then required to assign his bond for title, and to sign another paper which was in the nature of a conditional sale of the land to Zachry, providing that if the note was not promptly paid when due, Zachry was to have the right to purchase the land for the sum of $7,500, and to deduct therefrom an encumbrance for $3,000 due Mrs. Julia A. Hull, then holding the legal title to the land, which debt was subsequently taken up by Mrs. Wright. The paper further provided that, in the case the $300 first borrowed from Zachry was not paid when due, the land should be surrendered to Zachry, together with all debts due Kohlruss at that time. Zachry importuned petitioner to sell him the land, which he refused to do. On the 19th of November, 1912, the day on which the last $300 fell due, petitioner tried to reach Zachry at his office in Augusta upon two occasions, to pay the note, but failed to find him, his stenographer reporting that he was not in. Later in the day, Zachry came to petitioner's place of business and said, "How about that note? I suppose I ought to have notified you, but I came around instead." Petitioner was ready then and there to pay the money, but did not have it in his pocket at the moment, 9, 22 S. W. 223, an action by a vendor against his vendee, a corporation, to compel specific performance of a land contract, the right of the vendor to question the power of a railway company which was not a party to the suit, to hold a major portion of the stock in the defendant corporation, thereby influencing its affairs, was denied, the court stating that it is certain that such a matter could not be taken advantage of in a collateral way, but must be investigated by the state in its sovereign capacity.

While it is stated in Milton v. Crawford, 65 Wash. 145, 118 Pac. 32, an action by a purchaser under a land contract against his vendor, to recover the earnest money paid, on account of a conveyance in the vendor's title by a corporation, that the title of the corporation could be questioned only in a proper proceeding by the state, the real decision in that case seems to be based on the fact that a conveyance had been made by the corporation, and not questioned for some time.

In Kansas City & S. E. R. Co. v. Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. 129 Mo. 62, 31 S. W. 451, an injunction was sought by the plaintiff to restrain the defendant from interfering with the plaintiff in the possession of its right of way. The defendant attempted to question the power of a corporate grantor of the plaintiff to acquire any land in the county in which the land in question was situated. This was denied, the court stating that the capacity of that company to acquire a right of way and operate a railroad thereon is a matter that the state only can question, and as that right has not been denied by the state during a period of twenty years, it must be assumed that it was rightful.

The power of a national bank to loan money on the security of personal property can be raised only by the government, and not by one who claims to have been defrauded of the goods by the mortgagor Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 45 Neb. 444, 63 N. W. 796.

In Daniels v. Belvidere Cemetery Asso. 193 Ill. 181, 61 N. E. 1031, where a first mortgage had been assigned to a corporation, and it appeared by the pleading that the same had not been paid, a junior mortgagee was held to have no right in an action by junior mortgagees to foreclose their mortgages, to have the first mortgage canceled on the sole ground that the assignment to the corporation was void for want of capacity of the corporation to receive it. This holding is based on equitable grounds, stating that none of the other junior mortgagees were asking any relief, and the plaintiff in error had acquired no equity or right to appropriate the property of others for her benefit, by having the lien destroyed and removed out of the way of her mortgage, and that, if the assignment to the corporation was a nullity and transferred nothing, the debt would not be paid, and the title which was attempted to be transferred would remain in the assignor.

Where a bank, in violation of statute, accepted a pledge of its own stock as security for a note, and subsequently became insolvent and passed into the hands of a receiver, the maker of the note cannot question the power of the bank to take the pledge of stock. Meholin v. Carlson, 17 Idaho, 742, 134 Am. St. Rep. 286, 107 Pac. 755. The court states that it is of the opinion that the maker of the note might recover the certificate of stock if he had a desire to do so in a suit between himself and the bank during the solvency of the bank, but as the bank had become insolvent and a receiver had been appointed to take charge of its affairs to protect its creditors as well as its stockholders, the maker of the note cannot successfully plead the provisions of the statute and thereby defeat the foreclosure of the pledge. The decision in this case is based partly upon the ground of estoppel, and does not rest entirely upon the theory that no one but the state can question the power of a corporation to hold property.

The power of a corporation to take and hold a lease of land cannot be raised by the lessor, who has dealt and contracted with the corporation in its corporate name, and thereby recognized the corporate capacity to receive the granting question, and has received and retained the consideration for but would get it at once and pay it immediately; and he asked Zachry where he could find him that day so that he might bring him the money. Zachry replied, "I don't know where I'll be. I don't want you to pay this money anyway. I want that land. I have told you that the amount (specified in the transfer $7,500) was all the land was worth." Petitioner replied, "I never will sell it." Zachry told petitioner he did not know where he would be later in the day or at night. Petitioner then told Zachry that if he could not find him that night, he would bring the money to Zachry's office the first thing next morning. This petitioner repeated twice, and understood Zachry to reply, "All right." The next day (November 20) he called at the office of Zachry to pay the note, but Zachry was not in. He again called there on November 21, to pay the note, but Zachry was not in. Being unable to find him in his office, petitioner, on the 22d day of November, 1912, went to the town of Harlem, where Zachry had a place of business, and tendered the money due on the note, which Zachry refused to accept. He again tendered the money on the 23d, which tender was refused. After this, and on the same day, one of petitioner's tenants on the land came from Harlem and informed him that Zachry had gone upon the land and informed the tenant that he was the "boss and the owner of said land," and said, "I have long wanted to get this land, and now I've got it." He added, if petitioner owed the contract sought to be enforced. Lemp Hunting & Fishing Club v. Hackmann, — Mo. App. —, 156 S. W. 791. This decision, also, is placed on the ground of estoppel arising from the lessor having dealt with the corporation.

In some cases the contract by which the corporation acquires the property in question is attacked as ultra vires, and no attack is made on the right of the corporation to take or hold the property. In State Ins. Co. v. Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. 65 Neb. 34, 90 N. W. 997, the right to attack as ultra vires a contract by which an insurance company obtained an assignment of the unearned premiums on fire insurance policies, upon reinsurance by it of the property, was denied to the company which wrote the first policies, the court stating that the plea of ultra vires cannot be interposed by stranger, but only by the state, which authorized the incorporation of the company, or by a party to the contract which the corporation sought to make.

In Harris v. Independence Gas Co. 76 Kan. 750, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1171, 92 Pac. 1123, the right to question the power of the corporation was held not to exist in anyone except the state, even though the contract is executory. But see Kennett v. Kidd, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 544, for holding of this court that capacity of a corporation to take by will may be challenged by the heirs.

The contract under consideration in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 117 Mo. 261, 38 Am. St. Rep. 656, 22 S. W. 623, was an executed contract, and in the opinion the rule is stated to be confined to such contracts, although it is not clear that this was intended in its fullest extent, as subsequently the court, in referring to the rights of the corporation under an executory contract, states that the court will not interfere in behalf of a corporation whose rights rest only on an executory contract which it seeks, outside of the provisions of its charter, to have enforced. The position of the court is not therefore clear as to the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

rights of a private person to question the power of a corporation to hold property under an executory contract which it is not seeking to have enforced.

And see, further, as to executory contracts under III. b, 2, infra.

b. Where corporation has power to hold for some purposes.

Where a corporation has power to acquire real estate for the purpose of its business, its power to hold any particular real estate can be questioned only by the state, and not by an individual. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Keegan, 185 Ill. 70, 56 N. E. 1088; Hayden v. Hayden, 241 Ill. 183, 89 N. E. 147; Lauder v. Peoria Agri. & Trotting Soc. 71 Ill. App. 475; Hagerstown Mfg. Min. & Land Improv. Co. v. Keedy, 91 Md. 430, 46 Atl. 965; Scott v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 97 Tex. 31, 104 Am. St. Rep. 835, 75 S. W. 7; Ray v. Foster, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 53 S. W. 54.

Dictum of like effect appears in Hossack v. Ottawa Development Asso. 244 Ill. 274, 91 N. E. 439, and Louisville School Board v. King, 127 Ky. 824, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 379, 107 S. W. 247.

Thus, under a statute authorizing the corporation to acquire and hold such land and property as shall be necessary for its purposes, and such other lands as shall be taken in payment of or as security for debt, the holder of a tax deed on certain land cannot, in an action by one who claims to be the owner of such lands, question the authority of a corporation which sold to the plaintiff, to acquire the land in controversy, as under such statute the inquiry whether any particular real property is necessary for the business of the corporation is a matter between the state and the corporation, which does not concern third parties. Bowman v. Trainor, 93 Ark. 435, 124 S. W. 1019.

So, where a foreign corporation is given power to hold land for the purposes of its incorporation, the inquiry whether any particular real property, or how much, may be necessary to enable it to carry on the busithe tenant anything, he (Zachry) would pay it; that he proposed very soon to sow oats upon the land.

Petitioner charges that Zachry deliberately absented himself on the day the note fell due, in order to prevent petitioner from seeing him and paying the note, and to defraud him out of his land. When he signed the last note for $300, he had full confidence in Zachry that he would not wrong or take advantage of him; and for this reason he did not take the precaution to read over the paper above mentioned. Before signing it there was nothing said about a conditional sale of the land in the event the note was not paid when due. There was no agreement as to what Zachry should pay for the land, and no thought of selling the land to Zachry. There was no mutuality of contract in reference to the sale of the land, etc. If Zachry should present the bond for title assigned to him, and demand of Mrs. J. B. Wright a title to said land, which he threatens to do, he would acquire the title to the land, of the value of $15,000, for $2,300, and thus defraud petitioner out of many thousand dollars, and cause him irreparable damage, if an immediate remedy is not afforded. He makes a continuing tender to pay the amount of the note, and prays that the defendants be enjoined from entering upon the land of petitioner or exercising any acts of ownership over it, and from paying the debt due by him to Mrs. Wright and acquiring a conveyance from her; and that de-ness for which it was organized, is a matter between the state and the corporation, and cannot be raised by a defendant in an action to acquire title to land held by the corporation. Rachels v. Stecher Cooperage Works, 95 Ark. 6, 128 S. W. 348.

So, where the corporation has power to own real estate where it is taken for a debt due it, or is necessary for the transaction of its business, whether or not the corporation exceeded its powers in accepting a conveyance of real estate is a question which can be raised only by the state, and not by one who claims title to the real estate in question. Cooney v. A. Booth Packing Co. 169 Ill. 370, 48 N. E. 406.

So, where a corporation is possessed of ample power to acquire real property, and constructs a building thereon for the purpose of transacting therein the legitimate business of the corporation, the lessee of a part of such building cannot, in an action for the rent, set up the lack of power of the corporation to erect the building in question, which it is claimed was purposely constructed much larger than the business of the corporation required. Rector v. Hartford Deposit Co. 190 Ill. 380, 60 N. E. 528. See discussion of this case, infra, I. e.

The power of a corporation which has power to own and hold real estate for some purposes, to take and hold the interest of a lessor under a lease for a term of thirty years, can be brought into question only by a proceeding instituted in behalf of the state, and cannot be questioned by the lessor or his assignee. Springer v. Chicago Real Estate, Loan & T. Co. 202 Ill. 17, 66 N. E. 850.

It seems that the corporation in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 117 Mo. 261, 38 Am. St. Rep. 656, 22 S. W. 623, supra, was authorized to hold land for some purposes, and in that case it was held that the right to hold could be questioned only by the state, and not by one who claimed the lands by a deed from a former owner which was sought to be set aside in the action.

The power of a corporation authorized to own and deal in real estate, to hold unsurveyed public land of the United States, can 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

be raised only by the state, and not by a claimant of such land. Tidwell v. Chiricahua Cattle Co. 5 Ariz. 352, 53 Pac. 192.

The power of a corporation whose object is to "obtain an additional water supply for those then owning water rights" in a certain ditch, to purchase the water rights already possessed by its stockholders, can be questioned only by the state, and not by an adverse claimant of the water rights. Water Supply & Storage Co. v. Tenney, 24 Colo. 344, 51 Pac. 505.

Where a steamboat company authorized to hold real property for wharves, etc., used in the business, purchased a hotel near one of its wharves, it carries a title good as against all the world, except, perhaps, the commonwealth, and the power to hold the property cannot be raised by a guarantor on a bond for rent given by lessees of the hotel property. Nantasket Beach S. B. Co. v. Shea, 182 Mass. 147, 65 N. E. 57. The objection to a recovery on the bond was directed more to the claim that the corporation had no power to lease, than that it had no power to hold.

So, it is stated in Chicago & M. Teleg. Co. v. Type Teleg. Co. 137 Ill. App. 131, with reference to a lease by a telegraph company of property suitable for telegraphic purposes, that if the company leased more of such property than was necessary for its purpose, the state alone could complain. In the affirmation of this decision, in 236 Ill. 476, 86 N. E. 107, nothing is said as to the right of one other than the state to raise the question of the power of a corporation to hold property.

In an action by a corporation which has power to hold real estate for certain purposes, to recover the rent of certain rooms in a building erected by it, the power of the corporation to lease the rooms and collect rent therefor was held not to be a proper question to be raised in a proceeding wholly collateral. Dauchy Iron Works v. Gunder, 150 Ill. App. 604.

The power of a national bank to acquire title to real estate can be objected to only by the government, and not by an individual. DeWitt County Nat. Bank v.

fendants be required to accept the money tendered in settlement of the note, and to cancel the same, and to reassign the bond for title held by them as security for the debt, and to produce and cancel any alleged conditional contract of sale of the land from petitioner.

The defendants by their answer denied most of the main allegations in the petitions and, among other things, averred that on September 20, 1912, in Harlem, Georgia, the Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company advanced to the plaintiff the sum of $300 as part payment on the purchase price of $7,500 of the land in controversy, and the plaintiff then and there conveyed all his interest in the land by written instrument, a copy of which is attached to the answer; that on the same day the parties entered into a written agreement (a copy of which appears in the opinion, infra) wherein it was mutually agreed that if plaintiff failed to repay the sum so advanced, in sixty days after the date of the contract, the plaintiff should sell to the Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company the land in controversy at the agreed price of $7,500. The plaintiff failed to repay or tender to said corporation the sum of $300 within the time named in the contract, "whereby all interest and equity of plaintiff in said land was divested, and vested in said corporation." The plaintiff having already conveyed to the defendant company his interest in the land, and having failed to comply with the terms of the contract where-

W. 1000, affirmed in 218 U. S. 281, 54 L. ed. 1042, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 14; First Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 9 Mont. 323, 23 Pac. 718, approved in Barron v. McKinnon, 116 C. C. A. 483, 196 Fed. 933.

Nor can the power of a national bank to acquire a tax bill be questioned by anyone except the government. First Nat. Bank v. Shewalter, 163 Mo. App. 635, 134 S. W. 42.

The power of a foreign railroad company which has complied with the local laws, to hold property, cannot be raised by one to whom the railroad company has conveyed the property. Fayette Land Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. 1016.

The power of a foreign corporation to hold property can be raised only by the state, and not by the defendant in an ejectment suit. Illinois Steel Co. v. Warras, 141 Wis. 119, 123 N. W. 656.

The same rule has been applied where the corporation is given power to hold stock only upon certain conditions.

Thus, under a statute prohibiting a corporation from buying stock of another corporation unless it is done with the written consent of all the stockholders of both the selling and the buying corporation, the right to question such a purchase rests with the state, and cannot be raised by the vendor. Krell-French Piano Co. v. Dengler, 145 Ky. 202, 140 S. W. 168.

c. Power to hold to a certain extent.

So, where a corporation is entitled to hold to a certain extent, or to a certain per cent of its capital stock, it has been held that the right to hold a particular property cannot be questioned except by the state.

Thus, where a corporation is entitled to hold real estate to an amount not exceeding 25 per cent of its capital stock, the question as to whether or not a coal mining company exceeded its power in taking a long lease of coal land is one between it and the state, and cannot be questioned by a devisee 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) and trustee of the lessor, who succeeded merely to the rights of such lessor. Henderson v. Virden Coal Co. 78 Ill. App. 437.

So, where land has been acquired by a turnpike corporation in an amount in excess of that which it by its charter was authorized to acquire or own, the right to question the power of the corporation is with the state, and cannot be raised by the vendor of the land. Miller v. Flemingsburg & F. S. Turnp. Co. 109 Ky. 475, 59 S. W. 512.

Where a water company is authorized to hold real or personal property to a certain amount, whether or not it has exceeded the amount of property which it is authorized to hold can be raised only by the commonwealth, and not by the municipality, so as to authorize the latter to take the property of the corporation at any less than its true value upon taking over the franchise and property of the corporation as provided in its charter. West Springfield v. West Springfield Aqueduct Co. 167 Mass. 128, 44 N. E. 1063.

See Daniels v. Belvidere Cemetery Asso. 193 Ill. 181, 61 N. E. 1031, where the corporation was authorized to hold property to a certain extent only.

Nor is this rule changed where it was concealed from the lessors that the corporation was limited by its charter in the purchase and ownership of real estate of a certain per cent of its capital stock, where neither the corporation nor any of its officers in any way participated in the concealment, as the fact that it did not disclose the provisions of its character to the lessors would not be a fraud. Henderson v. Virden Coal Co. supra.

d. Power to hold a certain time.

So, where the time which a corporation may hold property is limited, only the state can question its holding after this time.

The power of a national bank to hold real estate after the time limited by statute can be called in question only by the state, and not by one who claimed a tax lien and a deed thereunder on the land. National by a sale thereof might have been avoided, and conveyance of such interest defeated, this defendant is now the owner and holder of said interest, and entitled to the possession of the uncultivated part of the land, and, on January 1, 1913, will be entitled to the possession of the remainder of the land in controversy. Wherefore it prays, by way of cross petition, that it be declared the owner and holder of the bond for title and all interest of the plaintiff thereunder; that, in case the court should hold that this defendant is not already vested with the title to the land, the plaintiff be required to specifically perform the contract embodied in the instruments above referred to.

In response, to the answer and cross petition the plaintiff alleged that the written contract set up and relied upon by the defendants was void and wanting in mutuality, and was nonenforceable, because Zachry had no authority to execute the contract in the name of the corporation; and because the Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company had no charter power to enter into said contract.

Upon interlocutory hearing, the court refused an injunction and the plaintiff excepted.

Mr. William H. Fleming, for plaintiff in error:

A corporation cannot take and hold land except in so far as is reasonably necessary to carry out the objects of its creation.

Bank v. Licking Valley Land & Min. Co. 15 Ky. L. Rep. 211, 22 S. W. 881.

The right of a foreign insurance company to hold land taken upon the foreclosure of a mortgage longer than provided by the Constitution can be raised by the state only and not by one claiming the property in question. Summet v. City Realty & Brokerage Co. 208 Mo. 501, 106 S. W. 614.

The provisions of a statute that a corporation shall not hold real estate for a longer period than ten years, except such real estate as shall be actually occupied by the corporation in the exercise of its franchise, can be enforced only at the interest of the public, and cannot be taken advantage of by a mere squatter upon the real estate, to effect a lapse of title against the corporation for failure to have taken possession of the real estate within the time limited. Pere Marquette R. Co. v. Graham, 136 Mich. 444, 99 N. W. 408.

e. No power to hold.

Some courts have indicated that where the corporation has no power to acquire any property of the kind sought to be acquired, its power may be questioned by anyone.

The exact bearing of the case of Walker v. Taylor, 252 Ill. 424, 96 N. E. 1055, on this question, is not clear. In that case the owner of land conveyed the same to a trustee for a corporation which had no power to hold the land, and subsequently the widow of the grantor, as a stockholder of the corporation and as executrix and devisee of the grantor, brought an action to confirm the transaction and subsequent conveyances of parts of the land had thereunder, and to vest in the stockholders of the corporation an equitable interest in the remaining land. This relief was resisted by the administrator of the estate of the trustee, his answer denying that the deed from the owner to the trustee was void, and that the title remained in the original owner, and alleging further that the trustee had died insolvent, and that the land in controversy belonged to his estate and was subject to his debts.

bill was denied, the result would be that the undisposed land would go to the creditors of the trustee, as claimed by his administrator. The court holds that, the corporation not having power to acquire title to the land in question by deed directly to it, it could not do so indirectly by having the deed made to a third person for its benefit, and then continues: "The question is not whether a corporation organized for lawful purposes, and having a right to hold real estate for certain purposes, has exceeded its power. In that case, as contended by appellant [the administrator], the question whether the corporation had exceeded its powers could only be raised by the state. But here the company was trying by indirection to exercise powers it never did have, because the law forbade its organization with such powers. It follows that the . . . [corporation] never acquired title by virtue of the deed from Walker and wife, and as Gould represented the corporation he acquired no title." The widow of the grantor, who brought the action as a stockholder of the corporation, and as executrix and devisee of the grantor, was thus allowed to raise the question.

The court in Rector v. Hartford Deposit Co. 190 Ill. 380, 60 N. E. 528, directed its attention more to the question of whether or not the power of the corporation may be questioned in a collateral proceeding, than to that of who may question it. In the course of the opinion, in an obiter statement, it approves a statement of law to the effect that the plea of ultra vires may be successfully interposed in a collateral proceeding where the corporation is alleged to have performed an act which it was not, under any circumstances, authorized to perform. The action was by a corporation for rent of a building, and the lessee was denied the right to raise the question, on the theory that it was a collateral proceeding and that the corporation had power to hold for some purposes.

But compare with Harris v. Independence Gas Co. 76 Kan. 756, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1171, 92 Pac. 1123, and see also Hill v. Rich Hill Coal Min. Co. 119 Mo. 9, 22 S. W. 223, II. Who is seeking to question.

a. Persons sustaining contract relation.

The rule that only the state can question the power of a corporation to take and hold property has been applied in numerous instances where the one seeking to question the power of the corporation sustains a contract relation to it.

Thus, one who has granted land to a corporation cannot question the power of a corporation, so as to authorize the setting aside of the deed. Hayden v. Hayden, 241 Ill. 183, 89 N. E. 347.

Nor can the grantor question its power, so as to secure reverter of the land after dissolution of the corporation. Miller v. Flemingsburg & S. F. Co. 109 Ky. 475, 59 S. W. 512.

Nor can a purchaser of the land from a corporation question the power, so as to defeat a recovery of the purchase price. Lauder v. Peoria Agri. & Trotting Soc. 71 Ill. App. 475; Fayette Land Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. 1016.

Nor can one who has sold corporate stock to a corporation question the power, so as to render a purchaser from the corporation guilty of conversion of the stock. Krell-French Piano Co. v. Dengler, 145 Ky. 202, 140 S. W. 168.

Neither can the assignee of a lease question this power, so as to avoid the making of the valuation of the property as required by the lease. Springer v. Chicago Real Estate, Loan & T. Co. 202 Ill. 17, 66 N. E. 850.

Nor can the lessee question the power of the corporation to hold the leased premises, so as to defeat a claim for rent. Rector v. Hartford Deposit Co. 190 Ill. 380, 60 N. E. 528.

Nor can a guarantor of the rent question the power in an action by the corporation 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling question in this case is whether the Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company, a corporation, under the laws of this state, can have specific performance of an executory contract for the purchase of farm lands, where the charter of the corporation contains no express power to execute such contract or to acquire such lands. The contract referred to is as follows:

State of Georgia, Columbia County.

Received from the Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company the sum of three hundred ($300) dollars, to be applied on the purchase price of the following tract or parcel of land fully described in a bond for on the bond. Nantasket Beach S. B. Co. v. Shea, 182 Mass. 147, 65 N. E. 57. See comment on this case above.

In Harris v. Independence Gas Co. 76 Kan. 750, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1171, 92 Pac. 1123, infra, the original lessors were joined as coplaintiffs with the lessee, and their right to question the corporate power was denied.

See West Springfield v. West Springfield Aqueduct Co. infra, where the right of a municipality to take the property of a water company, at the value of property which it was authorized to hold, was denied.

See Euclid Ave. Trusts Co. v. Hohns, 24 Ont. L. Rep. 447, where the right of a mortgagor to raise the question of corporate power was denied.

Neither can minors whose lawfully appointed guardian sold land to a corporation question the power of the corporation. Ansell v. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. 223 Mo. 209, 122 S. W. 709.

And see also Coleridge Creamery Co. v. Jenkins, 66 Neb. 129, 92 N. W. 123, infra.

So, the right of privies of those sustaining contract relations with the corporation, to question its power to take and hold property, has been denied.

Thus, the subsequent grantees of a mortgagor cannot question the right to ejectment of the subsequent grantee of the mortgagee, a corporation, which foreclosed and purchased at the foreclosure sale, on the theory that the corporation had no power to take and hold the property. Summet v. City Realty & Brokerage Co. 208 Mo. 501, 106 S. W. 614.

Nor can an heir of the grantor question the power of the corporation in an action in ejectment against the corporation and its grantee. Hall v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 145 Mo. 418, 46 S. W. 1000, affirmed in 218 U. S. 281, 54 L. ed. 1042, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 14. One count in the petition in this case was in equity.

Nor can the successors in title of grantors defeat the right of the corporation to enjoin the disturbance of an easement, on the theory that the corporation had no power title given by Mrs. Nannie B. Wright to C. F. Kohlruess, dated June 19, 1912, provided that said sum of $300 is not repaid to said Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company within sixty days after date.

It is agreed that if said sum is not paid in the above specified time, the said Kohlruess agrees to sell to the Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company, who agrees to buy, said tract of land fully described in said bond for titles, at and for the sum of seventy-five hundred ($7,500) dollars, to be paid as follows: The said Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company agrees to assume a loan of twenty-three hundred ($2,300) dollars on said land, payable to Mrs. Nannie B. Wright, the sum of fourteen hundred and fifty ($1,450) dollars January 1, 1913, and the sum of thirty-seven hundred and fifty ($3,750) dollars January 1, 1914. All deferred payments to bear interest from January 1, 1913, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum.

It is agreed that all rents during the year 1912 are to be paid said Kohlruess, and the said Kohlruess shall pay all taxes on the property up to January 1, 1913.

Possession of the uncultivated part of the property may be taken by the purchaser sixty days after date, provided said sum is to take and hold the property. Northeastern Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Hepburn, 72 N. J. Eq. 7, 65 Atl. 647.

Nor can a subsequent grantee of the grantor of the corporation question the power of the corporation. Knowles v. Northern Texas Traction Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 121 S. W. 232.

Nor can a subsequent lessee of rights previously leased to a corporation question the power of the corporation, in an action to cancel the previous lease. Harris v. Independence Gas Co. 66 Kan. 750, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1171, 92 Pac. 1123.

Nor can the defendants in an action on claims for damages for conspiracy to defraud, by a corporation, an assignee of the claims, question the power of the corporation to hold them. John V. Farwell Co. v. Wolf (John V. Farwell Co. v. Josephson) 96 Wis. 10, 37 L.R.A. 138, 65 Am. St. Rep. 122, 70 N. W. 289, 71 N. W. 109.

Nor can a municipality question the power of a corporation, in an action by a receiver of a certain corporation to quiet the claims of the corporation. Blair v. Chicago, 201 U. S. 450, 50 L. ed. 822, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427.

Nor can a prior owner who claims that the corporation secured title as security only defeat the claim of the corporation on the theory that it had no power to hold property. First Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 9 Mont. 323, 23 Pac. 718.

See Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 117 Mo. 261, 38 Am. St. Rep. 656, 22 S. W. 623, infra.

So, in Meholin v. Carlson, 17 Idaho, 742, 134 Am. St. Rep. 286, 107 Pac. 755, the right to question the power of a corporation to hold a pledge of shares of stock was denied to the pledgor after the insolvency of the corporation. The court is of the opinion that the question may be raised before insolvency by replevining the certificate of shares.

Neither can a trustee for the benefit of creditors of the corporation question the power, so as to authorize the rescission of the contract by which the corporation acquired the property, and the recovery of the purchase price. Hagerstown Mfg. Min. & Land Improv. Co. v. Keedy, 91 Md. 430, 46 Atl. 965.

b. Persons sustaining no contract relation.

The right has also been denied to those who sustain no contract relations to the corporation.

Thus, the holder of a tax lien or a tax deed cannot question the power of a corporation which is seeking to quiet its title to the property. National Bank v. Licking Valley Land & Min. Co. 15 Ky. L. Rep. 211, 22 S. W. 881; Puget Sound Nat. Bank v. Fisher, 52 Wash. 246, 100 Pac. 724, 17 Ann. Cas. 526.

Nor can the holder of a tax deed question the power of a corporation which conveyed to the one seeking to quiet title. Bowman v. Trainor, 93 Ark. 435, 124 S. W. 1019.

Nor can the owner of land question the power of a corporation to hold a tax bill thereon. First Nat. Bank v. Shewalter, 153 Mo. App. 635, 134 S. W. 42.

Nor can a claimant of the land raise the question of the power of a corporation which is seeking to quiet its title. Rachels v. Stecher Cooperage Works, 95 Ark. 6, 128 S. W. 348.

Nor the power of a corporation which is seeking to establish and confirm a title under a burnt records act, and eject the claimant, who is in possession. Cooney v. A. Booth Packing Co. 169 Ill. 370, 48 N. E. 406.

Nor can the one claiming the right to possession of the land question the power of the plaintiff's grantor to acquire the land. Kansas City & S. E. R. Co. v. Kansas City & S. W. R. Co. 129 Mo. 62, 31 S. W. 451.

Nor can second mortgagees who are seeking to redeem property sold to a national bank at foreclosure proceedings question the power of the bank. Dewitt County Nat. Bank v. Mickelberry, 244 Ill. 77, 135 Am. St. Rep. 304, 91 N. E. 86.

Nor can one claiming land under a deed from a former owner, which is being sought to be set aside, question the power of a corporation which has acquired through such former owner. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 117 Mo. 261, 28 Am. St. Rep. 656, 22 S. W. 623.

Nor can a claimant of water rights question the power of an adverse claimant, a corporation, to acquire the rights. Water not paid, and the remaining part of said land on January 1, 1913.

In witness whereof both parties have hereunto set their hands and seal this 20th day of September, 1912.

The power of a corporation to take an assignment of a cause of action cannot be questioned by strangers to the contract after it is fully executed. Peru Plow & Implement Co. v. Harker, 75 C. C. A. 475, 144 Fed. 673.

In Evangelical Baptist Benev. & Missionary Soc. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 28, 90 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Harlem Oil & Fertilizer Company is as follows: The petitioners seeking "the formation of a corporation to be known as the 'Harlem Oil and Fertilizer Company,' for the purpose of conducting for pecuniary profit the business of buying and selling, both in their own right and on commission, cotton, cotton seed, and all cotton seed products and farm products of all kinds, coal, wood, timber, and lumber; to manufacture and sell cotton seed oil and all substances and commodities obtainable from cotton seed and other agricultural products; to purchase fertilizer ingredients; to make, mix, manufacture, and sell fertilizers; to

N. E. 572, an action against a municipality to abate a tax assessed to the corporation, in which an exemption was claimed against assessment for city, county, and state taxes, the corporation, which was authorized to hold property to a certain extent, was held not to be in a position to claim a statutory exemption for property which it held in excess of that amount. The city is regarded, however, as a public authority representing the state, and it is on this theory that the municipality was allowed in this case to question the power of the corporation to hold property.

See Milton v. Crawford, 65 Wash. 145, 118 Pac. 32, where the purchaser of real estate, in whose vendor's chain of title it appeared that the land was formerly owned by a corporation, objected to the title on this account.

As to the right of a claimant in an ejectment suit, see infra, III. b, 1.

III. Form of action.

a. Corporation on defensive merely.

The right to question the power of a corporation to take and hold property has been denied where the corporation is on the defensive merely. Thus, in the following actions the right to question this power was denied to the one seeking thus to question.

—by a grantee of one who had also deeded to a corporation, to try title to the land conveyed. Knowles v. Northern Texas Traction Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 121 S. W. 232;

—by a grantor to secure a reverter of land deeded the corporation, after the dissolution of the same. Miller v. Flemingsburg & F. S. Turnp. Co. 109 Ky. 475, 59 S. W. 512;

—by the grantor to set aside a deed of residence property. Hayden v. Hayden, 241 Ill. 183, 89 N. E. 347;

—by minors, by their next friends, to set aside a deed of their guardian to a corporation. Ancell v. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. 223 Mo. 209, 122 S. W. 709. It is not clear, however, that this decision is on the theory that none but the state can question the power of the corporation; manufacture ice and sell the same; to establish and operate an electric light plant and create motive power and electric light, both for the use of said corporation and for sale to others; and to establish and operate sawmills and to manufacture lumber," it is ordered that said application be granted, and that the petitioners and their associates and successors be vested with "all the rights, privileges, and powers mentioned in said petition."

It will be observed from reading the above language that the charter contains no authority or power on the part of the corporation to own farm lands, or to make any contract for the purchase or holding of such property. Our Civil Code, § 2823 (5), is as follows: "Corporations thus created may exercise all corporate powers necessary to the purpose of their organization, but shall make no contract, or purchase or hold any property of any kind, except such as is necessary in legitimately carrying into effect such purpose, or for securing debts due to the company." The language of the statute just quoted is clear and plain. By its terms a corporation can make no contract or purchase, or hold any property of any kind, except such as is necessary to the purposes of the organization. The declared purpose of the corporation is as set out in the excerpt from the charter above quoted.

Was the purchase of the farm lands necessary in legitimately carrying into effect such purpose? Mr. Zachry, who was the general manager, president, and treasurer

—by creditors of the grantor to set aside the deed. Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Jones, 95 Minn. 127, 103 N. W. 1017;

—by a trustee for the benefit of creditors of the corporation, against the vendor for a rescission of the contract and a recovery of the contract price. Hagerstown Mfg. Min. & Land Improv. Co. v. Keedy, 91 Md. 430, 46 Atl. 965;

—by a second mortgagee to redeem property sold to a national bank at foreclosure proceedings. Dewitt County Nat. Bank v. Mikelberry, 244 Ill. 77, 135 Am. St. Rep. 304, 91 N. E. 86;

—by a claimant to a house on real property to which an agent of the corporation took title for the corporation, against the agent on the theory that, the corporation having no power to hold the property, the agent became responsible. Ray v. Foster, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 53 S. W. 54;

—by a subsequent lessee who joins his lessor as complaintiff, to cancel a lease to a corporation. Harris v. Independence Gas Co. 76 Kan. 756, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1171, 92 Pac. 1123;

—by a vendor of chattels to recover goods against a corporation, a mortgagee of his vendee, on the ground of fraud. Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 45 Neb. 444, 63 N. W. 796;

—by one against a corporation to question the right of another corporation to hold stock of the former. Hill v. Rich Hill Coal Min. Co. 119 Mo. 9, 24 S. W. 223;

—by a municipality to take over the property of a water company at a value not in excess of that of property which the water company was authorized to hold. West Springfield v. West Springfield Aqueduct Co. 167 Mass. 128, 44 N. E. 1063;

—by a vendor of corporate stock to a corporation which was not authorized to hold it as acquired, against a purchaser from the corporation. Krell-French Piano Co. v. Dengler, 145 Ky. 202, 140 S. W. 168.

So, in an action the petition in which contained a count in equity and one in ejectment, by the heir of a grantor against a corporation, grantee, and its grantees, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the right to question the power of the corporation to hold property was denied. Hall v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 145 Mo. 418, 40 S. W. 1000, affirmed in 218 U. S. 281, 54 L. ed. 1042, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 14.

b. Corporation seeking affirmative relief.

1. In general.

The note in 32 L.R.A. 293, 296, reveals some conflict on the question where the corporation is seeking affirmative relief; but the tendency of the later cases—at least other than those involving right to take under a will as to which, see notes in 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 689, and 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 544, and those involving suits for specific performance of executory contracts, as to which, see next subdivision—is to extend the rule that no one but the state may question the power of the corporation, to cases where the corporation is seeking affirmative relief.

Thus, in an action in ejectment by the corporation against a claimant of the property, the power of the corporation to hold the property cannot be questioned. Tidwell v. Chiricahua Cattle Co. 5 Ariz. 352, 53 Pac. 192; Pere Marquette R. Co. v. Graham, 136 Mich. 444, 99 N. W. 408; First Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 9 Mont. 323, 23 Pac. 718; Illinois Steel Co. v. Warras, 141 Wis. 119, 123 N. W. 656.

So, the right has been denied in an action of ejectment by the successors in title of a mortgagee, a corporation, which foreclosed and purchased at the sale. Summet v. City Realty & Brokerage Co. 208 Mo. 501, 106 S. W. 614.

This was the holding also in Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Keegan, 185 Ill. 70, 56 N. E. 1088, and in this the holding is contrary to the earlier Illinois case of St. Peter's Roman Catholic Cong. v. Germain, 104 Ill. 440, cited in the note in 32 L.R.A. 293. In the earlier Illinois case, the corporation was given power to hold land not exceeding a certain quantity, and the court held that any amount in excess of that of the corporation, testified that he wanted the land because "around an oil mill there is a great deal of waste, and this tract was bought by me to fertilize it, and bring it up to a high state of cultivation from the waste and fertilizer around the oil mill." Owning a farm to fertilize is not one of the necessary or declared purposes of the corporation. The necessary purposes of the corporation are enumerated in the charter. If the waste and fertilizer were valuable for the purpose named, it could be sold by the corporation.

But it is argued that the state alone can make the question as to the right of the corporation to own and hold the land. This is undoubtedly the general rule. 10 Cyc. 1133; American Mortg. Co. v. Tennille, 87

Ga. 23-30, 13 S. E. 158, 12 L.R.A. 529, and cases cited; Hanson v. Little Sisters of the Poor, 79 Md. 434 (3), 32 Atl. 1052, and note in 32 L.R.A. 293; Zinc Carbonate Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 103 Wis. 125, 79 N. W. 229, 74 Am. St. Rep. 845, and note; Anglo-American Land, Mortg. & Agency Co. v. Lombard, 68 C. C. A. 89, 132 Fed. 721, 722; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. 119 Ala. 106 (5), 24 So. 114. Thus, we held in the Tennille Case, supra, under the act of February 28, 1877, which provided that the state would not allow foreign corporations to own 5,000 acres or more of land, unless they should become incorporated under the laws of Georgia, that the state alone could question the right of foreign corporations to hold was expressly forbidden by the statute, and it followed that other conveyances, deeds, or other contracts made in violation of this prohibition were absolutely void. In the Keegan Case the corporation was given power to acquire any extension of its road by lease, purchase or otherwise, by or with the written consent of its stockholders, and the objection was made that the consent of the stockholders was not shown and no proof was introduced that the land acquired was an extension of the company's road. This distinction between the powers of the corporation in the two cases does not seem to justify a difference in the decision, and although not expressly stated it seems that the Keegan Case overrules the earlier Illinois case.

So actions to quiet title, and actions similar thereto, may be maintained by a corporation, without right in its opponent to question its power to hold the land. Rachels v. Stecher Cooperage Works, 95 Ark. 6, 128 S. W. 348; Richmond Cotton Oil Co. v. Castellaw, 134 Ga. 472, 67 S. E. 1126 (to enjoin an adverse claim from interfering with water rights); National Bank v. Licking Valley Land & Min. Co. 15 Ky. L. Rep. 211, 22 S. W. 881 (in the nature of a bill quia timet); Northwestern Telegraph & Teleg. Co. v. Hepburn, 72 N. J. Eq. 7, 65 Atl. 747 (to enjoin disturbance of an easement); Puget Sound Nat. Bank v. Fisher, 52 Wash. 246, 100 Pac. 724, 17 Ann. Cas. 526 (to remove a cloud from title); Blair v. Chicago, 201 U. S. 400, 50 L. ed. 801, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427 (receiver of street railroad company seeking to quiet title to certain franchises).

land contrary to the provisions of the statute. But this principle has no application to a case where a corporation, by its cross bill, is seeking the aid of a court of equity to enable it to acquire and own lands which by its charter it has no power to acquire and own. 10 Cyc. 1135; Case v. Kelly, 133 U. S. 21, 33 L. ed. 513, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 216; note to Hanson Case, supra, 32 L.R.A. 293, 296; Pacific R. Co. v. Seely, 45 Mo. 212, 100 Am. Dec. 369. The distinction between the two classes of cases is that the courts will not interfere with a contract that is executed, but will refuse to aid a corporation in enforcing a contract for the purchase of land that is merely executory. The contract in the present case is executory. Under its charter powers, the defendant is seeking specific performance of a contract for the purchase of a plantation consisting of 404½ acres of farm land at the price of $7,500. It claims to have paid $300 on the purchase price of the land, and to have assumed a debt due Mrs. Wright of $2,300, which was to be paid as follows: $1,450 on January 1, 1913, and the remainder, $3,750, on January 1, 1914, with interest at 8 per cent per annum on deferred payments. The testimony shows that Kohl-russ, the plaintiff, executed his note to Mrs. Wright for $2,300, and made her a deed to the land to secure the same. The bond for titles, given by her to Kohl-russ, was transferred by the latter to the corporation, which holds it. If the Wright note should not be paid by the corporation, Kohl-russ is still liable on the note. The note is not paid, so far as the evidence discloses. Nor

v. Superior Ct. 42 Wash. 675, 85 Pac. 669.

The sureties on a promissory note given a corporation for evidence of indebtedness to it, which is secured by a second mortgage on real estate, are not entitled to question the right of a corporation to acquire the real estate in an action by it to enforce payment of the note. Advance Thresher Co. v. Rockafellow, 16 S. D. 462, 93 N. W. 652. Nothing is said in this case as to the right of the state alone to question this exercise of power.

2. Suit for specific performance.

Where a corporation is seeking the aid of a court to specifically enforce an executory contract relating to the property, an interested person may contest its power to hold the same. See KOHLRUSS v. ZACHRY.

So, it has been held that specific performance of an unexecuted contract providing for the acquisition of the right to construct tracks on the right of way of a railway company, and also to cross the tracks of such railway company, will not be granted to a corporation which has no power to take or receive property for the construction and uses of a railroad. South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. 119 Ala. 105, 24 So. 114. This was held in an action in which a successor in interest of the corporation lacking the power was seeking to compel specific performance.

It was held also in this case that the corporation which had succeeded to the rights of the contracting corporation could not seek the aid of a court of equity to perfect its title to, or to obtain possession of, the property, although it possesses the power, the lack of which incapacitated its grantor to take property of the character in question.

In speaking of the right of a successor in interest to maintain specific performance, the court states that unless the defendant has recognized, or in some way estopped itself to deny, the rights of such successor under the agreement, such successor in interest cannot maintain an action for specific performance, since it succeeded only to the rights of the corporation which lacks the power to hold the land, and if the latter acquired no rights under the agreement, it could transfer none to its grantee.

This exception is referred to also in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 117 Mo. 261, 38 Am. St. Rep. 658, 22 S. W. 623.

But where the contract is executed, and to give a private party the right to question the power would result in gross fraud, the general rule prevails, and the right of the private party to question the power will be denied.

Thus, where the corporation, in reliance upon the contract, directed permanent improvements upon the land to an amount of $3,000 for the purpose of its corporate business, and the purchase price was only $60, and the improvements were made with the participation and active assistance of the vendor as one of the company, he will not be permitted to question the power of the corporation to take and hold the property in an action for specific performance. Coleridge Creamery Co. v. Jenkins, 66 Neb. 129, 92 N. W. 123.

The right to have specific performance of an agreement contained in a lease for the renewal thereof, after the payment by the corporation of the amount provided for in the original lease, cannot be questioned by the lessor, since the agreement is executed and the corporation has paid the consideration on which the agreement was given in full. Lemp Hunting & Fishing Club v. Hackmann, — Mo. App. —, 156 S. W. 79. This decision, however, is based on the ground of estoppel.

See Lauder v. Peoria Agri. & Trotting Soc. 71 Ill. App. 475, supra, where the corporation was seeking to recover the purchase price of land.

See Evangelical Baptist Benev. & Missionary Soc. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 28, 90 N. E. 572, where the corporation was seeking the abatement of taxes.

has Mrs. Wright executed a deed under the bond for titles to the defendant corporation; nor does it appear that she took any part in the transaction. The contract, therefore, is not executed, but executory, as to the corporation. The plaintiff is in possession of the land, and the defendant corporation seeks to compel specific performance of the contract by its cross bill. Under such circumstances, the plaintiff can raise the question of authority of the corporation to take the title to the farm lands as being ultra vires.

The members of the court concur in the rules of law above announced; but there is not unanimity as to the application of them to the facts of the present case.

The opinion of the members of the court, other than the writer on this subject, is as follows: In the Civil Code, § 2216, is contained a statement of the powers common to all corporations. Among these is: "To receive donations by gift or will, to purchase and hold such property, real or personal, as is necessary to the purpose of their organization, and to do all such acts as are necessary for the legitimate execution of this purpose." By § 2823 it is declared that corporations organized by the superior court "may exercise all corporate powers necessary to the purpose of their organization, but shall make no contract, or purchase or hold any property of any kind, except such as is necessary in legitimately carrying into effect such purpose, or for securing debts due to the company." The word "necessary," as employed in these two sections, is to be given a reasonable construction, and not to be so construed as to hamper and obstruct, or practically prevent, the profitable and reasonable exercise of the corporate powers and the conduct of the corporate business. Thus, many contracts may be made which are not in an absolute sense essential to the conduct of business, and yet may be legitimate as advancing the principal business, or rendering it more profitable. Such contracts would not be invalid. In Spear v. Crawford, 14 Wend. 20, 28 Am. Dec. 513, it was said that the land which a canal company may buy is not limited to a mere passage for the canal, but that a reasonable discretion is vested in the company in respect to the purchase. On the other hand, in Pacific R. Co. v. Seely, 45 Mo. 212, 100 Am. Dec. 369, it was held that a railroad has no authority to acquire land for purposes of speculation, under a grant of power to acquire and hold sufficient real estate for the construction of its road, and for the erection of depots, engine houses, etc. These cases will serve as illustrations of the principle involved in the case now under consideration.

If the contract for the purchase of the land involved in the controversy was clearly beyond the corporate power, that question could be raised when it sought to enforce specific performance, and an injunction would be granted to restrain the corporation from taking possession or interfering with the business of the landlord. The evidence on this subject is quite meager. The person who was at once the president, treasurer, and general manager of the corporation testified thus: "As to what I wanted this land for, I will say: Around an oil mill there is a great deal of waste, and this tract was bought by me to fertilize it and bring it up to a high state of cultivation from the waste and fertilizer from the oil mill, and I wanted it for that purpose." It is not very clear whether the witness meant that there were certain products of the mill which would be wasted or lost or not profitably used otherwise than by the purchase of this land, and that it was to be used in connection with the business of the mill, and as necessary for the profitable use of such waste products, or whether such purchase was reasonable in its amount for such corporate purposes. But inasmuch as the landowner was attacking the right of the corporation to have specific performance, and basing his attack on the ground that the purchase was ultra vires, the burden of establishing this defense rested upon him. And if the evidence left his defense in doubt, or failed to establish it, the consequent injury fell upon him. The majority of the court are not prepared to hold that, under the evidence, it can be declared, as matter of law, that this contract was ultra vires. They think that the judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to grant the interlocutory injunction prayed. On the subject of whether the transaction really amounted to the securing of a loan or to the making of a sale, the evidence was conflicting, and therefore the judge had the right to exercise his discretion in finding on that subject.

The writer of this opinion cannot concur in the views of the majority of the court just above stated. He is of the opinion that, assuming the contract to have been for the sale of land by the owner thereof to the corporation, the evidence so clearly shows that it was ultra vires, because the purchase was not for a purpose necessary to the corporate business, and that, as matter of law, an injunction should have been granted.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

PATRICK LUCEY, Resp.,
v.
STACK-GIBBS LUMBER COMPANY,
Appt.

(23 Idaho, 628, 131 Pac. 897.)

Master and servant — felling trees — duty to give warning — power to delegate.

The owner of a lumber camp owes the duty to an employee engaged in building a bridge, to give him warning when a tree which is being cut by other employees is about to fall, which he cannot delegate, and

Note. — Duty to give warning where trees are being felled.

Upon the general question whether the duty of the master to warn or instruct servants is delegable, see exhaustive note to Anderson v. Pittsburg Coal Co. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 624.

In a number of cases it has been held that the dangers from felling a tree are open and obvious, and consequently the master is under no obligation to warn a servant thereof. Melton v. E. E. Jackson Lumber Co. 133 Ala. 580, 31 So. 848 (thirty or forty laborers engaged in clearing right of way of railroad); Hagins v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 134 Ga. 641, 137 Am. St. Rep. 270, 68 S. E. 428, 20 Ann. Cas. 248 (but one tree felled, and that in an open space); Anderson v. Columbia Improv. Co. 41 Wash. 83, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 840, 82 Pac. 1037, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 585 (no warning need be given of falling tree breaking off limbs of the other trees; plaintiff and one other workman only were engaged in the work).

Any failure to give warning of the expected fall of a tree is that of a fellow servant. Melton v. E. E. Jackson Lumber Co. supra.

It is to be noted in the foregoing cases that, with the exception of the first cited, the danger was in no wise concealed, and must have been as apparent to the servant as it would have been had any warning been given. In the Alabama case, however, where there were a large number of workmen employed, it would seem as though the application of the rule might work hardship.

In a number of other cases, however, it has been held that where a number of men are engaged in felling trees, there is a non-delegable duty on the part of the master to see that a warning is given to the other workmen who may be within the zone of danger.

Thus, in Curtin v. Clear Lake Lumber Co. 47 Wash. 260, 91 Pac. 956, it was held that a lumber company was liable for injuries caused to a sawyer who was struck by a falling limb broken off by a falling tree which a foreman had chopped down in the vicinity without giving the customary warning.

he will therefore be liable in case the bridge constructor is injured by a tree felled upon him without warning, although those engaged in felling the tree had been instructed to give the necessary warning.

(April 12, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shoshone County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendants were alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

So, in Elenduck v. Crookston Lumber Co. 121 Minn. 53, 140 N. W. 125, it was held that where a "swamper" whose duty it was to trim the limbs from trees after they had been cut down was injured by a falling tree, of which the usual warning was not given, the master would be held liable, since the duty to give signals of dangers such as that of falling trees was an absolute obligation of the master. The court drew a distinction between the giving of signals where such signals were used solely in directing the movements of machinery, etc., and signals which were relied upon by employees as a means of saving themselves from harm.

So, where the employees of a logging company, who were engaged in felling trees, and the log hauling crew, were at work in different places, and not in sight of each other, the failure of the master to see that a proper warning or signal was given before a large tree fell across the hauling line constituted negligence, since it necessarily exposed the respondent to sudden and unexpected danger; under such circumstances it was the nondelegable duty of the master to see that a signal or warning was given. Cunningham v. Adna Mill Co. 71 Wash. 111, 127 Pac. 850.

In Potlatch Lumber Co. v. Anderson, 118 C. C. A. 180, 199 Fed. 742, where the defendant had from 150 to 200 men working in the camp near to and about the place of the accident, and the company introduced witnesses to show that it followed a practice of warning men to look out for falling trees, it was a question of fact for the jury as to whether the master had failed to do its duty in respect to warning the men. The court said: "It is but a fair observation that it would be unreasonable to expect a man in a crew of 'swampers' to do his work of cutting down brush and at the same time to protect himself against the danger of trees cut by men in another crew very near by falling upon him, unless the men cutting the trees or someone knowing the danger would give him warning."

In Erwin v. Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. — Mo. App. —, 158 S. W. 913, the injuries were caused by a falling tree, but the case turned upon the question whether the method of felling the trees adopted by the master was negligent or not.

Sullivan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of the carelessness in felling a tree which struck the plaintiff and broke his leg while he was in the employ of appellant. The cause was tried by the court with a jury, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,999. Thereupon a motion for judgment was made by the appellant non obstante veredicto, which was overruled by the court, and a motion for a new trial was also denied. The appeal is from the judgment and said two orders.

The appellant is a corporation engaged in logging and lumbering in the state of Idaho. It is alleged in the complaint that the respondent was employed at what was known as camp No. 1 of the appellant company, as a laborer blowing out stumps, and on the 23d of August, 1911, was directed to cease work at that camp, and was transferred to another camp known as camp No. 2, and directed by the appellant, together with another man, to build a bridge across a small stream; that the superintendence and control of the work of building said bridge or turn-out, with other work done by the appellant, was under the direction of a foreman, and that said foreman was in direct charge of the work of building said bridge; that it was the duty of plaintiff as a laborer to do such work in such place, and in such manner as the foreman directed; that the duties of the foreman were to do whatever was necessary to determine whether the places where the employees were working were reasonably safe, and to direct the performance of said work in such a manner as was necessary to keep the same safe; that on August 25, 1911, the plaintiff was directed to go to work upon a bridge, and to construct same in the manner directed by the foreman, and while the plaintiff was engaged in said service, deeply engrossed in his work, the appellant caused a large tree, about 12 inches in diameter and about 60 feet in length, to be cut and felled so that the same struck the plaintiff and injured him; that the tree was cut and felled by an employee of the appellant working on the hill above where plaintiff was working; that no notice or warning was given that the tree was about to be felled or was falling until it fell and struck plaintiff; that plaintiff was deeply engrossed in his work with his back in the direction in which the appellant was cutting the tree; that the plaintiff was unaware of the fact that the tree was being cut where the same might fall on him; that it was the duty of the appellant to give the plaintiff warning of the falling of a tree, in order that he might seek a place of safety and thus protect himself; that no warning whatever was given, and that no notice was given the plaintiff that the tree was about to be cut; that the employee who cut the tree was working under the direction and control of the foreman; that it was carelessness and negligence on the part of appellant to allow plaintiff to become engrossed in his work and at the same time direct another man to go on the hillside above him and cut a tree, and permit the same to be felled without giving plaintiff any notice or warning so as to permit him to escape to a place of safety and avoid danger when the tree was felled; that by reason of the injuries so received, the plaintiff suffered a double compound fracture of both bones of his right leg between the ankle and the knee, and was severely injured, and from which he was still suffering at the time of the trial.

The appellant answered, denying practically all of the allegations of the complaint that would make appellant liable, and pleaded affirmatively contributory negligence and negligence of a fellow servant and assumption of risk.

The evidence in the case was quite brief. The plaintiff testified that he had been working in camp No. 1 under a boss named Mullen; that on August 23, 1911, Mullen told him to go to camp No. 2, which was under the charge of a boss named Radigan; that at camp No. 1 he had been engaged in blowing out stumps and clearing a right of way as a common laborer at $2.75 per day; that Mullen told him to go up to camp No. 2 and work there two or three days, as they were short-handed there, and to report to Radigan; that on the morning of August 23d, Radigan and plaintiff walked up the gulch, and Radigan told him to work on the skid road; that he told plaintiff to lay poles 3 feet apart, and bury them in the ground, and let about 3 inches stick over, so that a sleigh could slide along on the top; that he kept at that work in the forenoon, and in the afternoon Radigan came along and told him to build a bridge about 30 feet long and 12 feet wide, so that teams could switch out and pass each other; that Radigan told him he would have the timber brought to him; that he was getting $2.75 a day, the same as at camp No. 1; that Radigan selected the work that he was to do; that Radigan was supposed to go around and tell the men what to do; that he was the only foreman in the camp; that he hired and discharged men and signed their checks; that the timbers for the bridge were felled and carried to the bridge by an Austrian and another man, who were working under the supervision of Radigan, the names of whom plaintiff did not know; that the bridge was being built in a little gulch with a little creek in it, and there was a stringer on each side of the creek about 30 feet long; plaintiff and his partner were covering the bridge, plaintiff working on one end chopping a notch, and his partner doing the same on the other end, when plaintiff was struck by a falling tree; that the two men who were getting the timber had been felling it up the gulch a ways and bringing the timber down, for a day and a half; that at the time of the injury plaintiff was working on the stringer where Radigan told him to work; that the tree that fell on him came to the right of him; that he did not see any men chopping a tree, and did not know that any men were chopping a tree prior to the time it fell; that he had no warning of the falling tree; that the men "never hollered at all;" that prior to the falling of the tree on him, he had never seen the two men cutting a tree near him; that there were men working all around him in the woods, some skidding logs and others chopping; that every man was supposed to holler "Timber!" and give a man a chance to get out of the way, when a tree was being felled, and that that had been his experience in the camps of the Stack-Gibbs Lumber Company; that he did not remember of ever hearing the foreman of the camp instruct the men to give that kind of a warning or any kind of a warning; that a man was supposed to holler and give a man a chance to get out of the way; that there were skidding teams climbing the hills all the time; that while he was notching the log on the bridge he did not see the men cutting the tree, as they were to the right of him; that he did not know they were in there; that he thought they were up the gulch further; that they had been working up the gulch further; that they had been carrying the logs down on their shoulders to him; that at the time he went to work neither the foreman nor any other person advised him that they were going to cut any timber around close to where he was working; as a result of the tree striking him, his leg was severely broken; he was laid up in bed seven months, and it was still swollen at the time of the trial; that his hospital bill was $350, of which he had paid $80, all the money he had; that prior to the accident he had been in good health; that he was fifty-one years of age; that prior to the time the tree fell there was no warning whatever given him that a tree would fall.

Charley Sanders, an employee of the defendant at the time of the accident, testified that he was working on the skidway something like 100 feet from where plaintiff was working on the bridge; that there were other men working up there swamping and doing other work, and others chopping timber; that when a tree was about to fall, the men were supposed to holler "Timber!" and give the men a chance to get away; that the practice of giving warning in that way had been followed during all the time they had been in the camp; that the men were chopping, swamping, and cutting about 200 feet further up than he was; that he saw the tree fall that struck plaintiff; that he did not hear any warning or notice given that the tree was to be felled; that he saw the tree fall and heard someone holler, someone groaning, and went down there with his cant hook and saw plaintiff and another man lying on the road; that he thought the man who hollered was the man who was hurt with plaintiff; that the tree was about the size of an ordinary telephone pole, about 100 feet long; that as the tree struck the ground it was broken into pieces: that he then went down to the camp to get help; that he could hear chopping all around him where he was working; that the skidway was up about 100 feet above where plaintiff was working; that he had seen the two men cutting timbers for the bridge that day; that the men who were cutting the timbers for the bridge and carrying them to plaintiff had been working that day further up the draw from the camp and beyond where he was working,—farther away from plaintiff than he was.

The physician who treated the respondent testified to the injuries and their permanency.

The testimony of the appellant was directed to the establishment of the proposition that the respondent was in charge of the work of constructing the bridge, and that those who cut the tree that caused the injury were working under his direction. The walking boss of the appellant testified that he had general charge of the camps of the appellant, and that there were from forty to sixty men working in each camp; that each camp had a foreman; that he talked with respondent about going to camp No. 2 to build a scoot road, and look after that work. On cross-examination he testified that the foreman Radigan's duties were to show the men where he wanted them to work and tell them what to do; that he was the man who picked out the work, and directed the men what to do, and how to do it; that the respondent was a common laborer at camp No. 1, and that he was sent to camp No. 2 to look after the building of the scoot road and a bridge; that the witness had never told respondent that he had been promoted to be a boss; that he told him what he wanted him to do up there; that he told him to report to Radigan, and that Radigan would show him what to do.

Radigan, the foreman at camp No. 2, testified that respondent came there to go to work, and testified as follows:

Q. What conversation did you have with Mr. Lucey about this work?

A. I showed him the work I wanted him to do, and showed him what I wanted him to do it with; I also gave him the men I wanted to work with him.

Q. What did you tell him he was to do?

A. I told him,—I first took him and showed him the place in the road to fix, and then took him and showed him a turn-out place I wanted built first, I believe, and put him to work at it.

He further testified that he told the respondent that the men were to help him, and that respondent was to direct them in their work; that at that time there were about fifty-five men working in that camp. Radigan further testified that he had been along there several times that day; that he noticed the men were cutting the timbers for respondent on the hillside above him; that he noticed them several times in different places on both sides of the gulch in the vicinity of 100 feet; that on the day of the accident they were working about 150 feet from respondent.

On cross-examination he testified as follows:

Q. I will ask you how you happened to know where these men were cutting timber around Lucey?

A. It was my business to know where they were; every time I went through the woods I would also find out where they were.

Q. They were working under you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was your business to see that they were attending to their work?

A. Yes, sir.

Radigan also testified that he was the foreman; that the skidding crew did not have a boss; that there was one other boss in that camp, namely, the respondent; that he did not notify the respondent that he had been promoted to be a boss; that he did not know whether respondent knew he was a boss or not.

It clearly appears that Radigan took the respondent up there, and told him what he wanted him to do, and how he wanted it done, and that he told the other men what he wanted them to do, and did not inform respondent that he had been made boss or that he had charge of any men.

In rebuttal respondent testified that a man by the name of Mullen was the man who sent him up there to construct the bridge; that the witness Garvison never spoke to him about it, and no one ever told him that he was to have charge of anything or of any men.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the respondent for the sum of $2,999.

Four errors are assigned as the basis for the reversal of the judgment: (1) That the trial court erred in denying appellant's motion for a nonsuit; (2) that the court erred in denying appellant's motion for a directed verdict; (3) that the court erred in denying appellant's motion for a judgment non obstante veredicto; (4) that the court erred in denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

It is first contended that the respondent was an experienced woodsman, and had had many years' experience in logging camps, and he testified that it was the custom or rule in the camps of the appellant company to give notice or warning to the men when a tree was about to fall, and that, since it was the custom or rule of the appellant company that the men felling trees, before the tree falls, must "holter" or cry out the word "Timber!" in order to give the men a chance to get out of the way, if the servant neglects to give the signal or warning on felling a tree, such neglect is the fault of a fellow servant, and the employer is not liable for any damage resulting therefrom. The question then is directly presented whether those who felled the tree were fellow servants of the respondent, and whether their neglect to give the signal or warning required to be given on the falling of a tree was the neglect or carelessness of a fellow servant, for which the employer was not liable.

We think the general rule of law is that, when a master is engaged in a complex or hazardous business, he must promulgate and adopt such rules and regulations for the conduct of his business and the government of his servants in the discharge of their duties, as will afford reasonable protection to them, and that it is the duty of the master to use reasonable care to see that the rules adopted by him for the safety of his servants are complied with, and, if he fails to do so, he will be responsible for injuries resulting from failure of compliance.

quite similar to the one under consideration, after stating the duties of the corporation substantially as above set forth, the court said: "Nor was it disputed that the duties just specified are positive obligations imposed upon the master by law, and that he is liable for the negligent performance of such duties, whether he undertakes their performance personally, or delegates them to another." The court also held that it would be unreasonable to expect a man in a crew of "swampers" to do his work of cutting down brush, and at the same time protect himself against the danger of trees falling on him cut by men in another crew near by, unless the men cutting the trees, or someone knowing the danger, would give him warning. The fact that the appellant company had adopted rules in regard to giving warning would indicate that there was a necessity for such rules and their enforcement. The respondent was employed to construct a certain bridge or turn-out. The appellant undertook to furnish him the poles or timber for that purpose, and the evidence shows that he had no supervision or control over those who felled the timber and delivered it to him for use in constructing the bridge.

In Cunningham v. Adna Mill Co. 71 Wash. 111, 127 Pac. 850, the court held that fallers in a logging camp are not fellow servants of the members of a crew engaged in hauling logs from the woods where they are left by the fallers, and that the employer failing to have proper warning given before fallers of trees cause them to fall across the haulback line, where plaintiff, a member of the hauling crew, is exposed to unexpected danger, is guilty of actionable negligence. In that case the negligence upon which the action was predicated was the failure to give a signal or warning to the person injured, that a tree was about to fall. In the course of that decision the court said: "The evidence shows that respondent and the fallers were working in separate places, at a different character of employment, and that they were not in view of each other. This being true, the failure of the master to see that a proper warning or signal was given before the fallers, whom respondent could not see, caused a large tree to fall across the haulback line, constituted negligence, as it necessarily exposed respondent to a sudden and unexpected danger. Under such circumstances, it was the nondelegable duty of the master to see that a signal or warning was given." As touching upon the question here involved, see Belleville Stone Co. v. Mooney, 61 N. J. L. 253, 39 L.R.A. 834, 39 Atl. 764, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 264, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 105, which is a well-constructed case. In the course of the decision the court said: We conclude, therefore, that it was part of the defendant's duty to the plaintiff that proper care should be exercised in giving warning of an expected blast. In selecting the person who was to fire the blast as the person to give the warning, the defendant probably chose the man best able to perform that duty; but as the defendant's responsibility extended beyond the selection of an agent, and included the warning itself, it must answer for negligence in the giving of warning, no matter how fit was the chosen agent." Substantially the same doctrine is laid down in Ondis v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. 82 N. J. L. 511, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 81 Atl. 856. That was a case in which there was neglect in giving a warning, and it was held that neglect to give the warning was legally imputed to the employer, as the servants he required to give the warning were not to be regarded in law as fellow servants engaged in a common employment. This doctrine is also recognized in Koerner v. St. Louis Car Co. 209 Mo. 141, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 292, 107 S. W. 481. In that case it was the foreman's duty to give the warning, but, as we view it, that would make no difference, as the faller of the tree and respondent were not fellow servants in regard to the duty of giving the warning or signal. See also Kempfert v. Gas Traction Co. 120 Minn. 90, 139 N. W. 145.

In a very recent decision from Minnesota, — Elenduck v. Crookston Lumber Co. 121 Minn. 53, 140 N. W. 125,—the court recognized that where signals are employed in the general work of the master, and are used solely in directing the movement of machinery or instrumentalities connected with the employment, the signals are mere details of the work, and the failure on the part of servants to give them does not charge the master with liability, and held as follows: "But where the place of work is inherently dangerous, and signals are required by orders of the master, or by common custom, for the protection of the employees, and to provide and to maintain for them the safety of their place of work, and are relied upon by the employees as a means of saving themselves from harm, it becomes the absolute duty of the master to give them, and a failure to do so, though the failure be the neglect of a servant engaged in the common employment, renders the master liable to a servant who is injured in consequence of the neglect. This principle of the law of master and servant is thoroughly settled in this state." And further on in the opinion, the court, commenting on the case of Anderson v. Pittsburgh Coal Co. 108 Minn. 455, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 624, 122 N. W. 794, said: "Counsel's criticisms of the decision in that case are not sound. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

They apparently overlook the essential element made the foundation of that decision, namely, the dangerous character of the work, and the necessity of signals for the protection of employees."

In Anderson v. Pittsburgh Coal Co. supra, the court said: "The rules of law as to how far the master may delegate his duty to his servant appear in a measure to have been rather rendered uncertain than to have been definitely determined by the mass of decision on this subject. The opinion has been frequently expressed, as in Brabbitts v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1875) 38 Wis. 289-299: 'It would be monstrous to allow [the master] to relieve itself from all liability for a breach of that duty [to the servant] by simply charging one of [his] inferior officers or servants with its performance.' This principle has been reiterated times without number by the Wisconsin court and by almost every court in the country. . . . In point of fact the view these and allied authorities have taken is, in large measure, a necessary product of the transition in judicial opinion as to what is the criterion by which it shall be determined who is and who is not a fellow servant. The decisions of courts of other states that, under given circumstances, one servant is a fellow servant of another, are not controlling on this court, unless the criterion by which the relationship is determined is the same as in this jurisdiction, namely, that a fellow servant is one to whom the master has not intrusted the performance of some absolutely nonassignable duty of the master. The Federal courts, having originally announced the test of superior servant, or the doctrine of control, then rejected it, and adopted the separate department theory. It has been quite generally thought that this theory has been, in turn, largely abandoned, and the current test of a vice principal adopted. But in Peters v. George, 83 C. C. A. 408, 154 Fed. 634, Judge Gray said that under the modern rule of the Federal courts the theory of vice principal, as determining the liability of a master, has been largely discarded, and that which is to be considered as merely and solely the negligence of a fellow servant turns rather on the character of the act than on the relation of the employees to each other." In Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 266, 283, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 107, Lord Cranworth said: The master is "bound to guarantee third persons against all hurt arising from the carelessness of himself or of those acting under his orders in the course of his business." More specifically: "No duty required of . . . [the master] for the safety and protection of his servants can be transferred so as to exonerate him from such liability."

If the rule were that an employer can avoid all liability simply by delegating the authority to a servant to give warning of a falling tree, it would be a very easy rule for the employer to follow, to avoid liability, should the servant fail to give the warning and another servant be injured thereby. It is the duty of the master to furnish a reasonably safe place for the servant to work; and, if it requires warning and signals to protect a servant from injury from falling trees cut by other servants, it is the master's duty to see to it that the proper signals are given, and, if the injury is caused by the failure to give the signals, the master is liable. His liability or responsibility extends beyond the selection of a servant or agent to give the signal, and includes the signal itself, and, if the servant neglects to give it, the master must answer for such negligence, as the authority to a servant to give a signal is nondelegable, and the failure to give it is imputed to the master, and the servant employed to give it is not the fellow servant of the injured employee so far as the giving or failure to give the signal is concerned. The master cannot instruct a servant to do or perform a non-assignable or nondelegable duty, and escape liability if the servant neglects to perform such duty, in case injury results to the employee.

We think under the evidence in this case and the law applicable thereto, the appellant was liable for the injuries to the respondent. We therefore conclude that the court did not err in denying appellant's motion for a nonsuit, its motion for a directed verdict, its application for a judgment non obstante veredicto, nor in denying its motion for a new trial.

The judgment is therefore affirmed, with costs in favor of the respondent.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

D. M. MEREDITH, Admr., etc., of J. L. Dibrell, Deceased,

v.

CORA A. DIBRELL et al.
and

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK OF CHARLESTON, Intervener, Appt.

(— Tenn: —, 155 S. W. 163.)

Bills and notes — extension of time — reservation of recourse — necessity of notice.

Notice to the surety of reservation of recourse against him is not necessary when permitting the maker to renew a note, under the provisions of the negotiable instruments act that extension of time to the maker releases the liability of one secondarily liable, unless the right of recourse against him is expressly reserved.

(April 3, 1913.)

APPPEAL by intevener from a decree of the Court of Civil Appeals affirming a decree of the Chancery Court for White County disallowing a claim upon a promissory note in a proceeding to settle the estate of J. L. Dibrell, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. T. Smith for plaintiff.

Mr. J. H. Anderson for defendants.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this suit the estate of J. L. Dibrell, deceased, is being administered and wound up in the chancery court as an insolvent estate.

The Citizens' National Bank of Charleston, West Virginia, has filed a petition in the case to hold said estate liable upon a promissory note, the property of petitioner, which note was executed by C. S. Oldrod, Geo. L. Washburn, and Buch H. Kenney, and signed by the deceased, J. L. Dibrell, as security.

The original note matured after the death of Dibrell, and at its maturity, under the concurrent finding of the chancellor and the court of civil appeals herein, it may be conceded that, by an arrangement between the bank and other parties to the note, a new note was taken, and the time for payment of this obligation extended by valid contract, without notice to the representatives of the deceased.

The chancellor and the court of civil appeals rendered a decree against the bank upon the foregoing facts found by them, overruling another contention made by the bank, which we will now proceed to consider.

Note. — Reservation of rights against party secondarily liable on a bill or note upon granting extension of time to party primarily liable, as preventing discharge of former.

The rule is well settled that if a creditor by a valid and binding agreement, without the assent of a surety, gives further time for payment or performance to the principal debtor, the surety will be discharged. 32 Cyc. 191.

But it is an exception to this rule, equally well settled, that such agreement will not operate to discharge a surety where the agreement itself contains an express reservation of the remedies of the creditor against the surety, or against all persons other than the principal debtor, who may be liable. As stated in effect in MEREDITH v. DIBRELL, the framers of the Only one deposition is taken upon this controversy, that of the cashier of petitioning bank. After testifying to the facts relating to the taking of the renewal note from the other parties to the note, he states that this renewal was taken and this extension given to said parties with the express reservation at the time on the part of the bank of all its rights against the surety, J. L. Dibrell, or his estate.

It is said for the bank that, even though an extension of time be granted upon a valid consideration to the principal debtor, without the knowledge of the surety, such an extension does not release the surety, provided the holder at the time of the extension reserves all rights against the surety.

negotiable instrument act, in adopting such exception, followed a well-settled rule of the common law. Hodges v. Elyton Land Co. 109 Ala. 617, 20 So. 23; Jones v. Sarchett, 61 Iowa, 520, 16 N. The only reported case found which is opposed to the above authorities is Gustine v. Union Bank, 10 Rob. (La.) 412, where it was held that no reservation which a creditor can make in a contract containing a novation of a debt, or allowing a prolongation of time to the principal debtor, can preserve his rights against a surety who was not a party to such contract.

Necessity for notice to party secondarily liable.

The question of necessity for notice to party secondarily liable, of reservation of rights against him, seems to have been discussed in but two cases (Currie v. Hodgins, 42 U. C. Q. B. 601, and Webb v. Hewitt, 3 Kay & J. 438), and these sustain the decision in MEREDITH v. DIBRELL, in holding such notice to be unnecessary.

The negotiable instruments act (chapter 94, § 120, Acts of 1899) provides:

"Sec. 120. Persons secondarily liable, how discharged.—A person secondarily liable on the instrument is discharged:

"(6) By an agreement binding upon the holder to extend the time of payment, or to postpone the holder's right to enforce the instrument, unless made with the assent of the party secondarily liable, or unless the right of recourse against such party is expressly reserved."

The court of civil appeals was of opinion that reservation of the right of recourse against a surety would be unavailing to the holder, and that an extension would release the surety notwithstanding such reservation in the contract with the principal Reason for rule.

It has been said that this exception is grounded upon the principle that, where a contract expressly reserves the remedy of the creditor against other persons, the surety is in no way prejudiced by the agreement. By entering into such an agreement the principal debtor impliedly consents that what ever remedies his sureties have against him shall remain open to them. They are thereafter at liberty to pay the debt at once and proceed immediately against their principal for reimbursement.

And in First Nat. Bank v. Lineberger, 83 N. C. 454, 35 Am. Rep. 582, it was assigned as a reason for this doctrine that the reservation rebuts the implication that the indorser was meant to be discharged; and prevents the rights of the indorser against the maker being impaired. For the indorser, after such an agreement, may immediately pay the debt and bring his action against the maker, and his consent that the creditor shall reserve his remedy against the indorser is impliedly a consent that such indorser shall have recourse against him.

In Webb v. Hewitt, 3 Kay & J. 438, it was said that the authorities have settled that, upon any giving of time to a principal debtor, if there be a reservation of rights against the surety, the surety is not discharged; for, when the right is reserved the principal debtor cannot say it is inconsistent with giving him time that the creditor should be at liberty to proceed against the sureties, and that they should turn around upon the principal debtor, notwithstanding the time so given him; for he was a party to the agreement by which that right was reserved to the creditor, and the question whether or not the surety is informed of the arrangement is wholly immaterial.

And in Hagey v. Hill, 75 Pa. 108, 15 Am. Rep. 583, it was said that "the ground upon which an agreement to give time to the maker, made by the holder without the consent of the indorsers, upon a valid consideration, is held to be a discharge of the indorsers, is solely this, that the holder debtor, unless the surety were informed of the extension. In this we think the learned court was in error.

The language of the negotiable instrument act seems plain. A binding agreement to extend the time of payment under the act will not release the surety, if made with his assent, or if the right of recourse against him is reserved. In neither of these cases is he released.

Such was the law long prior to the passage of the act in question. If the creditor's rights against the surety are reserved, and this reservation made a part of the contract of extension with the principal debtor, the result is only a qualified extension. While it is true the creditor has obligated himself not to proceed against the principal debtor until the maturity of the extension, he has not changed his relations with the surety at all, since he has especially reserved all rights against him, including the right to sue him at once. Inasmuch as this reservation of rights against the surety becomes a consideration of the contract for extension entered into with the debtor, the latter impliedly agrees that the surety may have all his original rights preserved against him as principal debtor; and while the creditor cannot bring suit against the principal pending the extension, the surety, if he pays the debt, may sue the principal at once. Therefore the surety's contract is not changed, and there is no equitable reason to justify his discharge.

"The ground upon which a surety is held discharged when further time for payment is given the principal debtor is that the rights of the surety are varied, as he cannot then, when the debt is due and payable, make payment, and thus put himself in the thereby impliedly stipulates not to pursue the indorsers, or to seek satisfaction from them in the intermediate period. It can never apply to any case where a contrary stipulation exists between the parties. Hence, if the agreement for delay expressly saves and reserves the rights of the holder in the intermediate time against the indorsers, it will not discharge the latter. In such case the very ground of the objection is removed, for their rights are not postponed against the maker, if they should take up the note."

And in Salmon v. Clagett, 3 Bland Ch. 125, it was said: "The giving of time to the principal debtor, with a reservation of the remedies, has, in many cases, the appearance of absurdity; because, when distinctly understood, it seems to be almost a flat contradiction in terms. Such a reservation of remedies, in order to hold the surety bound, must amount to this, that the creditor agrees to give time to the debtor; and yet that they both agree that the surety may, at any time, force the place of the creditor according to the original implied contract, and enforce repayment from the principal. Where the remedies of the creditor are reserved against the sureties, notwithstanding the new agreement with the principal, the situation of the sureties is not varied, and the rule does not apply. . . . When the creditor proceeds against the surety in such case, and the surety pays, he is then entitled to the place of creditor, as it was originally, and may in turn enforce the principal, who may not set up against the surety the new arrangement with the creditor." Morgan v. Smith, 70 N. Y. 537.

"Such an agreement, reserving the remedies, might not in many cases be of the least benefit to the principal debtor, since it leaves him entirely at the mercy of his surety; yet if the parties do so expressly contract, the surety can have no cause to complain that the implied contract has been altered or impaired in any way to his prejudice, and therefore he cannot be discharged." Salmon v. Clagett, 3 Bland, Ch. 125.

"It is very obvious that a principal debtor may gain little or nothing by such a composition as this with his creditor, inasmuch as he is left liable to the like proceedings against him by his sureties, which his creditor might have instituted if no composition had been made. But if he pleases to subject himself to that liability by voluntarily executing an agreement which has that effect, there is no legal reason why he should not be held to that agreement." Sohier v. Loring, 6 Cush. 537. See Stearns, Suretyship, § 92; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 326; Byles, Bills 3d ed. 299; Brandt, Suretyship, § 329.

creditor to proceed against the principal by a bill quia timet, or, by paying the whole debt, have an assignment of all the securities and proceed immediately himself against the principal debtor, or in any other mode authorized by the assigned securities. Such an agreement, reserving the remedies, might not, in many cases, be of the least benefit to the principal debtor, since it leaves him entirely at the mercy of his surety; yet if the parties do so expressly contract, the surety can have no cause to complain that the implied contract has been altered or impaired in any way to his prejudice; and therefore he cannot be discharged."

As to effect under negotiable instrument law of extension of time to principal, to release a surety, see notes to Vanderford v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 129; Richards v. Market Exch. Bank Co. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 99; and to Northern State Bank v. Billamy, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 149.

J. H. B.

Reference to the text-books and cases cited thereunder show that this principle of the law of suretyship has been generally accepted in this country and in England for many years, and it is undoubtedly sound. The negotiable instruments act merely embodied an old rule into the statute.

We do not think that the sureties' remedy under § 3517 of Shannon's Code would be at all embarrassed by the making of such a contract between the principal debtor and the holder of a note. As seen, these contracts do not affect the rights of the surety at all, and while the creditor, by a valid contract of extension, does disable himself from bringing suit in his own interest during that extension against the principal debtor, he would still be required, upon notice given, under Shannon's Code, § 3517, to bring such a suit at the behest of the surety. The debtor has impliedly agreed that all the surety's original rights shall be preserved.

Prior to the adoption of § 3517 of Shannon's Code, a surety could go into equity and compel a suit by the creditor against the principal debtor. This statute merely gives him a more speedy remedy. A contract for extension, such as the one made between the bank and the principal debtors in this case, does not deprive the surety of any rights which he has under the statute or otherwise, and therefore such a contract for extension does not release him from his obligation.

The decree of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the Chancellor will be reversed, and this cause remanded to the Chancery Court of White County for further proceedings.

FARMERS' & MERCHANTS' STATE BANK OF GREENLEAF, KANSAS,
v.

JOHN SUTHERLIN, Appt.

(93 Neb. 707, 141 N. W. 827.)

Chattel mortgage — description — sufficiency.

1. A description in a chattel mortgage, which will enable a third person, aided by inquiries which the instrument itself suggests, to identify the property, is sufficiently definite.

Headnotes by LETTON, J.

Note. — As to necessity of recording instrument creating a lien or reserving title to personal property, in state to which property is subsequently removed, see notes to Snider v. Yates, 64 L.R.A. 356, and 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Same — taking property out of state — effect.

2. Where a mortgagor removes property from another state into this state, without the consent of the mortgagee, which has been encumbered by a mortgage duly recorded and valid under the laws of the former state, such removal does not invalidate the recording of such mortgage, nor necessitate the recording of it again in the county in this state to which the mortgagor has removed with the property.

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in replevin to recover possession of a horse. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals.

The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts, which shows that on the 11th day of October, 1909, M. M. O'Leary and I. E. Reed executed and delivered to the plaintiff at its bank in Greenleaf, Kansas, a mortgage note for the sum of $375, due in one year from that date, and pledged as security for the debt: "One span of bay geldings, 7 and 8 years of age, weight about 2,500 lbs., named 'Charlie and John.' One 1½ work harness, one 3½ lumber wagon, all property this day bought of Guy Scott." The mortgage was filed for record on the 12th day of October, 1909, in the office of the register of deeds of Washington county, Kansas, and duly recorded in Book 31 of Chattel Mortgage Records of said county, as required by the laws of Kansas. The mortgage was never at any time filed or recorded in Gage county, nor in any other county in Nebraska. About May 1, 1910, O'Leary being then in Wymore, Nebraska, and having one of the horses in his possession, sold the same to the defendant, John Sutherlin. Sutherlin had no actual notice of the fact that the horse was mortgaged, and acted in good faith. It is admitted that the debt secured by the note had not been paid at the time this suit was commenced, and that the horse was taken from Washington county, Kansas, without the consent of the mortgagee.

Appellant contends: First, that the mortgage is void for uncertainty in the description; second, that the filing or recording of a chattel mortgage in Kansas is not constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser in good faith in Nebraska.

1. The rule adopted in Kansas as to the sufficiency of a description in a chattel mortgage is that "a description which will enable a third person, aided by inquiries which the instrument itself suggests, to identify the property, is sufficient." Mills v. Kansas Lumber Co. 26 Kan. 574; Griffiths v. Wheeler, 31 Kan. 17, 2 Pac. 842; Inter-State Galloway Cattle Co. v. McLain, 42 Kan. 680, 22 Pac. 728. The mortgage, therefore, was not void as indefinite in that state. The rule in Nebraska is identical Rawlins v. Kennard, 26 Neb. 181, 41 N. W. 1004; Union State Bank v. Hutton, 61 Neb. 571, 85 N. W. 535. We conclude, therefore, that the description is sufficiently definite.

2. The most important point is whether the mortgage is valid in this state against an innocent purchaser of the property from the mortgagor, the mortgage not having been filed in the office of the county clerk in any county in this state. This seems to be a new question in this court. The general rule as stated in Jones, Chattel Mortgages, 5th ed. § 299, is as follows: "The law of the place of contract, when this is also the place where the property is, governs as to the nature, validity, construction, and effect of a mortgage, which will be enforced in another state as a matter of comity, although not executed or recorded according to the requirement of the law of the latter state." In support of this general principle cases are cited from Alabama, Arkansas, Connecticut, Kansas, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mis-

Mississippi, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Utah, and Wyoming.

A different rule prevails in those states which have not substituted the filing or recording of chattel mortgages for the delivery of possession of the property pledged, as is required at common law, and also in such states as require by statute the refileing or recording of mortgages on property brought from other states. Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 300.

In Corbett v. Littlefield, 84 Mich. 30, 11 L.R.A. 95, 22 Am. St. Rep. 681, 47 N. W. 581, the supreme court of Michigan refused to enforce a chattel mortgage, given in Nebraska and duly filed in this state, from one citizen of this state to another, on property within the state which was taken to Michigan without the consent of the mortgagee. This holding is an exception to the general rules of comity prevailing between the states, and is in conflict with that of the majority of courts in this country.

This court has heretofore held, on the authority of Snyder v. Yates, 112 Tenn. 309, 64 L.R.A. 353, 105 Am. St. Rep. 941, 79 S. W. 796, that a chattel mortgage duly recorded in one state will not, under the doctrine of comity, be given priority by the courts of another state to which the chattels are removed with the consent of the mortgagee over local attaching creditors who had no actual notice of the mortgage. Pennington County Bank v. Bauman, 87 Neb. 25, 126 N. W. 654. The decision in the latter case seems to have been mainly based upon another ground. In any event, it would seem that there is a distinction between a case where a mortgagee voluntarily permits the mortgagor to remove the same into another state, there to become subject to the laws of that state, and a case where the property is moved without his consent, and regardless of the rights secured to him by mortgage. In the one case he is willing to place his security in a position where his rights may come in conflict with those of the citizens of the state to which the property is removed, and he has no right to complain if the courts of that state hold that he has waived his right of priority by failing to take possession, and that his claims are subsequent to that of its own citizens. In the other case his property has been taken away in despite of him and without his consent, and he must rely upon the comity of the state to which it has been taken to enforce the validity of the contract and protect his rights.

The states of Kansas and Nebraska are divided by an imaginary line over 300 miles long. So far as commercial transactions of the border counties are concerned, they practically constitute one commonwealth. We believe that considerations of comity and of the value of active commercial intercourse require the enforcement of the rights of the mortgagee, even as we would enforce the rights of a citizen of this state holding a duly filed chattel mortgage against a purchaser of property living in a county of this state hundreds of miles removed from the place of contract, and without actual notice of the existence of the mortgage.

In Handley v. Harris, 48 Kan. 606, 17 L.R.A. 703, 30 Am. St. Rep. 322, 29 Pac. 1145, the facts were that certain personal property was mortgaged in Nebraska, the mortgage duly filed and recorded here, and the property taken to Kansas by the mortgagor, and there sold and delivered by him to a purchaser without notice. The mortgagee brought replevin and prevailed, the court holding that "where a mortgagor removes property from another state into this state, which has been encumbered by a mortgage duly recorded and valid under the laws of the former state, such removal does not invalidate the recording of such mortgage, nor necessitate the recording of it again in the county in this state to which the mortgagor has removed with the property. The constructive notice imparted by the recording of such mortgage, by the law of comity between the different states, is not confined to the county or state where the mortgage was executed and the property then was, but covers the property wherever it is removed." This case was followed in Ord Nat. Bank v. Massey, 48 Kan. 702, 17 L.R.A. 127, 30 Pac. 124, in which another Nebraska mortgage was held to be valid in Kansas without refileing.

The principles of comity should apply equally well both north and south of the Kansas-Nebraska line, and since our sister commonwealth has accorded to our citizens the right to follow property upon which they hold a lien, it would be but a poor return if we failed to accord the same right to the citizens of Kansas. We prefer not to adopt the views expressed by the Michigan court, and to hold that the buyer only obtained the rights of the seller subject to the mortgage lien.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MRS. HELEN BEACH

v.

ROSA BEACH, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 141 N. W. 921.)

Fraud — inducing marriage — representations as to property.

1. A person who, to induce a marriage

Note. — Liability for fraud in inducing one to marry a third person.

An action lies for fraudulent misrepresentations inducing marriage the amount of damages recoverable depending on the circumstances of the particular case.

Thus, a man who induces another to marry a girl by false representations that she is virtuous when, in fact, she has been seduced by himself, and has become pregnant, is liable for damages, including exemplary damages, in an action by the husband for fraud; and irrespective of any pecuniary damages, an action for such a wrong may be founded upon the broad ground of loss of consortium. Kujek v. Goldman, 150 N. Y. 176, 34 L.R.A. 156, 55 Am. St. Rep. 670, 44 N. E. 773, affirming 5 Misc. 360, 25 N. Y. Supp. 753, affirmed in 9 Misc. 34, 31 Abb. N. C. 314, 29 N. Y. Supp. 294.

The following cases rest upon the principle that fraudulent representations as to the pecuniary condition of one party to a proposed marriage, made by a third person to the other party thereto, in order to promote the marriage, are actionable, and authorize the recovery of such damages as may be proved, and the guilty person was held responsible for his representations:

—that a party was free from debt. Redman v. Redman, 1 Vern. 348; Neville v. Wilkinson, 1 Bro. Ch. 543; —that a party was good financially, by giving note without consideration (Montefiori v. Montefiori, 1 W. Bl. 363; or making loan and secretly taking bond (Gale v. Lindo, 1 Vern. 475; or releasing jointure that son might make settlement the son privately agreeing to assign leasehold (Lamlee v. Hanman, 2 Vern. 466); —that party was the absolute and sole owner of real estate. Scott v. Scott, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 386; Webber v. Farmer, 4 Bro. P. C. 170.

So, where defendant, after acquiring a devisee's interest in real estate, which was subject to be defeated by the latter's death without issue, induced a woman to marry the devisee by falsely and fraudulently representing to her that he had a fine property so left to him that if he married and had an heir, the land would go to the heir, it was held in Piper v. Hoard, 107 N. Y. 73, 1 Am. St. Rep. 789, 13 N. E. 626, that defendant must be considered as holding the property as trustee ex maleficio and was bound to make good his representations to the heir and only child subsequently born 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

with her son, falsely represents that the son is the owner of certain specified real estate, is liable in damages to a woman who enters into a marriage with the son in reliance on the representations.

Damages — representation as to title to property — inducing marriage.

2. One third of the present value of the property is not the proper measure of damages in case a parent induces a woman to marry her son by fraudulently representing of the marriage who would have been entitled to the property had his representations been true. The court said: "It is true the plaintiff was not born when the fraudulent representations were made. Still they were made by defendant to plaintiff's mother for the purpose of inducing a marriage between the parents, and if they had been true the plaintiff would have been the owner of this particular property. In this way she is the very person injured by the fraud, and, although not individually in the mind of defendant when he perpetrated that fraud, yet, as filling the position of heir to her father, she belongs to the class which defendant had in contemplation when he represented to the mother that the heir of Frederick would have the farm." The court further remarked: "If the most that can be said is that the case is novel, and is not brought plainly within the limits of some adjudged case, we think such fact not enough to call for a reversal of this judgment."

But in Brennen v. Brennen, 19 Ont. Rep. 327, an action by the wife against the husband's relatives for damages for false representations made to her before marriage as to the character and financial standing of her husband, and for entering into a fraudulent conspiracy to induce the plaintiff to enter into the marriage contract, was held not maintainable as being without precedent and contrary to public policy.

In Kujek v. Goldman, supra, however, the court said that the question was not whether there was any precedent for the action but whether the defendant inflicted such a wrong upon the plaintiff as resulted in lawful damages, and quoted in this connection the passage above quoted from Piper v. Hoard.

It was held in Roberts v. Roberts, 3 P. Wms. 66, that where a father, to further the marriage of his son, paid him £1,000, and the son, in order to promote the father's second marriage, released the thousand pounds, but took a private bond from the father for its payment, equity would not set aside the bond, because it would be injurious to the first marriage which, being prior in time, was to be preferred.

As to fraudulent inducement by one party to void marriage as ground for civil action in favor of the other, see Sears v. Wegner, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 819, and note to Morrill v. Palmer, 33 L.R.A. 411.

J. D. C.

that the son is the owner of a specified parcel of real estate.

Fraud — elements of action for deceit.

3. To render one liable in damages for deceit, he must have knowingly made a false representation with intent to deceive, and it must have been acted upon by another to his injury, without notice of the falsity.

Evidence — intent — action for fraud.

4. One charged with deceit in making false representations for another to act upon may testify as to the intent with which they were made.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lee County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for fraudulent representations made by defendant to induce marriage between plaintiff and her son. Reversed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Action for deceit, brought by plaintiff against defendant, who is her mother-in-law, in which she claimed that she was induced to enter into a marriage with defendant's son by reason of certain false and fraudulent representations regarding the ownership of certain land. Defendant pleaded a general denial, and, on the issues so joined, the case was tried to a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,600, and defendant appeals.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a novel and unusual action, and the petition upon which it was tried contains so succinct a statement of plaintiff's claim that we here quote from it as follows: "That she is the wife of August Beach, and was married to him about . . . 1907; that August Beach, her husband, had lived with defendant, Rosa Beach, and her husband, now deceased, before their marriage, and was living with his mother on the farm at the time of the marriage 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

between plaintiff and August Beach; that the defendant, Rosa Beach, was solicitous to have her son, August Beach, marry, and in the name of her son, without his knowledge or consent, sought correspondence with the plaintiff, signing and using her son's name, and leading the plaintiff to believe that August Beach was the owner in fee simple of the farm on which he and the defendant, Rosa Beach, were at the time residing, viz., the N. $\frac{1}{4}$, S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, section 25, township 69 north, range 5 west, in Lee county, Iowa, which is of the reasonable value of \$8,000; that the representations made in the said correspondence induced the plaintiff to accept said August Beach in marriage; that the said misrepresentations made by the said defendant Rosa Beach, were false and fraudulent, and tended to deceive, and did deceive, the plaintiff; that not until long after their marriage did she (the plaintiff) learn that her husband, August Beach, was not the owner of the farm that the said defendant, Rosa Beach, led her to believe belonged to him, but the same belonged to the said defendant, Rosa Beach, and that her husband had no interest therein; that the plaintiff, by said false and fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendant, Rosa Beach, has been damaged in the sum of \$5,000." The defendant did not challenge the sufficiency of the pleading by demurrer, but answered, denying generally the allegations thereof, and further pleaded that plaintiff suffered no damages whatever by reason of the alleged representations. After the verdict was rendered, the defendant filed a motion in arrest for the reason that the petition did not state a cause of action. She also filed a motion for a new trial based upon many grounds, to some of which we shall refer during the course of the opinion.

Testimony was adduced in support of every allegation of the petition, and the first question to be considered is, Does the petition state a cause of action?

1. In law, marriage is a civil contract, requiring the consent of parties capable of entering into other contracts, except as otherwise declared. Code, § 3139; Brisbin v. Huntington, 128 Iowa, 166, 103 N. W. 144, 5 Ann. Cas. 931. With its religious aspect or its sanctity, courts have nothing to do. The law of marriage, in so far as property interests are concerned, is founded on business principles, in which the utmost good faith is required from all the parties, and the least fraud in connection therewith is the subject of judicial cognizance.

In Piper v. Hoard, 107 N. Y. 77, 1 Am. St. Rep. 789, 13 N. E. 629, the court of appeals of New York said: "To say of plaintiff's mother, therefore, that she was too ready to marry a man because of the money he had, or would necessarily leave a child of the marriage, or that she was an adventuress, induced to marry solely by fraudulent representations as to the pecuniary condition of her husband, does not, as I have said, furnish the least reason for refusing relief to plaintiff, if she be otherwise entitled to it. If her mother had not been induced to marry by any such pecuniary considerations, clearly no cause of action would exist. It is because such considerations were the moving ones, and were induced by the fraud of defendant, that the plaintiff bases her right of action. There are some anomalies in the law relative to contracts or negotiations having marriage for their consideration, and such contracts are based upon considerations which obtain in no other contract. The family relations and their regulations are so much a matter of public policy that the law in relation to them is based on principles not applicable in other cases; and all business negotiations have marriage for their end are regarded in much the same light by our courts. Thus, a particeps criminis in the fraud has been permitted to recover in his own name against one who was no more guilty than he, when the marriage had taken place by reason of such fraud."

Even though it be said that the parties take each other for better or for worse, it has quite frequently been held that a woman who is deceived into entering into a void marriage with a man already married may maintain an action against him for deceit. Morrill v. Palmer, 68 Vt. 1, 33 L.R.A. 411, 33 Atl. 829, and cases cited; Blossom v. Barrett, 37 N. Y. 434, 97 Am. Dec. 747; Pollock v. Sullivan, 53 Vt. 507, 38 Am. Rep. 702; Sears v. Wegner, 150 Mich. 388, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 819, 114 N. W. 224. So, too, it has been held that a man who induced another to marry a girl by false representations that she is virtuous, when, in fact, she has been seduced by himself and has become pregnant, is liable for damages in an action by the husband for fraud. Kujek v. Goldman, 150 N. Y. 176, 34 L.R.A. 156, 55 Am. St. Rep. 670, 44 N. E. 773.

In the instant case the charge is that, by false and fraudulent representations as to her son's ownership of land, defendant deceived the plaintiff and induced her to marry her son, to her damage, etc.

"In Neville v. Wilkinson, 1 Bro. Ch. 543 (decided in 1782), the plaintiff was the individual who desired to marry his coplaintiff's daughter, and he and the defendant, who was an attorney to whom he owed a large amount of money, agreed that defendant should represent to the father that the debt was much less than in truth it was. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

He did so, and after marriage he brought an action on a bond which would have made the debt in excess of the amount represented, and the plaintiff, the particeps criminis, was permitted to succeed in an action brought by him and his father-in-law to compel the surrender of the bond. . . . The English courts have held that a person who, by acts or speech, represents property as belonging to the proposed husband, when the possession thereof forms an inducement to the marriage, shall be bound to make good the thing in the manner represented. Such is the case of Montefiori v. Montefiori, 1 W. Bl. 363 (Easter term 1762, Mansfield, Ch. J.). The facts of the case were these: Montefiori being engaged in a marriage treaty, his brother Moses, to assist him in his designs and represent him as a man of fortune, gave him a note for a large amount of money as the balance of accounts between him and his brother Joseph, which balance he acknowledged to have in his hands, though in truth none existed. This note was shown by Joseph to the parents of the intended wife, and was an inducement to the marriage. After the marriage, Moses desired to reclaim the note so given without consideration, and the matter was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators awarded the note to be given up, which Joseph refused to do, and the case then came up on motion for an attachment against Joseph for nonperformance of the award, and Joseph made a cross motion to set aside the award. Chief Justice Mansfield held that where there were proposals of marriage, and third persons represented anything in a light different from the truth, even though by collusion with the husband, they shall be bound to make good the thing in the manner in which they represented it. It shall be as represented to be, and the husband alone shall be entitled to relief, as well as when the fortune has been specifically settled on the wife. Atherly, in his work on Marriage Settlements (27 Law Lib. chap. 34, *484), after citing the above case, says that the principle upon which the court proceeds in such cases, when the thing is not actually made the subject of the settlement, must be this, as he conceives, that, as the wife must be presumed to agree to the marriage as well in expectation of the present support which she and her children will receive from her husband, as of the provision which he may have made for them after his death, that a person who has been at all concerned in raising such expectation shall not be suffered in any wise to disappoint it." See also Piper v. Hoard, 107 N. Y. 76, 1 Am. St. Rep. 789, 13 N. E. 629, in which Peckham, J., said, among other things: ". . . Such fraud is not in the least mitigated in its character by the statement that it consisted of fraudulent representations made to a woman to induce her to consent to a marriage in which the mercenary motive was the strong, if not the only, one. The fact that she was ready and desirous of bettering her condition, even though it was by a mercenary marriage, does not alter the other fact that the defendant enjoys property which he has acquired by successful perpetration of a fraud, and which, if the fraudulent representations by which he acquired it had been true, the plaintiff herein would be herself entitled to enjoy as owner." Again, in Kujek v. Goldman, supra, the same court said: "It is difficult to see why a fraud which, if practised with reference to a contract relating to property merely, would support an action, should not be given the same effect when it involves a contract affecting not only property rights, but also the most sacred relation of life. Fraudulent representations with reference to the amount of property belonging to either party to a proposed marriage, made by a third person for the purpose of bringing about the marriage, are held to constitute an actionable wrong, and the usual remedy is to require the person guilty of the fraud to make his representations good. Piper v. Hard, supra; Montefiori v. Montefiori, 1 W. Bl. 363; Atherly, Marriage Settlements, 484. In such cases the injury is more tangible, and the measure of damages more readily applied, than in the case before us, but both rest upon the principle that he who, by falsehood and fraud, induces a man to marry a woman, is guilty of a wrong that may be remedied by an action, the amount of damages to be recovered depending upon the circumstances of the particular case."

Indeed, the writer of the article on Fraud in 20 Cyc. says, at page 79, that instances where the guilty person has, in some way, been compelled to make good his representations, are frequent, citing, among other cases, Neville v. Wilkinson, 1 Bro. Ch. 543; Scott v. Scott, 1 Cox. Ch. Cas. 366. The only case which has been cited as holding to the contrary is Brennen v. Brennen, 19 Ont. Rep. 327. That was an action brought by a wife against her husband and his mother and father, in which it was claimed that the father and mother commenced negotiations with plaintiff for the purpose of bringing about a marriage with their son, and in which plaintiff claimed that they "represented . . . that the said Joseph Scott Brennen [their son] was a sober man and never drank any intoxicating liquor. That he, the said Joseph Brennen, was and always had been a man of unblemished moral character and reputation. That he, the said Joseph Scott Brennen, was a member of the very large and prosperous firm of M. Brennen & Sons, then and still doing business in the said city of Hamilton. That he, the said Joseph Scott Brennen, had an income of $3,000 per annum. That he, the said Joseph Scott Brennen, had an income of $3,000 per annum over and above the income which he had as a partner in the said firm of M. Brennen & Sons." She further alleged that these representations were false and fraudulent, and made with intent to deceive. The defendants demurred, and Falconbridge, J., said: "The law, it has been observed, makes no provision for the relief of a blind credulity, however it may have been produced; per Lord Stowell in Wakefield v. Mackay, 1 Phillim, Eccl. Rep. at p. 137: 'Fraudulent misrepresentations of one party as to birth, social position, fortune, good health, and temperament cannot vitiate the contract. Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 23; Ewing v. Wheatley, 2 Haag. Consist. Rep. 175. Nor even does the concealment of previous unchaste and immoral behavior in general vitiate a marriage, for public policy is said to 'open marriage as the gateway to repentance and virtue.' The maxim caveat emptor seems as brutally and necessarily applicable to the case of marrying and taking in marriage as it is to the purchase of a rood of land or of a horse. A fortiori the present action cannot be maintained. There has been a change of the position of the parties which can never be revoked. They can never be replaced in their original status; and it would be against public policy, against public morals, and fraught with the greatest damage to the most sacred of the domestic relations, if the plaintiff should be entitled to succeed. That such an action should lie is doubly against public policy in this; that, if maintained at all, I see no reason why it should not be equally maintainable whether the husband and wife are or are not living together amicably, so that, if it be a wrong sounding in damages for a woman to be linked for life to a man of evil moral character, the astounding spectacle could be presented of a wife launching from the shelter of her husband's house an action against that husband's relatives for misrepresenting his character and conduct before his marriage. . . . She took her chances and must now, as far as this court is concerned, read into her contract the words 'for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer.' The praise of the father, the brother, and particularly of the mother is simplex commendatio quæ non obligat. I was impressed by the difficulty of giving any proper direction to the jury as to the measure of damages on the different branches of the case. Other objections to plaintiff's right to recover were urged, both by way of demurrer and on the facts. I rest my judgment on the want of precedent for such an action, and on its being clearly, in my opinion, against public policy. The action will be dismissed, with costs." As will be observed, the judge writing the opinion was not advised as to the nature of the authorities either in England or in this country. Doubtless, the representations in that case as to the character of the son were not actionable, and so also representations as to his earning capacity would not support an action. But it does not follow that representations as to the ownership of specific land, in which the wife immediately upon the marriage, would have a dowerable interest which could not be devised save by her own act, particularly if it were homestead in character, would not be actionable. Indeed, all the cases which have spoken on the subject seem to hold that an action for deceit will lie. The chief difficulty in such cases lies in stating any rule for the admeasurement of damages; and this brings us to the second vital proposition relied upon for a reversal.

2. The trial court instructed as follows upon the measure of damages: "(22) If, from the evidence under the law as defined in the instructions given you by the court, the jury finds a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, then you will allow the plaintiff as damages one third of the present market value of the 80-acre farm in question, as shown by the evidence introduced on this trial bearing upon that subject." Manifestly this instruction was erroneous. Whether or not, in a proper action in equity, plaintiff might have had a trust declared in the land for her use and benefit, should she have survived her husband, is not now before us. The sole question is, How much is she entitled to by way of damages for the deceit, if any, practised upon her? Had the son owned the land, as represented, plaintiff, upon her marriage to him, would have had nothing more than an inchoate right of dower therein, which might never have become consummate because of her death before her husband, and was subject to be defeated by judicial sale during her life. At most, she might, perhaps, have had a homestead right of which she could not have been deprived during life, but which ceased, so far as she was concerned, during her life. Doubtless the value of the land might be considered as bearing upon the support which she might reasonably have expected during life, and the society in which she might have moved, and the station in life which she might have occupied. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But it is manifestly erroneous to give her presently the full one third of the market value of the land, as if she were entitled to dower consummate therein, as damages due to defendant's deceit. That she was not entitled to, nor would she ever have received, it in person, unless her husband died before she did. In no case has it ever been held that a married woman is entitled to recover the value of her one-third interest in her husband's estate, while such third remains inchoate. Such inchoate right will, of course, be protected in a court of equity, but action for the value thereof will not lie until the husband's death. The plain reason for this is that dower is inchoate and may never vest. Unless she survives her husband, it does not vest, and she is not entitled to convert this inchoate right into cash, even as against a wrongdoer. No cases are cited holding to a contrary doctrine, and, if any such were to be found, we should not be inclined to follow them.

The damages in such cases are to be found by a jury, and of necessity are somewhat speculative in character. We have already indicated the matters which may be considered, and these are all subject to be defeated by plaintiff's death. The trial court should, in its instructions upon this subject, indicate what might be considered as a present loss to the plaintiff by reason of the fact, that her husband did not own the land, and such as the evidence shows she was reasonably certain to lose in the future, depending somewhat upon her expectancy of life and the expectancy of life of her husband, and leave it to the jury to find what amount will make good her loss, present and prospective.

3. The eighth instruction given by the court reads as follows: "(8) If the jury finds from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, Rosa Beach, represented to the plaintiff that August Beach was the owner of the 80 acres of land in question, then such representations were false, and, if the jury finds that plaintiff relied thereon in becoming the wife of August Beach, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff." This and other instructions of like import were erroneous in that they failed to include knowledge of the falsity of the statements and intent on the part of the defendant to deceive. Of course, if one makes a false representation knowing it to be false, the law infers that he did it to deceive (Boddy v. Henry, 126 Iowa, 31, 101 N. W. 447); but the general rule in actions at law for deceit is that plaintiff must show a false representation of fact, with knowledge of its falsity and with intent to deceive, and that the person to whom made acted upon it and thereby suffered an injury. Ley v. Metro- politan L. Ins. Co. 120 Iowa, 203, 94 N. W. 568; Avery v. Chapman, 62 Iowa, 144, 17 N. W. 454; Allison v. Jack, 76 Iowa, 205, 40 N. W. 811; Clement v. Swanson, 110 Iowa, 106, 81 N. W. 233; Sylvester v. Henrich, 93 Iowa, 489, 61 N. W. 942; Gee v. Moss, 68 Iowa, 318, 27 N. W. 268; Scroggin v. Wood, 87 Iowa, 497, 54 N. W. 437.

4. The intent of the defendant being a material element of the charge, defendant should have been permitted to testify thereto. An examination of the record also convinces us that the cross-examination of plaintiff was too narrowly limited by the trial court. Some other errors appear which are not likely to arise upon a retrial, and we do not stop to consider them at this time.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment must be, and it is, reversed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

CHARLES W. CHRISTOPHER
v.

THOMAS B. AKIN.

(214 Mass. 332, 101 N. E. 971.)

Slander — charging employee with larceny — privilege.

A statement by an employer who has

Note. — Libel and slander: privilege as to communications made in response to inquiries by person defamed.

As to qualified privilege as to communications to employer with respect to employee, see note to Trimble v. Morrish, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1017.

As to liability growing out of the giving or refusing of information affecting the character or reputation of servant, see note to Wabash R. Co. v. Young, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1098.

The present note includes only civil cases where the statement complained of was made at the request of the one defamed, or his authorized agent, and a claim of privilege was raised. The note does not include cases passing upon the privilege of communications made at the request of prospective employers.

It may be laid down as a general rule that where defamatory matter is published in response to inquiries made by the one defamed, or his authorized agent, it is qualifiedly privileged, if it does not go beyond the scope of the inquiries. 25 Cyc. 392.

In the following cases statements made at the request of the one defamed were held privileged: Billings v. Fairbanks, 136 Mass. 177 (charging larceny, where plain-been compelled to pay for property taken from a house where he was doing work, to an employee whom he discharges because he suspects him of having taken the property, and from whose pay he has deducted its value, in response to a question as to the cause of the deduction, that it was for property which the employee stole on the specified job, is privileged, although made in the presence of other employees.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Bristol County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for an alleged slander, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Mayhew R. Hitch, for defendant:

Where defamatory matter is published in the form of an answer made to inquiries by the plaintiff, the answer is privileged.

Leland, 29 Me. 233 (statements before church committee and plaintiff's attorney, at his request); Remington v. Congdon, 2 Pick. 310, 13 Am. Dec. 431 (bona fide charges by nonmember of church, where plaintiff consented that church might investigate written charges against him); Patterson v. Frazer, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 1077 (where, at plaintiff's solicitation, language was used which, in connection with plaintiff's statements, imputed want of chastity); Louisville Times Co. v. Lancaster, 142 Ky. 122, 133 S. W. 1155 (publication of retraction of newspaper article, at request of one claiming to have been libeled); Beeler v. Jackson, 64 Md. 589, 2 Atl. 916 (bona fide statement by station agent, made in reply to plaintiff's inquiry as to cause of discharge); Middleby

The plaintiff in this case probably complains of the word "stole," but any form of words which imputed a theft, no matter how guarded, would have been just as actionable.

Pond v. Hartwell, 17 Pick. 269.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was a journeyman painter in the employ of the defendant, and was at

v. Effer, 55 C. C. A. 355, 118 Fed. 261 (statements made by husband in response to question to wife).

And it has been held that an answer alleging that the plaintiff consented to and authorized the publication of the defamatory matter complained of states a perfect defense. Connors v. Collier, 65 Misc. 169, 119 N. Y. Supp. 513.

And that evidence is admissible on behalf of the defendant in a libel suit, to show that a statement complained of was issued with the consent and by the authority of the plaintiff. Schoepflin v. Coffey, 162 N. Y. 12, 56 N. E. 502, reversing 25 App. Div. 438, 49 N. Y. Supp. 627.

In some cases it has been held that the maxim non fit injuria applies in case of defamatory statements which are made at the request of the one to whom they relate. Shinglemeyer v. Wright, 124 Mich. 230, 50 L.R.A. 129, 82 N. W. 887 (where plaintiff solicited statement and sent for an officer to be present to hear it); Heller v. Howard, 11 Ill. App. 554 (repetition of former statement at plaintiff's request, in presence of third person).

And where the one defamed procures a communication to be made for the purpose of founding a suit thereon, it is clear that he cannot sustain his action.

Thus, no action can be maintained an account of a communication made to one who acted as plaintiff's agent, and who procured it with view to bringing a suit. Howland v. George F. Blake Mfg. Co. 156 Mass. 543, 31 N. E. 656. The court said: "If the defendant is guilty of no wrong against the plaintiff except a wrong invited and procured by the plaintiff for the purpose of making it the foundation of an action, it would be most unjust that the procurer of the wrongful act should be permitted to profit by it."

And to the same effect are Miller v. Donovan, 16 Misc. 453, 39 N. Y. Supp. 820; and Stevenson v. Ward, 48 App. Div. 291, 62 N. Y. Supp. 717.

It is also held that defamatory statements made at the request of the authorized work on the house of one Tillinghast. Tillinghast complained to the defendant that some of his men had stolen a putty knife and other property belonging to him. The defendant recompensed Tillinghast for the property, and testified that he was told by one of his men that the plaintiff had admitted to him that he took the putty knife. The men were paid off by the defendant at his shop Saturday night,—their time being made up to Wednesday. Their pay was handed to them in envelopes. When a man was discharged his envelop contained his pay up to Saturday night. The plaintiff's envelop contained his pay in full, less what the defendant had paid Tillinghast for the property, with a bill for it. There were four or five men in the shop waiting to be paid off.

agent of the one defamed are privileged. Wells v. Lindop, 13 Ont. Rep. 434 (statement charging larceny, made in response to wife's authorized demand for husband's pay); Irish-American Bank v. Bader, 59 Minn. 329, 61 N. W. 328 (statement concerning standing of bank, made at cashier's request); Hopwood v. Thorn, 8 C. B. 293, 19 L. J. C. P. N. S. 94, 14 Jur. 87 (statement concerning minister, made in answer to authorized communication from plaintiff's friend).

And in White v. Newcomb, 25 App. Div. 397, 49 N. Y. Supp. 704, it was held that if the defendant was induced to make the statements complained of by reason of the false representations of detectives sent by the plaintiff to obtain the statements, to the effect that they sought the information for their own protection, no recovery could be had.

And in Schultz v. Guldenstein, 144 Mich. 636, 108 N. W. 96, where the evidence was to the authority of the plaintiff's husband to interview the defendant on her behalf was conflicting, the case was held properly submitted to the jury, with instructions that if they found the interviews to have taken place by direction of, or through an understanding with, the plaintiff, and the defendant made honest answers, the communications were privileged.

And the court in Melcher v. Beeler, 48 Colo. 233, 139 Am. St. Rep. 273, 110 Pac. 181, remarked that alleged defamatory statements invited or procured by a plaintiff, or a person acting for him, will not support an action for libel, and it was held that, unless satisfactorily explained, the jury might have determined that one who approached another and requested him to write a letter to the defendant concerning the standing of the plaintiffs was acting for the latter in so doing, where it appeared that the writer had no interest in the plaintiffs' standing or in their line of business, that he wrote the letter at the request of a person who could not be found at the time of the trial, and forwarded the answer to such person as directed, and the plaintiffs testified that they received the letwhen it came the plaintiff's turn to be paid. The plaintiff opened his envelop and counted the money and found the bill. The plaintiff testified that he asked the defendant what that meant, and that the defendant said in response, "Do you want to know in front of all these men?" and he said, "Yes," whereupon the plaintiff testified that the defendant said: "That is the stuff you stole from the Tillinghast job." What was testified to by the plaintiff as having been said by the defendant was contradicted by the defendant and three other witnesses who were present. What the defendant testified that he said was that "Tillinghast had complained to me that certain stuff had been taken, and I thought he took it and the bill was for that." The other witnesses stated in substance that the defendant said that the bill was for things taken from the Tillinghast job. The verdict of the jury must be taken to have settled, however, that the plaintiff's account of what took place was the correct version.

The defendant asked the presiding judge in substance to instruct the jury that any statements by the defendant imputing theft would be privileged if made in explanation of and in answer to a request by the plaintiff to know what the bill for the putty knife and other articles in his envelop meant, and if made after the defendant had asked him if he wanted him to tell him before the people in the shop and he had answered that he did. The judge declined to instruct as thus requested, but instructed the jury in substance, amongst other things, that if the defendant had said to the plaintiff that Tillinghast had missed the articles and claimed that they had been taken by the defendant's men, and the defendant had recognized the claim and had paid Tillinghast, and that he believed that they had been taken by the plaintiff, and felt that he had a right to charge them to him, he would ter through the mail, but did not know who sent it.

But statements made by one when approached by detectives employed by another who had learned that statements injuriously affecting him were in circulation are actionable, if untrue or made recklessly, not caring whether they are true or false. Rudd v. Cameron, 26 Ont. L. Rep. 154, Ann. Cas. 1913 A; 618.

And the demand of a candidate for public office, that a newspaper which had stated that there were numerous reasons why he was unfit for office should name those reasons does not give the newspaper the right to publish malicious falsehoods concerning him. Luzenberg v. O'Malley, 116 La. 699, 41 So. 41.

The rule that defamatory statements made at the instance and request of the one defamed are privileged was limited in Wharton v. Chunn, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 124, 115 S. W. 887, the court holding that it did not inure to the benefit of one who was himself the author of a defamatory statement which the plaintiff, at the time the communication complained of was made, was seeking to have retracted.

And in Richardson v. Gunby, 88 Kan. 47, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 520, 127 Pac. 533, it was held that an instruction that if the communication alleged to be defamatory was written as a result of a decoy letter sent to the defendant by a third person at the instance of the plaintiff, no recovery could be had, should be qualified to the extent that if the plaintiff set the inquiry on foot for the purpose of ascertaining whether the defendant was disseminating evil reports in order that they might be counteracted, or for any other purpose than that of laying a foundation for a suit, he would not be estopped from maintaining an action. The court said: "The reason why a person cannot recover in such a case, where he instigates or invites the libel, is that he does it, as charged in the reply, for the purpose of predicating an action for damages upon it. He may not thus assist in building up a cause of action for the purpose of gathering the fruitage to himself. If, however, the plaintiff instigated or set on foot the inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether the defendant, or the bank of which he was president, was disseminating evil reports concerning the cement company or its officers, in order that such influences might be counteracted, or for any other proper purpose, and not for the purpose of predicating an action for damages in his own behalf, he was not estopped from maintaining an action." And to the same effect is Nott v. Stoddard, 38 Vt. 25, 88 Am. Dec. 633.

So, in Griffiths v. Lewis, 7 Q. B. 61, 14 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 197, 9 Jur. 370, where the plaintiff, because of a rumor of a former defamatory statement charging the use of false weights, inquired of the defendant if he had made such statements, it was held that the defendant's reply that he had, and that the plaintiff had used such weights for many years, was not privileged. Lord Denman said: "The words originally spoken were extremely injurious to the plaintiff, and she was bound to inquire about them. Then the defendant, in answer to her inquiry, not only says that he made the statement, but makes it again. The question raised by the present argument is, in reality, whether the having uttered a slander once gives a privilege to repeat it. It has been the constant course of persons complaining of slander to ask the author whether he abides by the imputation; it has been considered unsafe to bring an action without doing so. No case goes the length of laying down that repetition of a calumny in answer to such a question is privileged."

have had a right to say it, and there would have been no slander. But he did not have a right to say to the plaintiff, even in reply to his request for information and after he had agreed that he might tell him in the presence of the other men, that he (the plaintiff) stole them.

We do not think that the law of privileged communications is to be interpreted so narrowly. Whether a communication is or is not privileged does not depend so much on the manner or form in which crime is imputed, where the alleged slander consists as here of a charge of crime, as on the occasion and circumstances under which the charge is made. If made in good faith in reference to a matter in which the person making it is immediately interested, and for the purpose of protecting his interest, and in the belief that it is true, and without any malicious motive, the communication is what is termed privilege; that is, the occasion and the circumstances under which it is made are held to be such as, if nothing more appears, to excuse or justify the statements that are made. But "if," as said in Brow v. Hathaway, 13 Allen, 239, 242, "unnecessary publicity be given to the statements, or if they go beyond what is reasonable in imputing crime, these circumstances may tend to show malice in fact; as well as evidence that the defendant knew them to be false, or had no sufficient reason to believe them to be true, or that he improperly sought or used the occasion to utter the defamatory words. But however strong the evidence from these sources may be, and however irresistible the conclusion of malice to be drawn therefrom, it is a conclusion of fact, and it is to be drawn by the jury, and not by the court."

Applying the principles thus laid down, we think that the jury should have been instructed in substance as requested. There was evidence tending to show that the charge was made in good faith, without unnecessary publicity, and under circumstances which the plaintiff himself invited; that the defendant believed it to be true; and that it related to a matter in which he was immediately interested, and was made for the purpose of protecting his interest. This evidence, if believed, would warrant the jury in finding, we think, that a case of privileged communication was made out. See Remington v. Congdon, 2 Pick. 310, 13 Am. Dec. 431.

In addition to the instructions that were requested and refused, exceptions were also taken to portions of the charge, on the ground that they assumed a state of the evidence which did not exist. But inasmuch as the exceptions to the refusal to give the instructions requested in regard to the matter of privileged communications must be sustained, we do not deem it necessary to consider those taken to the portions of the charge thus referred to.

Exceptions sustained.

WILLIAM R. STOCKING et al.

v.

CITY OF LINCOLN, Appt.

(93 Neb. 798, 142 N. W. 104.)

Highway — change of grade — injury — liability.

1. Where the record contains no competent evidence to show that the grade of a street had been established prior to the time a city grades a street from its natural to a lower grade, the city will be liable to an abutting lot owner for any damages inflicted upon him by such change of grade.

Same — destruction of trees.

2. And in such a case the removal or destruction of, or damage to, trees planted by the lot owner or his grantors and growing upon that part of the street contiguous to his lot, is a proper element of damages so far as it may effect the difference in the value of the property before and after its change of grade.

Appeal — instructions — error.

3. No prejudicial error is found in the instructions given or in the denial of requests for instructions made by counsel for the defendant, and the evidence is examined and found to support the verdict and judgment.

Hamer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the owners of lot 20, in block 5, in Vine street addition to the city of Lincoln, for damages to their property caused by the grading of Vine and Twenty-third streets in said city. The lot in question is on the northwest corner of the intersection of said streets, and the property faces south. Vine street runs east and west along the south end of the property, and Twenty-third street runs north and south on the east side of the plaintiff's lot. The plaintiffs became the owners of the property on or about the 11th day of September, 1907. The grading in question was done by the city in 1910. The record shows that plaintiffs' trees growing between the curb and the lot line on Vine and Twenty-third streets were dug up and removed, the sidewalk space was lowered from the 3 to 5 feet below the surface of the lot, and the plaintiffs sustained other damages by reason of the grading in question. There was a trial to a jury and a verdict against the city on which judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs for $425. The city appeals.

It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. Ida Leinberge testified that after the excavation was made the lot at the intersection of Twenty-third and Vine streets was about 5 feet higher than the street. Her evidence is sustained by the testimony of William R. Stocking and T. J. Hensley, the street commissioner, the latter fixing the distance at 4½ feet. The testimony concerning the damage done is in direct conflict. An examination of the record fails to disclose any negligence on the part of the city in the manner of doing the work. The grading done seems to have been necessary. It was also necessary to lower the sidewalk. The witness Ida Leinberge testified that in order to lower the sidewalk it was necessary to remove the trees. The assistant engineer, Bates testified on behalf of the city that the grade as made is the proper grade; that the sidewalks were left in good condition after the city completed its work. His testimony as to the grading and cutting down of the sidewalk space does not vary in substance from that given by the witnesses for the plaintiffs.

It is claimed by counsel for the appellant that there was error at the trial because the court admitted evidence which allowed the jury to consider damages to improvements by reason of the grading of Vine street, and Twenty-third street and the lowering of the sidewalk space and digging up and removing the trees. It is the defendant's contention that "no damage can be allowed, as the city was the owner of the street in fee, and that the trees were the property of the city." As we understand the matter, it is this: When the grading and lowering of the sidewalk space has been done, what is the damage, if any, to the plaintiffs? Section 21, art. 1, of the Constitution reads: "The property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor."

In Omaha v. Flood, 57 Neb. 124, 77 N. W. 379, it was held that, where property fronting on a public street is damaged by the method or manner adopted by the authorities of a municipal corporation in permanently grading such street, the corporation is liable to the owner of such property for such damages. In such case the owner's measure of damages is the depreciation in value of his property caused by the construction and permanent maintenance of the grade.

In Bronson v. Albion Teleph. Co. 67 Neb. 111, 60 L.R.A. 426, 93 N. W. 201, 2 Ann. Cas. 639, it was held that where an abutting owner has planted trees along the street adjacent to his property, under the terms of a city ordinance pursuant to statutory provisions, a telephone company which removes, destroys, or injures such trees in erecting poles and wires under its franchise is liable for the resulting damage, even though no unnecessary injury is inflicted. In the body of the opinion in that case it is said: "The right of an abutting owner to maintain shade trees upon or overhanging the sidewalk is general and well recognized."

In Slabaugh v. Omaha Electric Light & P. Co. 87 Neb. 805, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1084, 128 N. W. 505, this court held that the electric light company was liable to the abutting lot owner who plants trees in that part of the street contiguous to his lot, for all damages accruing to the lot by reason of trimming and injuring the trees. Chief Justice Reese in concurring said: "The trees were rightfully growing on and in connection with plaintiff's property at the time the alleged franchise was granted. According to the usual course of nature, those trees would grow up. As well might defendant have chopped them down in anticipation of their natural upward growth as to wait until they had become more valuable, and then, without consent or payment, and by the force and authority of might, practically ruin them. The rights of persons ought to be held just as sacred as the rights of property, and of the single individual as sacred as those of the multitude." Letton J., in concurring in the conclusion, said, among other things: "I am further of opinion, to quote the language of the opinion in Southern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Francis, 109 Ala. 224, 31 L.R.A. 193, 55 Am. St. Rep. 930, 19 So. 1, that, 'if the city or other corporation invested with the right of eminent domain, acting under municipal authority, proceeds to cut or trim trees planted on a sidewalk by the owner of abutting property under lawful authority, when no necessity for such cutting exists, or when the cutting clearly exceeds the necessity, and consequential injury results therefrom to such abutting property, the owner will have his appropriate remedy at law to redress the injury.'"

In Hammond v. Harvard City, 31 Neb. 635, 48 N. W. 462, this court said: "It was formerly held, in accordance with some part of the instructions given in the case, that, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

'when a city, in the reasonable exercise of an authority, under its charter, establishes a grade for its streets, and works them accordingly. there being no provision of law for the payment of damages, no action will lie.' This was the law in 1873, and was so held in the case of Nebraska City v. Lampkin, 6 Neb. 27. But the Constitution of 1875, now in force, provided a different rule. The text of § 21 of the Bill of Rights now is that 'the private property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor.'"

It is proper to remark that not all the states contain that clause of the Nebraska Constitution relating to the liability incurred because property is "damaged" by the act complained of.

In O'Brien v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 589, 30 Am. St. Rep. 832, 24 Atl. 1047, the question of law reserved was "whether a plaintiff who has built a house upon his lot in conformity with the existing physical grade of an old and open public highway can recover damages from the city of Philadelphia for depreciation in the value of the property occasioned by changing the de facto physical elevation of the highway in front of the lot to conform to a plan regulation legally confirmed after the building of the house; said plan being the first regulation of grade and differing from the de facto physical elevation of the old highway in front of the lot." There was judgment for the plaintiff on the verdict. The court said: "If any regard is to be had for the constitutional mandate that 'municipal and other corporations . . . shall make just compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways, or improvements,' we are at a loss to see how the learned judge could do otherwise than decide the reserved question as he did. Nobody conversant with the history of the constitutional provision above quoted can entertain any doubt that it was intended to provide, inter alia, for the class of cases of which O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 187, is a conspicuous example. It has uniformly been so regarded from the date of its adoption until the present time. It is a fact, conclusively established by the verdict, that, as a direct consequence of the elevation of grade immediately in front of plaintiff's property, its market value was lessened at least to the extent of $240; but it is gravely suggested that 'such a damnum is not necessarily an injuria,' and hence plaintiff is remediless. That principle has no application to the class of cases to which this belongs. To hold that it has would defeat one of the objects of the constitutional mandate in question, and virtually overrule several well-considered cases. We do not propose to do either. . . . Again, in New Brighton v. Peirsol, 107 Pa. 280, the claim was by a lot owner for a second change of grade after he purchased the lot. This court, holding that he was entitled to recover, said: 'The claim now is for change of grade made since defendant in error purchased, and for damages sustained by work done since the adoption of the Constitution.' In Ogden v. Philadelphia, 143 Pa. 430, 22 Atl. 694, the claim was for damages caused by grading North street. After stating the undisputed facts were 'that the first grade . . . was established on the city plan in 1871, but nothing was done on the ground until 1887,' our Brother Mitchell says: 'For the establishment of the grade of 1871 there was no right of action. . . . Philadelphia v. Wright, 100 Pa. 235. Therefore the statute of limitations could not begin to run from that date. But the Constitution of 1874, art. 16, § 8, gave a right to owners to have compensation for property injured, as well as for property taken by municipal and other corporations in the construction or enlargement of their works. The right of action which this section gives is clearly for the actual establishment of the grade on the land. The general rule is that the cause of action arises when the injury is complete, and this has been uniformly applied to the taking of property for public use, from the case of Schuykill Nav. Co. v. Thoburn, 7 Serg. & R. 411, down to the present day.'

When the property of an abutting owner is damaged by the establishment of a grade of a street for the first time, changing it from the natural grade, such property is "damaged" within the meaning of the Constitution, as much as it is by reason of lowering the grade of the street as previously established. Werth v. Springfield, 78 Mo. 107; Hutchinson v. Parkersburg, 25 W. Va. 226; Sheehy v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 94 Mo. 574, 4 Am. St. Rep. 396, 7 S. W. 579; New Brighton v. United Presby. Church, 96 Pa. 331; Hendrick's Appeal, 103 Pa. 358.

Defendant further contends that plaintiffs acquired title to the lot in question since the grade of Vine street was established, and therefore that they cannot recover for damages to their improvements, and in support of that contention Omaha v. Williams, 52 Neb. 40, 71 N. W. 970, is cited. 'As we view the record, the city failed to show by any competent evidence that a grade had been legally established on that portion of Vine street abutting on the plaintiff's lot at any time prior to the time the grading in question was done. It follows that the rule contended for has no application to the facts of this case.'

as also the requests for instructions which were denied, and the other errors alleged. We are unable to find any alleged error which seems to us to be prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. We are unable to say that the verdict of the jury is wrong. It was upon a conflict of evidence, and apparently the evidence fully sustains it.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Sedgwick and Letton, JJ., concur in conclusion.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Essex County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court after finding in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for fraud in securing a release of a right of action for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Whittier v. Collins, 15 R. I. 90, 2 Am. St. Rep. 879, 23 Atl. 47.

Messrs. Henry C. Sawyer and William Harold Hitchcock for defendant.

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a minor sixteen years old. While in the employ of the Cape Ann Tool Company he suffered a serious personal injury, for which, as we must now take it, he had a right to recover damages from that company to the amount of $3,500. The defendant had insured that company against such a liability. By means of a gross fraud practised by the defendant's authorized agent, the plaintiff's father was induced to consent to the bringing of an action in the plaintiff's name by his father as next friend, against the tool company, with an ad damnum of $300. Such an action was brought by one member of a firm of attorneys, of which the other member was general counsel for the defendant, this defendant paying therefor. The other member of that firm appeared for the tool company. In pursuance of the same fraud, the defendant, through its agent, secured the signature of the plaintiff's father to a power of attorney authorizing the bringing of the action that has been mentioned, to an agreement for the entry of judgment and satisfaction of judgment for $200, and to a paper purporting to be a release of all the minor's rights against the tool company on account of the injury. Then, in that action, an entry was made of judgment for the plaintiff for $200 without costs, and judgment satisfied. No money has been paid to parties thereto nor in privity with the parties, are not estopped by the judgment, nor can they take advantage of it as a bar." 23 Cyc. 1207.

In Morris v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 189 Fed. 211, however, which was an action by an employee against a company which had insured his employer against liability for injuries to employees, and against the employer,—the latter (a corporation) having been dissolved and gone out of business,—to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the employer, in which action it was alleged that the plaintiff, by the fraud and deceit of the defendants had been deprived of his day in court, and his right to recover adequate damages for his injuries, in that the defendants had fraudulently and deceitfully caused an action to be brought in the name of the plaintiff and of another as his next friend, without their knowledge, consent, or direction, and by fraudulent representathe plaintiff, and, of course, none ever can be collected, on that judgment.

The questions are whether that judgment is a bar to the present action, and, if not, whether the plaintiff has a right to prove his actual damages.

There is no doubt that a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive between the parties and all who are in privity with them. But the defendant was neither a party nor a privy to the action in which the judgment was entered. It is not binding against this defendant nor in its favor. Until reversed or set aside, although procured without the knowledge of the plaintiff, and by means of a mere fraud practised upon his father while acting as his next friend, it is binding upon the parties to it. Wallace v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 194 Mass. 328, 80 N. E. 461; Finneran v. Leonard, 7 Allen, 54, 83 Am. Dec. 665; White v. Merritt, 7 N. Y. 352, 57 Am. Dec. 527; Clark v. Southern Can Co. 116 Md. 85, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 980, 81 Atl. 271. But it works no estoppel upon the plaintiff in favor of the present defendant. This was declared by the court in one of the cases relied on by the defendant. Dunlap v. Glidden, 31 Me. 435, 437, 52 Am. Dec. 625. And see Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Bigelow, 203 Mass. 159, 206, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 314, et seq., 89 N. E. 193, and the cases collected in 23 Cyc. 120 et seq.

The plaintiff has not, by his declaration or in the subsequent proceedings in this action, set up the former judgment as having any binding effect, except as between himself and the tool company. He admits its validity as between himself and the tool company; but he rightly contends that, as between himself and this defendant, it constitutes no estoppel. That differentiates tions had obtained from them a stipulation from the entry of judgment for a sum which was only one fiftieth of the amount of the damages to which the plaintiff was entitled, etc.,—it was held, on demurrer, that this was not a proper proceeding to attack the judgment referred to, and that the allegations were too indefinite to require the defendant insurance company to plead further. The court said: "The serious question presented is whether or no this is a collateral proceeding. The gist of this declaration is the defendant's alleged negligence and the plaintiff's damages. This old judgment seems to stand in the plaintiff's way of obtaining a new judgment for a larger sum, so he asks that in some form the facts relating to that old judgment be tried out, and, if found to be fraudulent, that he may then proceed with the trial of the main issue. This seems to me a collateral attack upon the old judgment."

this case from those relied on by the defendant. Engstrom v. Sherburne, 137 Mass. 153; Smith v. Abbott, 40 Me. 442; Dunlap v. Glidden, 31 Me. 435, 52 Am. Dec. 625. In those cases, the plaintiff was obliged to contend that the judgment of the procuring of which he complained was so far invalid between the parties to it that the levy upon his property for its satisfaction was a legal wrong to him; and the contrary was held, because, as stated by Colburn, J., in Engstrom v. Sherburne, 137 Mass. 153, 155, it is no legal injury to one to take his property, pursuant to law, "to satisfy judgments in full force against him." In the case at bar, no such difficulty is presented.

This case resembles in principle an action by a client against his attorney for malfeasance, such as was disclosed in Kelly v. Allin, 212 Mass. 327, 99 N. E. 273. In that case, the defendant wrongfully caused a judgment to be entered in the plaintiff's case, of which he had the management as attorney. In the present case, the defendant by fraud obtained control of the plaintiff's original action and then consummated its fraud by wrongfully causing a judgment to be entered therein. In neither case could the defendant set up as a defense the judgment to which he was neither party nor privy, but which he had caused to be entered for his own ends and in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff. To hold otherwise would be to allow a gross injustice to be perpetrated under the forms of law, and to say that the law was powerless to prevent its own prostitution. We do not need here to go so far as the court went in Verplanck v. Van Buren, 76 N. Y. 247.

Nor is the plaintiff barred from showing the amount of his actual damages. The former judgment creates no estoppel upon him in favor of the defendant in any particular.

According to the terms of the report, judgment must be entered in favor of the plaintiff as of January 6, 1913, in the sum of $3,500.

So ordered.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

KANSAS CITY SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JOHN WALLACE et al.

(— Okla. —, 132 Pac. 908.)

Mechanics' lien — waiver — evidence.

1. The provisions of mutual contracts between the plaintiff in error, its principal contractor and subcontractors examined, and held, that, under their terms, the right to a lien upon the railway company and its properties was not waived by a subcontractor where action was brought therefor after the award of the resident engineer had been published.

Headnotes by DUNN, J.

Same — on railroad — statute.

2. Under § 6166, Comp. Laws 1909, any person other than the specific classes enumerated therein, who performed any work or labor upon or furnished any materials to facilitate the operation of any railroad, is entitled to a lien therefor upon the road-bed, buildings, equipments, income, franchises, and all other appurtenances.

Statute — construction — ejusdem generis.

3. The rule of ejusdem generis is resorted to merely as an aid in construction. If, upon consideration of the whole law upon the subject, and the purposes sought to be effected, it is apparent the legislature intended the general words to go beyond the class specifically designated, the rule does not apply. Moreover, where the particular words exhaust the class, then the general words must be given a meaning beyond the class.

Mechanics' lien — contractor.

4. Under the provisions of § 6166, Comp. Laws 1909, providing that "every mechanic, builder, artisan, workman, laborer, or other person who shall do or perform any work or labor upon . . . any railroad," under the general language used, is intended to and does include contractors and subcontractors who bring themselves otherwise within the terms of the act.

(June 3, 1913.)

ERROR to the District Court for Sequoyah County in plaintiff's favor in an action to recover the balance of the contract price for labor performed in the construction of defendant's railway and to enforce a mechanics' lien therefor. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Read & McDonough, for plaintiff in error:

The contract is a guaranty on the part of the defendants in error that no lien will be enforced by them against the property of the plaintiff in error. Even if the statute gives a right of lien, that is a right that may be waived.

Note.—The question whether contractors or subcontractors are within the protection of statutes giving liens to "laborers," "mechanics," "workmen," and the like is treated in the note to Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. v. Brennan, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 85; and see also later case, Moore-Mansfield Constr. Co. v. Indianapolis, N. & T. Electric R. Co. 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 816.

The only persons who are given a lien under the above law are those who furnish things towards the equipment of a railroad.

Equipment does not mean the roadbed of a railroad.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents error from the district court of Sequoyah county, and is an action brought by defendants in error against the plaintiff in error and the Ferguson Contracting Company to recover a judgment for a balance due on work and labor performed under a certain contract by plaintiffs, as subcontractors under the said Ferguson Contracting Company, and to enforce a lien for the amount thereof against the Kansas City Southern Railway Company, on whose line of railroad the work was performed. The answer denied the amount claimed and the right of plaintiffs to a lien. On a trial had on the issues made, the court found in favor of plaintiffs for the amount sued for, and rendered a judgment decreeing the same a lien upon the roadbed, buildings, and equipments, etc., of the said railroad company, from which the case has been brought to this court for review.

But two propositions are urged by counsel for plaintiff in error, which are: First, that, under the contract existing between it and the Ferguson Contracting Company and between the latter and the plaintiffs, a right to a lien was, by the plaintiffs, waived; and, second, that the statute under which the action is brought gives no lien to contractors.

The contract between the Ferguson Contracting Company and the railway company contains, among other things, the following section: "The contractor further agrees to pay in full for all materials by him furnished for the construction of the work aforesaid and for all labor by him employed upon said work, or any part thereof, and to so contract for said labor as to retain from the money due therefor the amount of the board bills, if any, contracted during the performance of such labor, and to pay the board bills with the money so retained, and to save the railway company free and harmless from any lien for work or labor performed or material or supplies furnished in the performance of the work under this agreement, and from every claim, demand, or lien arising from or growing out of any act or thing done or suffered by the contractor or his agents or servants and his or their employees, in connection with the work aforesaid."

And the contract of the plaintiffs with the said contracting company provides as follows: "It is understood and agreed by both parties hereto that this agreement is and shall be subordinate to the said contract heretofore made between the party of the second part herein and the railway company, in all its provisions as to the times, manner, and conditions in and under which the whole and every part of said construction work is to be done and performed and in all essential respects, and that all the rights, powers, and privileges that are given and reserved to said railway company in their said contract with the party of the second part herein, are hereby expressly given, reserved, and conceded to the party of the second part in and under this agreement, as between the parties hereto."

From the proof it is made to appear that some time prior to the 1st of December, 1910, the plaintiffs received from the resident engineer of the railway company statements showing the amount due under the contract of plaintiffs with the Ferguson Contracting Company. On these statements the action seems to have been based, and under such circumstances the contract of the plaintiffs contained the following provision with reference to the filing and enforcement of a lien: "As it is the express intention of the parties hereto to avoid litigation, and it is further expressly understood and agreed between the parties hereto that there shall be no liens filed or suits brought until after the resident engineer has published his award, and then only for the purpose of enforcing said award."

As we view the terms of both contracts taken together, it was the intention of the parties to avoid any litigation over unliquidated accounts. In other words, no suits were to be brought nor liens filed until after the resident engineer had published his award, and the agreement then seems to contemplate that suits might be brought, if only for the purpose of enforcing such award. This action was for that purpose, and hence the contention of counsel for the company that plaintiffs had waived their right to a lien, under the terms of the contract, is untenable; the rule being that there is no implication in favor of a waiver, but to exist it must be made to clearly appear. 27 Cyc. 262.

The second proposition presented is one of more difficulty, and is in fact the one upon which counsel chiefly rely. It is divided into two parts and arises on the question of the proper construction of § 6166, Comp. Laws 1909, which provides as follows: "Every mechanic, builder, artisan, workman, laborer, or other person who shall do or perform any work or labor upon, or furnish any materials, machinery, fixtures, or other thing towards the equipment, or to facilitate the operation, of any railroad, shall have a lien therefor upon the roadbed, buildings, equipments, income, franchises, and all other appurtenances of said railroad, superior and paramount, whether prior in time or not, to that of all persons interested in said railroad as managers, lessees, mortgagees, trustees, and beneficiaries under trusts or owners."

The work of plaintiffs in this case was the construction of concrete abutments, piers, and furnishing material for the roadbed of the railway, and it is the contention of counsel that the only persons who are given a lien under the foregoing act are those who furnish labor and materials toward the equipment of the railroad or to facilitate the operation of the same; that equipment means cars, locomotives, and things of that class; and, as none of the work performed by plaintiffs falls therein, the statute gives them no lien therefor. This particular branch of the case is dealt with in Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Rosier, — Okla. —, 132 Pac. 908, an opinion delivered at this term of court, and the discussion therein contained is pertinent and conclusive, and we will not reiterate it. Suffice to say that therein we held that under this section laborers who performed work on a roadbed, right of way, and tracks of a railway company were, under this statute entitled to the lien here objected to.

The question of whether the plaintiffs, who were subcontractors, would be entitled to such a lien, even if the same was provided for by the statute, for the character of their work, is the second proposition presented by counsel. Counsel for the defendant company insist that contractors or subcontractors, not being mentioned in the act and not being of the same class of persons as those mentioned in the act, were not included therein, and that it was not the intention of the legislature that the protection and remedy provided for should be extended to them. They rely upon the cases of Tucker v. St. Louis, I. M. & S.

R. Co. 59 Ark. 81, 26 S. W. 375, and Little Rock, H. S. & T. R. Co. v. Spencer, 65 Ark. 183, 42 L.R.A. 334, 47 S. W. 196, to support the position that the word "builder" does not include contractors or subcontractors, while counsel for plaintiffs present a number of authorities, along with the definitions of a number of lexicographers, to support the proposition that the word "builder" is synonymous with "contractor," and that it was the intention of the legislature to embrace people of the class of their clients within it. The writer of this opinion, from an examination of the authorities, is much inclined to the view that the word "builder" is sufficiently broad to embrace within it a contractor, whether he be a principal contractor or a subcontractor; and, while not passing thereon, the majority of the court is of the view that the intention of the legislature to include parties within the class of plaintiffs in this action is more clearly manifested from another phase which the act contains, for all agree that they are provided for under one or the other.

It is a fundamental rule that courts favor a construction which will render every word operative, rather than one which makes some words idle and nugatory. Bohart v. Anderson, 24 Okla. 82, 103 Pac. 742, 20 Ann. Cas. 142. So that, accepting the contention of counsel for the railway company as sound, and for the purposes of this discussion concurring therein, it would leave, so far as the specifically enumerated classes are concerned, contractors and subcontractors, who might have performed work and labor upon the roadbed or furnished material towards facilitating the operation of the railroad, unprovided for. Taking this to be true, then, a critical examination of the act and due consideration for the scope of the duties to be performed by those who are enumerated discloses that every department of service demanded for the construction of a railroad is provided for by the services rendered and labor performed by the classes of servants and agents which are enumerated, except contractors and subcontractors.

For instance, the mechanic is the one who works and performs services with machinery or mechanics. The builder, if not a contractor, is the one who constructs and puts into permanent form the structure then in hand, whether it be the roadbed, bridges, buildings, or equipment. Within the term "artisan" is embraced the architect, the one who plans, sketches, and presents the complete details for the use of the contractor and builder. A workman upon a railroad might be any one or all of the classes below the architect, and in some instances might include those who assisted and worked with him, while laborer would embrace everyone who with his hands, his crude implements, or his teams contributed his necessary and essential part toward the construction, either of the roadbed or of any other parts of the railway equipment demanding that character of service. This résumé of the classes specifically enumerated discloses under our postulate that contractors and subcontractors are the only persons unprovided for in the list; and unless they are held to be included within the phrase, "or other person who shall do or perform any work or labor upon . . . any railroad," this language is totally without force or effect, for assuredly those who furnish material cannot be held to be unprovided for.

It is true that, under the doctrine of ejusdem generis, general words, such as those just referred to, for the purpose of ascertaining the intent of the legislature, are generally restricted in their scope to the specific class of objects named. But, as is said by the supreme court of Missouri in the case of State v. Smith, 233 Mo. 242, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 179, 135 S. W. 465: "The rule of ejusdem generis is resorted to merely as an aid in construction. If, upon consideration of the whole law upon the subject, and the purposes sought to be effected, it is apparent that the legislature intended the general words to go beyond the class specifically designated, the rule does not apply. If the particular words exhaust the class, then the general words must have a meaning beyond the class, or be discarded altogether." Other authorities supporting these general propositions and instructive on this phase of the case may be noted as follows: 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. §§ 436, 437, 438; 36 Cyc. 1119-1122; United States Cement Co. v. Cooper, 172 Ind. 599, 88 N. E. 69; Weiss v. Swift & Co. 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 376; Strange v. Grant County, 173 Ind. 640, 91 N. E. 242; State v. Brown, 163 Mo. App. 30, 145 S. W. 1180; Mears Min. Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. 162 Mo. App. 178, 144 S. W. 883; State v. Pabst Brewing Co. 128 La. 770, 55 So. 349.

The supreme court of Indiana in the case of United States Cement Co. v. Cooper, 172 Ind. 599, 88 N. E. 69, speaking to this subject, says: "In the construction of statutes or written contracts the doctrine of ejusdem generis is applicable, not in all, but in a certain class of, cases when general words are not accorded their usual and ordinary meaning, but restricted to things of the same kind, or genus, as those designated by the particular words. 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. § 437; Foster v. Blount, 18 Ala. 687-689. The office of the rule, however, like that of all other canons of construction, is to afford aid to the court in developing the true meaning of the statute, and cannot be employed to restrict the operation of an act within narrower limits than was intended by the lawmakers. Woodworth v. State, 26 Ohio St. 196; Willis v. Mabon (Willis v. St. Paul Sanitation Co.) 48 Minn. 140-156, 16 L.R.A. 281, 31 Am. St. Rep. 626, 50 N. W. 1110; 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. § 437. It is never used in an arbitrary sense, but operates as a sort of suggestion to the judicial mind that, when specific words of definite and certain meaning in a statute are deemed advisable by the framers, it may be that they intended the general words to extend only to persons or objects of the same kind or class as those embraced within the particular words, or they might not have gone to the pains of any specific enumeration. Whether the doctrine should be applied in any case depends largely upon the character and contents of the act as a whole, having due regard for that primary rule of construction that the object of a law must be sought from the entire act, including the title, and from a consideration of the evil to be remedied, the state of public sentiment existing at the time of the passage of the law, and the general purpose of the act, as derived from a consideration of every section. If the general purpose of the legislation clearly appears from a study of all the parts, that purpose cannot be defeated or limited by the doctrine we are considering. Webber v. Chicago, 148 Ill. 313-318, 36 N. E. 70; Gillock v. People, 171 Ill. 307, 49 N. E. 712; Winters v. Duluth, 82 Minn. 127, 84 N. W. 788; Lynch v. Murphy, 119 Mo. 163, 24 S. W. 774; Woodworth v. State, 26 Ohio St. 196; 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. § 437; State v. Villines (1904) 107 Mo. App. 593-598, 81 S. W. 212; State ex rel. Sedalia School Dist. v. Harter (1905) 188 Mo. 516, 87 S. W. 941-944. Another potential rule of construction has peculiar application to the facts of this case, namely, that when the particular words embrace all the persons or objects of the class mentioned, and thereby exhaust the class, in such case there can be nothing ejusdem generis left for the rule to operate upon, and we must give the general words a meaning different from that indicated by the specific words, or ascribe to them no meaning at all. National Bank v. Ripley, 161 Mo. 126-132, 61 S. W. 587; Ruckert v. Grand Ave. R. Co. (1901) 163 Mo. 260-276, 63 S. W. 814; Gage v. Cameron, 212 Ill. 146-161, 72 N. E. 204; Gillock v. People, 171 Ill. 307, 49 N. E. 712; Ellis v. Murray, 28 Miss. 129-46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

142; Fenwick v. Schmalz, L. R. 3 C. P. 313, 37 L. J. C. P. N. S. 78, 18 L. T. N. S. 27, 16 Week. Rep. 481; 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. § 437; Maxwell, Interpretation of Statutes 3d ed. p. 478; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes § 409. This result must be avoided, if possible, at the behest of another canon of construction, that a statute must be construed so as to give effect to all its words."

The case of Weiss v. Swift & Co. 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 276, was one wherein the act in question read as follows: "In every sale of green, salted, pickled, or smoked meats, lard, and other articles of merchandise, used wholly or in part for food," etc. The question before the court was whether "eggs" were included within the act. In holding that they were, in its discussion the court said: "If the words were 'every sale of green, salted, pickled, or smoked meats, lard, and other articles of merchandise,' without more to indicate the subjects of sale intended to be covered, there would be propriety in applying the general principle of construction that when certain things are enumerated, and then a phrase is used which might be construed to include other things, it is generally confined to things ejusdem generis. . . . But in applying this principle of construction, and in determining what things are ejusdem generis, regard must be had to the general subject to which the act relates. Things which plainly belong to the same class when one subject is being considered might belong to an entirely different class when considered with reference to another subject. The rule would be absurd if under the head 'other' nothing can be included in the construction of the act which is not exactly the same in every particular as the thing specified. . . . Moreover, it has been held upon sound reason that, when the particular word or words exhaust a whole genus, the general term will not be regarded as surplusage, but will be construed to refer to a larger class. This must be so, if regard be had to the rule, which is more imperative than the rule ejusdem generis, that a statute is to be considered as a whole, so that, if possible, effect will be given to every part of it. Here the subject to which the act relates, as shown by the body of it, as well as by its title, is the sale of provisions by description; and, considering the specific words 'meats' and 'lard' as furnishing a sample of the kind of provisions referred to, the words 'other articles of merchandise,' upon the proper application of the rule ejusdem generis, would be confined to such provisions as are 'used wholly or in part for food,' and this would include eggs.

We take it, therefore, that if the last-quoted words had not been added in the statute, the words 'other articles of merchandise' would have included eggs, because, having regard to the subject of legislation, they are of the same kind of things that are specifically mentioned. At any rate, by adding the words, 'used wholly or in part for food,' the legislature set up the standard of similarity to the things specifically mentioned to which the other articles of merchandise must conform; and no principle of construction requires us to impose any other test, except that the articles of merchandise come up to this standard, and, in addition, be such as are comprehended within the term 'provisions,' as that term is commonly understood when used in such connection as this."

We can conceive of no reason nor logic which would support a conclusion that the legislature intended to and did give every other person who made the construction and operation of a railroad possible, a right to a lien, and left out the one who built the bridges and abutments, or who built the very roadbed of the railway itself. As is said by Judge Wood in his dissenting opinion in the case of Little Rock, H. S. & T. R. v. Spencer, 65 Ark. 183, 42 L.R.A. 334, 47 S. W. 196: "The contractor who furnishes the various appointments incident to the building of roadbeds for railroads, such as teams, wagons, barrows, shovels, scrapers, axes, picks, etc., and the men to use them, is no less deserving of protection, and no more able to protect himself, than the 'iron barons,' 'steel kings,' and 'rolling-stock magnates,' who are given a lien under this law. The legislature that would make a discrimination at once so unjust and unreasonable would, in the very act, lay at its door an impeachment for besotted ignorance or gross partiality."

And while the learned justice concludes that the term "builder" is sufficiently broad to embrace "contractor," his remarks are clearly as pertinent when "contractor" or "subcontractor" is held to fall within the larger scope of the general words used.

Finding, therefore, that the primary intention of the legislature was that those should be entitled to a lien who performed any work or labor or furnished anything toward the equipment, facilitating the operation of any railroad, and that contractors and subcontractors who had done these things were entitled to the benefit of this statute, and that, if not properly included within the term "builder," they were intended to be embraced by the general language used. 46 L.R.A. Note. — The general subject of the effect of legislative authority upon liability for a private nuisance is discussed at length in the note to Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49. As there shown, the weight of authority, at least of the better-considered cases, is that legislative authority is not a defense against liability for a private nuisance, but, as incidentally pointed out in that note, will ordinarily constitute a defense against liability for a public nuisance. Later cases in this series on the question in relation to public nuisances are: Sopher v. State, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 173; State v. Concordia, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1050; *Zimmerman v. 2. Where the doing of a thing that would otherwise be a public nuisance is authorized by the legislature, the doing of that thing by the person so authorized, in the manner and for the purpose authorized cannot constitute a public nuisance in the absence of negligence, and such negligence must consist of something more than the mere doing of the authorized act.

Messrs. Robert S. Hudspeth and Pierre P. Garven for the State.

Garrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings up the judgment of the supreme court affirming the judgment of the Hudson quarter sessions convicting the plaintiff in error of maintaining a common nuisance by the emission of dense smoke from its locomotive engines.

The facts charged in the indictment and the evidence produced at the trial, together with the trial errors complained of, especially with respect to the charge of the court, sufficiently appear in the opinion of the supreme court. That opinion, after stating that the defendant under its charter had the right to use any sort of coal necessary for the efficient operation of its road, laid down the general proposition that for a nuisance resulting as an incident of such use, independently of negligence, the railway company was not responsible. In laying down this proposition the court below followed the case of Morris & E. R. Co. v. State, 36 N. J. L. 553, in which this court followed the case of Vaughan v. Taff Vale R. Co. 5 Hurlst. & N. 679, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 296, in which Chief Justice Cockburn stated the general principle to be that "when the legislature has sanctioned and authorized the use of a particular thing, and it is used for the purpose for which it was authorized, and every precaution has been observed to prevent injury, the sanction of the legislature carries with it this consequence that if damage results from the use of such thing, independently of negligence, the party using it is not responsible." The court of exchequer chamber, thus speaking through Chief Justice Cockburn, followed the decision of the court of King's bench in Rex v. Pease, 4 Barn. & Ad. 30, 1 Nev. & M. 690, 2 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 26, 22 Eng. Rul. Cas. 71, which was an indictment against a railway company for a smoke nuisance not distinguishable in principle or on its facts from the case now before us. In that case the judgment delivered by Baron Parke was that such incidental interferences with the rights of the public must be taken to have been contemplated and authorized by the legislature in return for the public benefits derived from the railway, and hence did not and could not constitute a nuisance at common law.

The principle which has thus been adopted and followed by the courts of this state, notably in the case of Beseman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 50 N. J. L. 235, 13 Atl. 164, justified the supreme court in saying that "wherever the question has been raised in this jurisdiction, negligent operation alone presents the ratio decidendi, whether it be upon an application for equitable relief against a conceded private nuisance, or in a prosecution under the criminal law upon an indictment for creating and maintaining a public nuisance; for the law is well settled that for mere incidental damage accruing by reason of the authorized and proper operation of the railroad, the company is exempt from liability upon the principle of damnum absque injuria," and "in suits for such injuries negligence is the gist of the action." [83 N. J. L. 231, 84 Atl. 698.]

A necessary corollary of this proposition and an essential part of the doctrine as applied to public nuisances is that the negligence that will thus transform the doing of a legislatively authorized act into a common-law nuisance must be something more than the mere doing of such authorized act; i. e., there must be evidence of negligence dehors the mere doing of the act which by force of the legislative sanction is not in itself a nuisance.

Unless this be so, the doctrine in question is an empty formula under which the authority granted by the central legislative body may be nullified by judicial action confined to particular subdivisions of the state.

In the case of a railway it is not perceived how such legislative grant can be rendered effective, or the road operated under it, if each county through which it passes may prescribe the use or one or another of the various methods of operation in actual use upon no other evidence of negligence than that the doing of the act authorized by law creates a condition which but for such law would be a public nuisance.

I am not intimating that, with the advance of knowledge, improvements in railroad methods and equipment may not become so generally employed, and their practical utility so conclusively demonstrated, that the failure of a given company to know of them or to adopt them would not be evidence of negligence, as is suggested by the opinion recently delivered in State v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. — N. J. L. —, 86 Atl. 48.

We are not now dealing with that question, but with the particular doctrine that the mere doing of an authorized act is not of itself evidence of negligence.

Briefly stated, the doctrine of our cases is that, where the doing of a thing that would otherwise be a public nuisance is authorized by the legislature, the doing of that thing by the person so authorized, in the manner and for the purpose authorized, cannot constitute a public nuisance in the absence of negligence, and such negligence must consist of something more than the mere doing of the authorized act.

Under this doctrine, the defendant below was wrongly convicted if the jury was permitted under the charge of the court to find that the defendant was guilty of maintaining a public nuisance merely because it did an act authorized by the legislature, — i. e., used soft coal, — or, to put it in another way, if the jury was permitted by the charge to find that the use of soft coal was in itself the negligent act that would render the doing of the act thus authorized a public nuisance. Such an instruction would be at once self-contradictory and a complete frustration of the established doctrine; for plainly what it amounts to is this, viz.: That, although the authorized use of a thing is not a nuisance unless made so by the negligent act of the user, yet the mere use of such thing may constitute the negligent act by which such authorized use becomes a nuisance. Clearly this is neither a logical nor a legal application of the principle by which the present case is controlled.

We do not understand that the supreme court sanctioned any such instruction, or that its opinion gives countenance to any such impairment or misapplication of the doctrine it had laid down; on the contrary, we understand that it was precisely because the supreme court thought that such an instruction, if given, was cured by other parts of the charge that it affirmed the judgment of the quarter sessions. We are unable to reach this conclusion; and upon the contrary find that such erroneous instruction was given, and that it was not cured or attempted to be cured by anything in the charge.

In the main charge of the court this language is used:

"There has been testimony to the effect that this condition of things is due partially to the use by this company of soft coal as fuel. There has been further testimony—you will recollect it—to the effect that these engines and this property can be maintained without the use of soft coal. There has been testimony produced here to the effect that, by the expenditure of certain sums of money, the use of the fuel that is contended causes some of this inconvenience can be done away with altogether in that particular community. You are to take all that evidence into consideration in determining whether or not this defendant has exercised ordinary care in the operation of its property,—whether or not this defendant has been negligent in the performance of its duty to the public. If in the exercise of ordinary care this company could have operated this road so as to prevent the destruction of comfort and property to the people of this community, and the company failed in that duty, then the liability of the company would be clear."

Inasmuch as the jury had been correctly charged that the defendant was authorized by its charter to use soft coal in the operation of its road, and was liable only for a nuisance resulting from its own negligent acts, the language quoted, which made the defendant's use of soft coal the test of its negligence in using it, was erroneous for the reason that such act of negligence consisted of nothing more than the mere doing of such authorized act. The idea thus sought to be conveyed to the jury was again stated in response to a specific request to charge.

The request was that the court should charge that "under its franchises as a railroad company, the defendant, during the period alleged in the indictment, had a legal right to burn soft coal." Instead of charging this, the court instructed the jury thus: "I will charge you that this company had the legal right to burn soft coal or any other kind of fuel that they might determine to be essential to be used by the company in its business, provided always that it uses ordinary care to satisfy its legal obligation to operate its property without negligence; and witnesses have testified—one of the witnesses for the defense—that other kind of fuel could be used under certain circumstances in the operation of this road, and that the use of that other kind of fuel might have prevented some of the conditions complained of here. You have the right to take that evidence into consideration, in connection with all the evidence in the case, in determining whether or not under such circumstances, having in view all the conditions, the burning of soft coal under such circumstances was negligence on the part of the defendant company."

If this instruction left any doubt that the burning of soft coal might be found by the jury to be "in itself" negligence, such doubt is removed by the statement that follows, viz.: "The company has no right, no legal right, to arbitrarily maintain a nuisance under any circumstances of the case; and if the use of a particular kind of fuel was in itself negligence, and worked an injury to the public at large, why that conduct in itself might be sufficient for you to say that this company was responsible in law for the maintenance of a nuisance."

Such an instruction was clearly erroneous, in that it left it open to the jury to find that the mere doing of an act authorized by the legislature was of itself proof of negligence in the doing of such act. For this error by which the defendant below was deprived of the benefit of the established doctrine of this court, the judgment of the supreme court should be reversed, unless, as that court thought, the error that we have pointed out was cured or rendered harmless by other parts of the charge. We fail to find that this was done, and do not see how it could be deemed to have been done, in view of the fact that the error in question occurred at the close of the charge and after the statements of the law that are said to be curative had been made. If a judge makes a mistake in charging the jury, he may undoubtedly cure it by calling attention to it as a mistake, and directing the jury to disregard it or to substitute for it a later statement of the law. Nothing of that sort was done in the present case, where the most that can be said is that two statements of the law were made to the jury, one of which was erroneous. Unless we conceive of our trial system as one in which the jury is clothed with the capacity to decide between two judicial statements of the law, and unerringly to select the correct statement and to disregard the incorrect, the error of the charge in the present case was not cured or rendered noninjurious to the defendant, who excepted to it.

The judgment of the Supreme Court is reversed, to the end that a venire de novo may be awarded.

Landlord and tenant—openings from juries.

A property owner who maintains along the rear of several tenements a common passage for the use of tenants and their guests, from which access may be had to doors into the tenements and stairways leading to the basement, which are leased to, and pass into the control of, the tenants, is not liable for injury to one who, in going to the tenant's door on business, falls down the unguarded stairway to the basement, if there is a barrier between the passageway and the stairway so that, in order to gain access to the latter a passer-by would have to turn out of the passage-way onto the leased property.

Lamm, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Negligence. Personal injuries. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $1,250. Appeal to the St. Louis court of appeals. Affirmed there by a divided court. Certified here under § 6 of the 1884 amendment of the Constitution. The pleadings fill no office for present purposes.

The case on the facts is this: There are two streets in St. Louis (Cardinal and Laclede) cutting each other at right angles. In one of such angles there are a group of buildings owned by defendants, husband and wife. The ground floors and basements of some are leased for business purposes, while the upper floors of those and the whole of the other buildings are flats or dwellings occupied by tenants for living purposes. There is a paved private courtyard or passageway for footmen only (somewhat like a patio) for access to the rear of all. For convenience of expression, we will call it the "courtyard," passim. To fill its office suitably (which office was that of giving access by way of common use of tenants and those other persons having a right to go to the rears of the group of buildings,—e. g., grocers, meat market men, milkmen, breadmen, on their delivery rounds), said courtyard runs east and west and then turns north, taking the form of an "L." As said, this courtyard is private property, belongs to defendants, being cut off by lattice screens from both Cardinal and Laclede, with latched doors in the screens for ingress to and egress from the courtyard. It is not connected with any public alley. As said, defendants' tenants made common use of this courtyard when occasion called; this in addition to the use mentioned above. A 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

minor or sporadic use also grew up, incident to the Wood tenement, which will be recurred to further on. At a certain place in this courtyard, the locus in quo, it is 8 feet 6 inches wide from wall to wall; i. e., from north to south. The width is less at some other places. Ranged along the sides of this courtyard are bread boxes, gasoline tanks, ash bins (the latter possibly permanent), for the convenience of tenants (we suppose put there by them). There are also some cellar ways running east and west lengthwise with the courtyard, and hard by the rear building walls, which cellar ways lead to the basement cellars of those buildings having such cellars. These cellar ways make opening, say, 8 feet long and 2 feet 3 inches wide, severally. They have no trapdoors on top, but are cut off and guarded from the courtyard by wooden railings or banisters at one end and along one side (the other side being protected by the building wall), and one end was left open at the head of the cellar stairway; the latter leading down, say, 8 feet, to the outside cellar door to the basement proper. The upper step of each of these cellar stairs is flush with the paved courtyard; and these stairways were built and arranged, as above described, some years gone, to wit, at the time the group of buildings was constructed by their former owner in accordance with an architect's design.

At the times in hand the ground floor of one of these buildings was in the possession of two brothers named Wood, as tenants of defendants; the Woods running a grocery there. The cellar under that ground floor was leased with the ground floor itself to them for that purpose, including the right to the use of a stairway leading thereto. In this cellar the Woods stored and kept goods, boxes, etc., and their necessary outside access to this cellar was, as suggested above, by one of the described cellar stairs, opening into the courtyard, and subjected to this private and exclusive use everyday about their business.

There was a rear door to Woods' grocery opening on the courtyard. The upper step of the cellar stairway in question (said step being at a right angle to the building) began 9 inches or so west of the west jamb of this rear door, and the door sill of that door was about 2 inches above the level of the courtyard pavement. We take it from the record, including photographs in evidence, that the ordinary line of travel east and west in this courtyard (that is, the customary use) was on about 6 feet of clear space of pavement, to wit, the whole courtyard, saving and except the space taken up next to the rear building walls by ash bins, bread boxes, oil tanks, cellar ways, etc. It will thus be seen that to fall into this cellar way anyone leaving this rear door would have to turn to the west, directly on stepping out, and in the line of the obstructions on that side, instead of taking pains to go north far enough to get outside the line of said obstructions and into the clear space or line of travel of the courtyard east and west.

In this condition of things, and not otherwise, on a Sunday evening, October 28, 1905, plaintiff (an intelligent housemaid thirty-three years of age, with good eyes) entered this courtyard from Cardinal on an errand for her mistress, a Mrs. Conley, to get from Woods' grocery some oysters and milk for lunch. Mrs. Conley was one of defendants' tenants, and the rear of her tenement, with windows therein, was on this courtyard, and but a few feet away from Woods' rear door and in plain view of said door and cellar way from said windows. Lying right under her eye, plaintiff could see and did see this cellar way from the Conley tenement windows, as said. Moreover, she had been in and out the grocery through this rear door. She admits she knew all the time she lived with Mrs. Conley that this cellar way was open at one end, the end next to Woods' rear door, but she says she did not know how close on the west its upper step was from the door s.l. of this rear door. All the testimony is to the effect that it was not dark, but it was "just getting dusk." We take it the light was such that plaintiff could have seen everything there was to see if she had looked at the immediate time. She says she saw at the very time the banisters of the cellar way, and saw the opening at one end where the steps begin, "but did not know it was so close." Her story is that, coming with a bucket in one hand to the rear door, she took hold of the door knob, turned it, and walked in; that she found there the proprietors and some others and "started" to buy what she went for. At that instant, and before trying to buy anything, she remembered "something" and wanted to speak to her mistress about it. So, after saying "good-evening" to the persons in the store, she faced about and stepped, face to the front, straight north and out of the door "just stepped in and stepped out," and as soon as she got out, when her hand was yet on the door knob, she fell (evidently having stepped to the west or westwardly along the building wall) through the open end of the cellar way headlong down to the foot of the cellar stairs, and thereby badly hurt herself. That she did injure herself is conceded; indeed, no question is made over the extent of her severe injuries.

Defendants introduced testimony from several witnesses, of great probative force, to the effect that plaintiff near dusk came with a bucket to the locked rear door of the grocery; that on knocking the door was opened; that several parties in the rear room of the grocery were smoking and drinking beer "socially;" that plaintiff, herself intoxicated, stood in the doorway and asked for beer; that she said nothing about buying groceries; that, being refused beer, she, with her face to the south (i. e., away from the courtyard), backed out of the door laughing and talking, and in so doing backed northwest into the cellar way.

The grocery had the usual front door and it was open at the time. There was no testimony that the rear door was intended by the owners of the building as a means of access to the storeroom by customers of the tenant occupying the ground floor, or was built for any purpose outside of the ordinary use such a rear door is put to for the backdoor convenience of the tenant. Neither is there any evidence showing, or tending to show, that defendants, the landlords, knew that their tenants, the Woods, permitted or solicited the use of this rear door by their customers in coming in or going out of the store. It stands conceded that no other rear door leading into this courtyard from any of defendants' other tenements was so used. Defendants did not live on the premises, but some distance away, and collected their rents through an agent. It seems the Woods kept their grocery store open during part of each Sunday for the sale of groceries, and, as said, the front door was open at the time. Furthermore, it appears that Mrs. Conley was a customer of the Woods, and that she and her housemaid used the courtyard as a near way or short cut to the grocery through this rear door. Plaintiff had worked for Mrs. Conley for about two weeks, though she had been familiar with the courtyard for a much longer time, and testified that she saw "people going in and getting groceries" through this rear door. There was testimony that other tenants of defendants at times made the same use of it, and sometimes outsiders, but the extent of this latter use is not disclosed. It was also shown that at times "people" were seen going through this courtyard, and that children sometimes played there. It was testified to by Mrs. Conley on behalf of plaintiff, and denied by Mr. Weber, that prior to the accident she had notified him to close up the open end of the Wood's cellar way, and gave as a reason that it was dangerous to her children. There was uncontradicted testimony on behalf of defendants that the customary way of building in St. Louis is to leave cellar ways intended for uses such as this, in the rear of premises on private grounds, like this, open at one end. That "the general practice is to inclose all but one side; that is, where you go down the steps." As already pointed out, there was no testimony that anyone besides the Woods had any right to use the cellarway, or that its use was common to other tenants of defendants or to any part of the public at large.

Questions on the admissibility of testimony were ruled against appellants. So a ruling was made on objections to an alleged improper argument by one of respondent's counsel to the jury. Error is assigned in both particulars. Others relate to giving and refusing instructions; one a demurrer to the evidence hinging, in part, on the question whether respondent was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and in part on another question presently stated. So, while the sufficiency of the petition was not challenged below, it is argued here it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The record relating to the enumerated list of assignments needs no attention until such time as a main question raised by appellants (and hinted at above) is settled, to wit: Did they, as landlords, breach any duty they owed plaintiff by not fencing off the entrance of their tenants' courtyard cellar way, and hence should not the demurrer to the evidence have been given? If that question be ruled against appellants, other assignments will be reached in due order, and, in that event, any record pertinent thereto, if not already set forth, will appear in connection with a determination of those points. But, contra, if that question be ruled for appellants, then the case fatally breaks at that point, and the other assignments will be reserved as not necessary for decision, and to be ruled in some other case turning on them.

1. In determining that question it is better to clear the way by first defining it by eliminating or canceling out certain propositions and factors discussed in briefs and in authorities cited on both sides, and finally, as in paragraph "e," infra, differentiating and distinguishing our case from another closely allied to it.

(a) In the first place, and obviously, the question up is baldly disconnected in nature and principle from another looming large on this record, to wit, that of plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence. Hence the knowledge of plaintiff of the existence of the open stairway and its location, her possession of good eyes, the state of the light at the time of the accident, and whether she was intoxicated, or whether she went face forward (as she says) or walked backward (as defendants say) into the cellar way, not being elements of any deciding value, are put away from us and laid on the shelf.

(b) In the next place, a good rule of everyday service is that judgments of appellate courts on one state of facts may not be applied automatically to another state of facts, but, contra, the general language in decisions must be read in the dry light of the very case held in judgment, and not otherwise. State ex rel. Bixby v. St. Louis, 241 Mo. loc. cit. 238 et seq. 145 S. W. 801. Therefore it will not do to indiscriminately invoke the principles and doctrines announced in cases where traps are laid or dangerous openings are left so close to the line of travel in a public highway that travelers thereon are likely to stumble into them, whether in daytime or nighttime, or where, under circumstances of danger and surprise, they suffer injuries from the proximity of such unguarded excavations or pits to public highways. This because the courtyard was in no just sense a public highway, but was private inclosed ground devoted to the convenience of defendants' tenants and tenements, and no express or implied invitation was extended to the general public to use it as a highway. The doctrine and reasoning of such cases, then, as Smith v. St. Joseph, 45 Mo. 449; Bassett v. St. Joseph, 53 Mo. 290, 14 Am. Rep. 446; Buesching v. St. Louis Gaslight Co. 73 Mo. 219, 39 Am. Rep. 503; Fehlhauser v. St. Louis, 178 Mo. 635, 77 S. W. 843; Benton v. St. Louis, 248 Mo. 98, 154 S. W. 473; Delay v. Savage, 145 Mass. 38, 1 Am. St. Rep. 429, 12 N. E. 841; Babbage v. Powers, 130 N. Y. 281, 14 L.R.A. 398, 29 N. E. 132 (some of which are cited and relied on by counsel),—furnish little or no aid in this case. In so far as those cases, or any of them, discuss and announce the joint duty of owners and tenants, or the separate duty of either of them or of municipalities, to persons traveling on public highways, they are not at first blush, or at bottom, applicable to the instant case on the question up.

(c) In the next place there is a doctrine of the law hinging on the express terms of leases, whereby the duty to make repair or keep tenements fit is taken from the shoulders of the tenant or occupier (where it generally belongs [Ward v. Fagin, 101 Mo. 669, 10 L.R.A. 147, 20 Am. St. Rep. 650, 14 S. W. 738]) and is put upon those of the landlord, and wherein the breach of that duty has been sometimes (but not always) allowed some significance as lex privata in determining the liability of the landlord to the tenant or his guests or customers for injuries. This is so because in this case the terms of the lease between defendants and the Woods are not before us. Nor does the petition count on a breach of any contractual duty springing from the verbiage or provisions of the lease itself. Therefore that doctrine and cases discussing it are affield.

(d) So, there are other doctrines of the law regulating rights and duties between landlords and tenants or between them (or either of them) and other persons, arising where tenements are let for an expressed purpose set forth in the lease, or are warranted as fit for such purpose, or where the landlord conceals from the tenant dangerous defects or noxious hidden conditions known to him, but unknown to the tenant, or where premises are let with an existing and present nuisance thereon, affecting the public. Cases dealing with one or another phase of those doctrines (e. g., Riley v. Pettis County, 96 Mo. 318, 9 S. W. 906; Whiteley v. McLaughlin, 183 Mo. 160, 66 L.R.A. 484, 81 S. W. 1094, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 458; Baker v. Tibbetts, 162 Mass. 468, 39 N. E. 350; Bowe v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 380, 46 Am. Rep. 471; Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 245, 50 Am. Rep. 659; State use of Bache v. Boyce, 73 Md. 469, 21 Atl. 322; Buesching v. St. Louis Gaslight Co. 73 Mo. loc. cit. 227, 39 Am. Rep. 503) are not in point on this record.

(e) So, there is a well-established general doctrine that may be guardedly stated after this fashion: It is the tenant, not landlord, who has surrendered domination and control, who is liable for the negligent maintenance of the premises. But where the owner of premises lets them to different tenants, and there is a stairway, hall, roof, way, or the like, intended for and devoted to the common use of all of them and their guests or customers, which stairway, hall, way, or roof, is reserved from or not included in the demises, but is kept in the control of the owner, then a liability of the owner may spring (based on his negligent maintenance of the way, hall, stairway, or roof) to the tenant, his domestic, guest, or customer, lawfully and with due care using the way, hall, stairway, or roof for its intended purposes. That doctrine is quite universally announced in cases and textbooks, as will presently appear. If, now, plaintiff was hurt in that part of the courtyard designed for and appropriated to the common use described above, and which was not under lease, but was reserved and kept under the control of defendants as owners (and such part surely existed under this record), we would have one case here for determination. If, on the other hand (as appears to be the case), she was not, then we have another and different case here for determination. It is in the light of the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

premises, and not otherwise, that the question in hand must be ruled.

2. Coming to our question as thus narrowed, we are of opinion it should be ruled for appellants. This because (a) The record shows beyond all question that the outside stairway at the rear of the grocery passed to the Woods by their lease. The owners reserved no control whatever over it. So the exclusive control of the access to this stairway from the courtyard or from the rear door of the grocery passed to them with their demise, together with the preclusive right to use that rear door and way of access. These defendants had no right to intermeddle or interfere with that use or access, and were not charged with any duty under the law to make that use safe to their tenants or such customers as were invited or permitted by them to make use of it in entering or leaving the store. The lessees took it as they found it, for better or worse. As to the invitees of the tenants, they stood in the shoes of the tenants, and had no greater rights against the owner. "In such a case the guest can have no greater claim against the lessor than the lessee himself and the members of his family have." McKenzie v. Cheetham, 83 Me loc. cit. 550, 22 Atl. 470. The doctrine of caveat emptor applied in such cases, and if any third persons are injured in the use of it on their invitation or permission, the tenants in control, and not owners out of control, are liable. Such injured parties must look to those who invited them, not to those who had no hand in doing so.

May A not rent to B a tenement in a known tumble-down condition without being liable to B's invitees? Withal if A is liable, as, for example, for the absence of a gate or bar where the upper tread of the cellar stairway began, how could he ever discharge or acquit himself of that liability? Must he keep the gate shut or the bar up from day to day? If he provide one and B is remiss in using it, what then? It is plain that to rule as respondent wishes us to would be to let in a flood of strange and deep water for the landlord to struggle with. Fortunately it is not so written in the law.

As pointed out heretofore, we are not dealing here with a condition dangerous to the general public, which condition appertained to a use by the owner intended to be public (or which was necessary to the public), nor are we dealing with a public nuisance per se. Subject to limits suggested in this and the former paragraph, the proposition announced seems good and acceptable doctrine. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. §§ 709, 709a, and especially 710; 1 Taylor, Landl. & T. 9th ed. p. 221.

The doctrine is exemplified in the cases.

Take one to illustrate: In Sawyer v. McGillicuddy, 81 Me. loc. cit. 320, 321, 3 L.R.A. 458, 10 Am. St. Rep. 260, 17 Atl. 125, it is held as follows: "The tenant for the time being is in the place of the owner, taking the property as he finds it. These circumstances are so connected with the repairs that the law deems it reasonable and proper that in this respect, as well as in others, the tenant should take the place of the owner, and authorizes the inference that such was the intention of the parties in the absence of controlling facts. This would also be true of all appurtenances connected with, or ways to, the premises, when such appurtenances and ways were included in the lease, with the same right of possession in the tenant as in the premises. This rule is now beyond controversy."

Take another case, Mellen v. Morrill, 126 Mass. 545, 30 Am. Rep. 695: "It appears that the plaintiff was injured by falling down an embankment adjoining a walk leading from the street to the door of a building owned by the defendant, but leased to a tenant. The accident happened in the nighttime. There was no defect in the walk itself. It was rendered dangerous, if at all, by the want of a railing or by the absence of a light or some other warning. The plaintiff can hold the defendant liable only upon the ground that he was guilty of negligence towards her. The occupier of a building, who negligently permits the building or the access to it to be in an unsafe condition, is liable for an injury occasioned thereby to a person whom he by an invitation, express or implied, induces to enter upon it. He is liable because it is negligence in him to invite a person to enter upon a dangerous place without proper warning. Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Carleton v. Franconia Iron & Steel Co. 99 Mass. 216. But the defendant was not the occupier of the land, and did not, expressly or impliedly, invite the plaintiff to enter upon it. He had leased it to a tenant, and there is nothing to show that he retained any control over the walk, or any right to direct the purposes for which the premises should be used."

In short, the reason of the sting is that, as to customers and inviters generally, the tenant, standing in the shoes of the owner, pro hac vice, is the owner. The student yearning to follow principles of law up to their ultimate sources and reasons in the exposition of philosophical jurists may on this score profitably consult Sheridan v. Krupp, 141 Pa. 564, 21 Atl. 670; Burdick v. Cheadle, 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767; McKenzie v. Cheetham, 83 Me. 543, 22 Atl. 469; Leonard v. Storer, 115 Mass. 86, 15 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Am. Rep. 76; McCarthy v. Foster, 156 Mass. 511, 31 N. E. 385; Marwede v. Cook, 154 Mass. 235, 28 N. E. 140; Jennings v. Van Schaick, 108 N. Y. 530, 2 Am. St. Rep. 459, 15 N. E. 424. We will not swell this opinion by excerpts from those cases, but content ourselves with saying they, some in one and some in another phase, support the conclusions reached by us.

In so far as the question ruled has been before the appellate courts of this state in related or analogous features, we think nothing can be found militating against pronouncements herein made. St. Louis v. Kaime, 2 Mo. App. 66; Vai v. Weld, 17 Mo. 232; Whiteley v. McLaughlin, 183 Mo. 160, 66 L.R.A. 484, 81 S. W. 1094, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 458; Ploen v. Staff, 9 Mo. App. 309; Little v. Macadaras, 29 Mo. App. 332; Carson v. Quinn, 127 Mo. App. 525, 105 S. W. 1088; Kean v. Schoening, 103 Mo. App. 77, 77 S. W. 335; O'Donnell v. Patton, 117 Mo. 13, 22 S. W. 903.

(b) Again, respondent, putting her very best foot foremost, an invitee as to the Woods, was a mere licensee as to appellants. In such case, absent some form of active mischief on appellants' part, as here, they are not liable for her injuries. Kelly v. Benas, 217 Mo. loc. cit. 9, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 903, 116 S. W. 557; Glaser v. Rothschild, 221 Mo. loc. cit. 185, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1045, 120 S. W. 1, 17 Ann. Cas. 576. We hold that, on the reasoning employed and conclusions set forth, appellants are not liable, and the demurrer to the evidence should have been given. Whether there are other grounds for reversal we do not determine. As there is nothing to indicate that respondent's case was not fully developed, another trial will serve no purpose of justice.

Let the judgment be reversed. It is so ordered.

All concur.

Mr. H. L. Graham also for defendant.

Cornish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On November 13, 1911, the plaintiff was injured while in the Rodick Block, so called, in Bar Harbor, of which the defendant was lessee under a fifteen year lease, dated March 1, 1907. It is conceded, that, as lessee, the defendant had full charge and control of the premises and stood in the place of the lessor, the owner.

The plaintiff on the day in question had stepped from the sidewalk on Cottage street into the open recess in the building, from which, on the right, was an entrance into the store occupied by Walls & Brewer, and on the left an entrance into the fire insurance agency of Frank E. Walls & Company. This recess or hall way was 5½ feet wide at the street, 7 feet 4 inches long, and a little over 3 feet wide at the inner end. At this narrow, inner end was a door opening into a cellar way 8 feet deep, without stairs, an open area. This door was equipped with a Yale lock, and was intended and supposed to be kept locked at all times, but was unlocked at the time of the accident. The building had been reconstructed by the defendant during the season of 1911, and the recess, as well as the doors leading therefrom, had been changed.

On the day in question the plaintiff entered the building for the purpose of transacting some business in the fire insurance office. Instead of opening the door at the left, as he should, he pushed the unlocked door at the end, and, stepping into the floorless area, fell into the cellar beneath and sustained serious injuries, to recover for which this action was brought.

It is not seriously contended that the leaving of this cellar door unlocked was not a negligent act. That was the proximate cause of the accident; and the single question that needs to be considered is whether, under the evidence in this case, the defendant was legally liable therefor. It is the opinion of the court that he was not.

The facts connected with the unlocked cellar door are these: When the defendant reconstructed the Rodick building, he left the cellar way incomplete and nonusable until such time as he might put in a cement floor and a heating plant. He therefore had a door constructed without any latch or knob on the outside, but with a Yale lock, which, on the completion of the work, was securely locked, and remained so until about the time of the plaintiff's accident. The defendant did not himself occupy any portion of the Rodick Block, but had a store in an adjoining building. This Yale lock had two keys, and the defendant, when the work was finished, about June 15, 1911, took them and placed them in the drawer of the cash register in his own store, where they remained until within a week of this accident.

About a week previous to this accident Mr. Brewer, of the firm of Walls & Brewer, one of the tenants of the Rodick Block, having occasion to have some plumbing done in the cellar, went to Miss Paine, a clerk in the defendant's store, and asked for the key to the cellar door. She took it from the cash register and gave it to him. He carried it to Mr. Carter, the plumber who had charge of the work and whose two employees actually did the work. One of the three plumbers unlocked the door, put down some sort of a ladder, and a portion of the work was done within a day or two. Then, on the day of the accident, one of the plumbers returned to complete the job and opened the door again, the key having in the meantime remained in the possession of the plumbers, went down into the cellar, neglecting to lock the door behind him, although he says he thought he had fastened it, and while there for a short time this accident happened.

Under these facts we fail to see in what respect the defendant was negligent.

He was responsible only for neglect of duty, and that duty was to use reasonable and ordinary care in keeping the premises safe for the access of all persons who might have occasion to come upon them by his invitation, either express or implied, in providing a safe and suitable entrance to the stores and offices, and in having the approaches thereto so constructed and maintained that visitors would not be liable to step into dangerous pitfalls by reason of misleading doors and deceptive landings. Foren v. Rodick, 90 Me. 276, 38 Atl. 175.

This measure of duty the defendant fully met. He had constructed a proper door to this open area, had securely locked it, and had taken the key into his own possession and deposited it in a place of safe-keeping. Up to this point, surely, no negligence could be attributed to him. He had done all that reason or the law could require of him, and at this point the defendant's connection with the transaction ceased. Of the subsequent steps he had no knowledge whatever. Nor had he any reason to anticipate them. The work to be done was not for him, and he had no knowledge that Brewer contemplated doing it. He did not know that the key had been taken away and given to Brewer or to the plumbers until after the accident. He continued to believe, and had reason to believe, that the door remained as he had left it, securely fastened. He had given to Miss Paine no authority or permission to deliver the key to Brewer, or to anyone else, and no such authority could be implied from the nature of her employment. She was simply a sales clerk in the defendant's store. She did not even have charge of the books. She had no more to do with the key to the Rodick Block than to the key to her employer's house or garage. In delivering the key to Brewer without authority from the defendant, she was entirely outside the scope of her employment or agency. Her act was not the defendant's act; and the law does not hold one responsible for the unauthorized acts of third persons who stand in no relation of agency to him.

This principle is well stated in these words: "Where the injury is the result solely of the negligent act of a third person who does not stand in such a relation to defendant as to render the doctrine of respondet superior applicable, no liability attaches to defendant. The fact that the negligent act which caused the injury was done on a person's land or property will not render him liable, where he had no control over the persons committing such act, and the act was not committed on his account, nor where the third person whose negligence caused the injury assumes control of the owner's property without authority. An owner or occupant of premises not in a defective or dangerous condition is not liable for injuries caused by acts of third persons which were unauthorized, or which he had no reason to anticipate, and of which he had no knowledge." 29 Cyc. pp. 477, 478.

See also Clapp v. LaGrill, 103 Tenn. 164, 52 S. W. 134, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 709; Mahoney v. Libbey, 123 Mass. 20, 25 Am. Rep. 6.

In Handyside v. Powers, 145 Mass. 123, 13 N. E. 462, the plaintiff was injured by falling down an elevator well. The door to the well had been provided with a lock, had been locked, and the key deposited in the defendant's office. There was evidence that a key had been obtained by the plaintiff's employer and used, but without the knowledge or consent of the defendant or his agent. In sustaining a verdict which had been ordered for the defendant by the presiding justice, the court say: "The door to the elevator had been provided with a lock, had been locked, and the key deposited in the defendant's office. This was the only key known by the defendant or his agent to exist, and it was found in its place in the defendant's office after the accident. There was evidence that a key had been procured by King and used, but without the consent or knowledge of the defendant or his agent, and that the neglect of King in unlocking the door and in leaving it unlocked had been the cause of the injury. But the act of King in obtaining a key without the knowledge of the defendant, and his subsequent carelessness, cannot be attributed to the defendant."

This case is directly in point, because in principle the defendant was no more liable for the use of the key procured from Miss Paine than for the use of one procured from any other third party.

The chain of causal connection was broken, the act of one or more third parties intervened (Maddox v. Brown, 71 Me. 432, 36 Am. Rep. 336), and, without considering the question of contributory negligence, which was argued by counsel, it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to hold, as we must, that no liability attached to the defendant.

Judgment for defendant.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 1.)

J. W. GILLILAND, Plff. in Err.,
v.

JOHN T. JAYNES.

Broker — agreement for resale — right to commission.

1. When a real estate agent has property listed with him for sale, and finds a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy on the terms on which the property is listed, the fact that he has an agreement with the purchaser that, after the purchase is completed, he may subdivide the property and sell it as town lots for a contingent commission, will not defeat his right to recover a commission against his original client, which has been earned.

Same — commission — when earned.

2. In order for a real estate agent to recover his commission for making a sale which has not been completed, it is necessary for him to find a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to buy, and to procure a written agreement to buy from the purchaser, which will be enforceable against him, if accepted and signed by the seller, provided the seller and purchaser have not come together, and an oral agreement to buy accepted by the seller.

(October 15, 1912.)

Headnotes by AMES, C.

Note. — Brokers: necessity of securing written contract from purchaser to entitle real estate broker to commissions.

The earlier cases on this subject will be found in a note attached to Lunney v. Healey, 44 L.R.A. 605.

As to the necessity that agent's authority to purchase or sell real property be in writing, to enable him to recover compensation for his services, see note in 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 933.

Cases holding merely that, a valid binding contract having been entered into with the intended purchaser, the broker is entitled to his commissions, are expressly excluded.

And as to broker's right to compensation where the contract with the intended purchaser is a mere option to purchase which has never been exercised, see note attached to Warnekros v. Bowman, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 91.

The general rule is that a broker to be entitled to recover his commissions must produce one who is ready, willing, and able to purchase upon the terms which the broker was authorized to offer. It seems clear that, to comply with this condition, the broker must either himself procure a binding contract from the prospective purchaser, or he must find one who is willing ERROR to the District Court of Muskegee County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover commissions alleged to have been earned in selling real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. N. A. Gibson and H. C. Thurman, for plaintiff in error:

When one is acting as the agent of the purchasers, he cannot act as the agent for the seller, and enforce the payment of a commission from the latter, because the law requires of an agent the strictest fidelity, and he cannot serve two parties whose interests are conflicting.

to take the property at once, or enter into a binding contract, and present him to the owner so as to afford the latter an opportunity to procure such a contract from him. If the prospective purchaser whom the broker has discovered, without any fault on the part of the owner, refuses either to take the property at once or to enter into a binding contract, the broker can hardly be said to have complied with the condition of finding one who is willing to purchase. Upon the other hand, where the broker's right to commissions does not depend upon conditions other than those ordinarily implied, it would seem that he is entitled to his commissions if he procured one of requisite ability who in fact was willing to enter into a binding contract, and presented him to the owner, although, because of the latter's fault, no contract was procured.

The rule seems to be accurately stated in Watters v. Dancey, 23 S. D. 481, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1071, 122 N. W. 430, holding that, to entitle a broker to recover compensation for finding a purchaser for real estate, he must prove that he has found and produced and brought to the owner a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to enter into a contract to purchase on the terms prescribed by the owner, or, in lieu of producing and presenting such a purchaser, he must show that he has obtained from him a valid, binding contract in favor of the owner,—a contract that might be enforced by the owner himself in case of a breach or default in the terms thereof; and that a contract by the purchaser to buy the land from the agent or broker is not sufficient.

And in the following cases, the rule is stated in the alternative to the effect that, before a broker employed to find and procure a purchaser for real estate can recover his commissions, he must furnish his principal a binding contract executed by an intending purchaser who is able to buy, and upon whom, if there is a failure to buy, the principal may have recourse; or he must by some means bring the buyer and seller together or in communication with each other, so they may themselves make the contract and conclude the sale: Shepherd-Teague Co. v. Hermann, 12 Cal. App. 394, 107 Pac. 622; Cone v. Kiel, 18 Cal. App. 675, 124 Pac. 548; Johnson Bros. v. Wright, 124 Iowa, 61, 99 N. W. 103; Flynn v. Jordal, 124 Iowa, 457, 100 N. W. 326; McDonald v. Smith, 99 Minn. 42, 108 N. W. 291; McCray v. Sheedy, 58 Or. 195, 113 Pac. 1133; Grindstaff v. Merchants' Invest. & Trust Co. 61 Or. 310, 122 Pac. 46.

GILLILAND v. JAYNES seems to be in accord with this rule, for it appears that the prospective purchaser had never been actually presented to the owner, so that the parties never met or had any communication on the subject, and under the rule it was therefore incumbent for the broker to produce a binding contract with the purchaser before he could recover the commissions. The holding in Reynolds v. Anderson, post, 144, on the facts, is also in accord with this rule, although the second headnote, which is by the court, seems to imply that the broker must at all events procure the contract.

So, in the following cases, where it appeared that the broker had produced a purchaser who was able, willing, and ready to buy the property upon the terms authorized, but was prevented from doing so by the owner's refusal, or inability to carry out the contract, it was held that the owner could not avoid paying the commissions, upon the ground that the broker had not procured a binding written contract from the purchaser: McFarland v. Lillard, 2 Ind. App. 160, 50 Am. St. Rep. 234, 28 N. E. 229; Pope v. Caddell, 125 Ky. 837, 102 S. W. 327; Holden v. Starks, 159 Mass. 503, 38 Am. St. Rep. 451, 34 N. E. 1069; *Watkins v. Messrs. DeRoos Bailey, J. E. Wyand, and Charles A. Moon, for defendant in error:

The broker is entitled to his commission for the sale of real estate, though the purchaser never enters into any enforceable purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, is entitled to his commission when the owner chooses to deal with the purchaser on other terms, although the broker has no formal contract with the purchaser which may be specifically enforced. Barnes v. German Sav. & L. Soc. 21 Wash. 448, 58 Pac. 569; Beougher v. Clark, 81 Kan. 250, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 198, 106 Pac. 39.

A real estate broker was held not entitled to his commission in Kronenberger v. Bierling, 37 Misc. 817, 76 N. Y. Supp. 895, where he brought an intending purchaser to the owner's agent, and a complete understanding was reached as to price and terms,—the purchaser even making a deposit,—but no memorandum or receipt was given by either of the parties, it being contemplated that a formal contract would be drawn up in two or three days, the purchaser subsequently refusing to enter into any contract with the owner, who stood ready to execute an agreement of sale upon the agreed terms.

In Pfanz v. Humburg, 82 Ohio St. 1, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 533, 91 N. E. 863, where, by the special terms of the broker's contract with the owner, the former's right to commissions was dependent upon a completed sale, there are expressions that seem to impose upon the broker the duty of procuring a contract from the prospective purchaser; but even in this case it is not clear that such duty rested upon the broker except as an alternative to presenting to the owner one ready and willing to enter into a contract.

In Harvil v. Wilson Bros. 11 Ga. App. 156, 74 S. E. 845, where it does not appear just what the broker was employed to sell, it is held that if, during the agency, the broker enters into a contract in behalf of his principal, which is mutually binding and enforceable, the broker has fully complied with his obligation, and is entitled to his commission, but that, for the broker to recover his commissions on this theory, he must allege and prove either that the owner or the purchaser refused to comply without legal cause, and that, when the purchaser refused to comply, he was solvent, or that the question of his solvency had been waived by the owner.

A signed contract of sale is essential to a real estate broker's right to compensation, where his contract of employment expressly provides that no commissions are to be paid until the contract of sale is signed. Reichard v. Wallach, 91 N. Y. Supp. 347; Schlansky v. Hillman, 111 N. Y. Supp. 696.

And that the broker secured a parol offer in such case, which was accepted by the principal, is not enough. Schlansky v. Hillman, supra.

So, where a broker's contract of employment required him to draw the papers necessary to a sale, and authorized the retention of his commissions from the cash payment, it was held in Ormsby v. Graham, 123 Iowa, 202, 98 N. W. 724, that, to entitle the broker to his commissions, there must have been a sale so far consummated as to be valid, binding, and mutually obligatory upon the vendor and vendee, and that a contract which a court of equity would not specifically enforce in behalf of the vendee was not enough.

And where a contract for the sale of real estate provided that if the purchaser failed to execute and deliver certain notes and make a cash payment provided for, the vendor should retain the cash payments made as liquidated damages, and the contract should be terminated, it was held in Rankin v. Grist, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 129 S. W. 1147, that there was no completed or absolute contract to purchase, and therefore the agent was not entitled to commissions for making a sale.

Where the broker, instead of presenting the prospective purchaser to the owner and leaving it to them to make the contract, has himself entered into an unenforceable arrangement with the purchaser, it seems that he is not entitled to his commission if the sale fails, unless the purchaser is willing to carry out the contract on his part.

Thus, a broker employed to find a purchaser for real estate does not earn his commission unless the contract procured by him is capable of specific enforcement in contract of sale, if, as a matter of fact, he is willing to comply with the oral contract and the owner declines to do so; and the agent's duty is ended when he produces a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy.

a court of equity; it being insufficient that the vendor is entitled to damages only for the breach of the contract by the purchaser. Webb v. Durrett, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 136 S. W. 1189, and Moss v. Wren, 102 Tex. 567, 113 S. W. 847, 120 S. W. 847.

Likewise, a receipt executed by the broker only, acknowledging payment of a specific amount as earnest of the purchaser's intention to purchase the described property at a named price, and stating the terms of payment of the balance, and stipulating certain expenditures to be made by the owner in connection with the property, is not an enforceable contract of sale, entitling the broker to his commissions. Henry v. Harker, 61 Or. 276, 118 Pac. 205, 122 Pac. 298.

But, in Barber v. Heade, 30 Ohio C. C. 127, it is held that when an owner contracts in writing with a broker to sell a parcel of land, and the broker secures a purchaser who offers to take the land in accordance with such contract, and duly tenders the money to, and demands a deed from the owner, such broker is entitled to his commission, although no memorandum in writing of the contract between the broker and purchaser is signed by the purchaser.

So, where the purchaser was ready, willing, and able to buy, as evidenced by his tender of the purchase money and demand for a deed, the broker was entitled to his commissions, although the contract secured from the purchaser was not enforceable by specific performance. Goodmanson v. Rosenstein, 144 Ill. App. 243.

Where a real estate agent makes a verbal contract for the sale of land, unenforceable under the statute of frauds, which his principal refuses to carry out, the agent is nevertheless entitled to his commissions, upon showing that the prospective purchaser was able, ready, and willing to comply with the mere verbal contract. Fox v. Starr, 106 Ill. App. 273.

To practically the same effect are Scott v. Stuart, 115 Ill. App. 335; Carter v. Simpson, 130 Ill. App. 328; Caruthers v. Reeser, 134 Ill. App. 370; Watkins v. Thomas, 141 Mo. App. 263, 124 S. W. 1063, which, however, do not represent an exhaustive search for this particular class of cases.

A broker is not obliged to have a binding written agreement with the would-be purchaser to be entitled to compensation where, by statute, sales of real estate are permitted by oral contract. Bird v. Phillips, 115 Iowa, 703, 87 N. W. 414.

Accordingly, it is held in Lewis v. Simpson, 122 Iowa, 663, 98 N. W. 508, that a broker employed to find a purchaser for and sell a farm is entitled to his commission when he finds one ready, willing, and able to buy, although the owner subsequently refuses to enter into a written contract, and revokes the agency. A. L. R.

Ames, C., filed the following opinion.

The first error assigned and discussed is the action of the court in refusing a peremptory instruction; and the position of the plaintiff in error, hereinafter referred to as defendant, is thus stated in his brief: "We maintain, first, that a binding contract whereby the plaintiff was to sell property of the defendant as the defendant's agent was not proven at the trial; second, that, if the plaintiff was acting as the agent of the defendant in the sale of defendant's property, the interest which he would have acquired in the purchased property was antagonistic to the interest of his principal, and he is not entitled to any commission; third, that, if the plaintiff was in fact acting as the defendant's agent, he did not so consummate a sale of defendant's property to earn any commission, because he never brought together the owner and a purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to buy on the terms named by the owner." Of these in their order.

Upon the first proposition, it is sufficient to say that there was testimony reasonably tending to support the plaintiff's averment of employment, and this was submitted to the jury for determination under proper instructions, and their verdict will not therefore be disturbed.

Upon the second proposition, the testimony tended to show that the plaintiff was the agent of the defendant for the sale of land; that he was authorized to sell it for a net price to the defendant of $6,500; that he was making no commission on the Muskogee; that the plaintiff negotiated a sale to certain purchasers for $7,500; that he told the purchaser that this was the net price at which he had the land listed, and that he was making no commission on the sale; that he had an understanding with the purchasers that, after they bought, the land should be platted and sold as an addition to the city of Muskogee; that out of the proceeds of the sale the first $9,000 was to be paid to the purchasers, and the excess to be divided between the plaintiff and the purchasers, provided he sold it out within a certain time. It is contended by the defendant that this is such a relation to the purchasers as to make the agent's interest antagonistic to that of the principal, and therefore to defeat his right to recover a commission. The law does not permit the agent of a vendor to become interested as the purchaser, or as the agent of the purchaser, in the subject-matter of the agency, but requires of the agent the exercise of good faith toward the principal. Plotner v. Chillson, 21 Okla. 224, 129 Am. St. Rep. 776, 95 Pac. 775. In the case at bar, however, the property involved was listed for sale with the plaintiff at a fixed price, and he was permitted to retain as his commission all that he might receive in excess of that price, and we do not think under the facts of this case there was any such relation between the parties as to defeat a right which the plaintiff would otherwise have to recover his commission. The plaintiff was not the purchaser; he was not investing his money in the land, or in any way becoming liable for it. His only relation to the purchase was an understanding with the purchasers that he would put it on the market for them for a contingent commission, to be taken out of the proceeds after they had been reimbursed in full and allowed an agreed profit.

The next question presented is one which presents difficulty. Under the facts in this case, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? The verdict of the jury resolves all the disputed questions in favor of the plaintiff, and under this rule the facts are as follows: The defendant listed his land for sale with the plaintiffs at $6,500 net, the plaintiff to have as his commission all that the land might sell for in excess of $6,500. The plaintiff resided in Muskogee and the defendant in Holdenville. Once or twice prior to this transaction the plaintiff requested the defendant to come to Muskogee to close a sale which he had made. The defendant came, and the purchasers failed to buy. The plaintiff then negotiated this deal with the purchasers, and the testimony tended to show that they were ready, willing, and able to buy the land on the terms by which it was listed with the plaintiff. No written agreement was made and signed by the proposed purchasers, nor did they pay any part of the purchase money to the plaintiff or defendant. The plaintiff telephoned the defendant at Holdenville that he had purchasers, and for him to come to Muskogee, bringing the necessary papers to close the deal. The defendant said he was busy at the time, but would come over in a day or two. The next day he wrote the plaintiff that he had concluded not to sell for less than $7,000 net. The plaintiff again tried to reach him on the telephone, but, when the defendant discovered that the calling party was Muskogee, he declined to talk. Nothing further was done until several months afterwards, when the defendant was in Muskogee and this suit was filed against him. Upon this exact point there is a sharp conflict in the authorities, and the question is not settled in this state. Some of the cases hold that the broker is entitled to his commission for the sale of real estate, though the purchaser never enters into any enforceable contract of sale, if, as a matter of fact, he is willing to comply with the oral contract and the owner declines to do so, and that the agent's duty is ended when he produces a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy. Holden v. Starks, 159 Mass. 503, 38 Am. St. Rep. 451, 34 N. E. 1069; Carlin v. Lifur, 2 Cal. App. 590, 84 Pac. 292. Other cases cited as supporting this position are Staufer v. Linenthal, 29 Ind. App. 305, 64 N. E. 643; McFarland v. Lillard, 2 Ind. App. 160, 50 Am. St. Rep. 234, 28 N. E. 229; Ford v. Easley, 88 Iowa, 603, 55 N. W. 336. But a close examination discloses that these cases are not exactly in point. In the first one the owner and the purchaser entered into a written contract. In the second one the owner and the purchaser met in person, and the owner accepted him as a purchaser without requiring a written contract; while in the third the exact facts on this proposition are not disclosed by the opinion.

On the other hand, there is likewise eminent authority holding that it is necessary for the broker either to effectuate a sale, or, where the seller declines to proceed, to present him with a written agreement signed by the purchasers, which would become enforceable when signed by the seller, and take the negotiations for sale out of the statute of frauds. Wilson v. Mason, 158 Ill. 304, 49 Am. St. Rep. 162, 42 N. E. 134; Ormsby v. Graham, 123 Iowa, 202, 98 N. W. 724; Grindstaff v. Merchants' Invest. & Trust Co. 61 Or. 310, 122 Pac. 46; Bolton v. Coburn, 78 Neb. 731, 111 N. W. 780. Other cases tending to support this rule, but not exactly in point, are Hammond v. Crawford, 14 C. C. A. 109, 35 U. S. App. 1, 66 Fed. 425; Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 33 Pac. 1105; Gilchrist v. Clarke, 86 Tenn. 583, 8 S. W. 572. In Wilson v. Mason, 158 Ill. 310, 49 Am. St. Rep. 162, 42 N. E. 134, it is said: "Some of the cases go so far as to hold that the broker is not entitled to his commissions, unless the sale is actually accomplished by the delivery of the deed of the land from the vendor to the vendee, and the payment of the purchase money by the latter; or unless it is proven that the sale is prevented by the fault of the vendor. Other cases seem to hold that the broker is entitled to his commissions when the minds of the vendor and purchaser meet on a verbal agreement for the sale by the one and the purchase by the other of the land. We are not inclined to follow either of these classes of cases, regarding them as extreme and exceptional. The true rule is that the broker is entitled to his commissions if the purchaser presented by him and the vendor, his employer, enter into a valid, binding, and enforceable contract. If, after the making of such a contract, even though executory in form, the purchaser declines to complete the sale, and the seller refuses to compel performance, the broker ought not to be deprived of his commissions. He has done all that he can do when he produces a party who is able, and, in binding form, offers, to purchase upon the proposed terms. An agreement by a real estate broker to procure a purchaser not only implies that the purchaser shall be one able to comply, but that the seller and the purchaser must be bound to each other in a valid contract. So, where the agreement of the real estate broker is to make a sale, his commission is earned when a contract is entered into which is mutually obligatory upon the vendor and vendee, even though the vendee afterwards refuses to execute his part of the contract of the sale, or purchase. Parker v. Walker, 86 Tenn. 566, 8 S. W. 391; Coleman v. Meade, 13 Bush, 358; Francis v. Baker, 45 Minn. 83, 47 N. W. 452; Love v. Miller, 53 Ind. 294, 21 Am. Rep. 192; Veazie v. Parker, 72 Me. 443; Willes v. Smith, 77 Wis. 81, 45 N. W. 666; Rice v. Mayo, 107 Mass. 550; Christensen v. Woolley, 41 Mo. App. 53; Love v. Owens, 31 Mo. App. 501; Greene v. Hollingshead, 40 Ill. App. 195; Short v. Millard, 68 Ill. 292; Kerfoot v. Steele, 113 Ill. 610; Ward v. Cobb, 148 Mass. 518, 12 Am. St. Rep. 587, 20 N. E. 174." The question is of great practical importance, and, there being eminent authority supporting both rules, we find some difficulty in reaching a conclusion. Our own cases only go to the extent of holding that "a real estate agent authorized to sell the land of another for a certain price for a certain compensation, or send the seller a buyer, has not earned his commission until he produces a purchaser ready, willing, and financially able to purchase the land upon the terms agreed upon." Crutchfield v. Webster, 31 Okla. 142, 120 Pac. 615; Birch v. McNaught, 23 Okla. 634, 101 Pac. 1049. But this question was not involved in either of those cases. We are inclined to believe that the weight of authority, as well as the better reason, supports the rule that, in order to recover his commission, the real estate agent must produce a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to buy, and that the evidence of this fact must be such as would be recognized in a court of justice. The sale of real estate is an important step, which the law requires to be taken in writing, and it is explicitly provided that no contract or agreement for the sale of real estate shall be valid unless it is in writing. These safeguards are designed to prevent fraud, and we are inclined to believe that the rule we adopt will have a tendency to prevent fraud, and will not work any hardship in a just case. If the real estate agent has a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to buy, it will not be difficult for him to have such purchaser sign an agreement to buy, which will become a valid, binding, and enforceable contract as against the purchaser. On the other hand, if the real estate agent merely procures a man who says he is willing to buy, his statement does not bind him, and within legal contemplation he has done nothing which the law recognizes. The best evidence of his being willing to buy is his written agreement to do so. In fact, his written agreement is the only thing which can be enforced against him, and his mere word of mouth that he is willing to buy would not be recognized in an action against him to compel specific performance. It would not even be competent evidence as tending to show that he had agreed to buy. In the case at bar the defendant had made one or two trips to Muskogee on previous occasions upon the plaintiff's advice that he had a purchaser for his property, and, when he got there, the purchaser refused to proceed further, and the defendant was helpless, whereas, if the plaintiff had required of the proposed purchaser his signature to an agreement which would be binding upon him, the purchaser would either have refused to sign, and thereby saved the defendant the expense of the trip, or he would have taken the property when the defendant appeared. In the case at bar the plaintiff testified that the defendant was still willing to sell, but wanted to raise his price from $6,500 to $7,000, and that the purchaser had agreed to buy for $7,500, and that he had an agreement with them by which he was to plat the land as a townsite addition and sell it off on a basis by which he expected to realize further profit. He therefore, on the defendant's new offer, had a commission of $500 for making the sale, and the prospect of profit by platting the land as an addition, and yet he did not secure from the purchasers any part payment of the purchase price, or any written agreement to buy the land, nor did he seek out the defendant for the purpose of urging the sale, but let the whole matter drop, and waited some months until he saw the defendant in Muskogee, at which time he sued him.

We believe the rule which we adopt will have a tendency to require greater care and system in the transaction of the real estate business, will have a tendency to prevent frauds, and will not often prevent the recovery of a commission which is really earned.

The case should be reversed and remanded, with instructions to proceed further in accordance with this opinion.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

VILLAGE OF CHARLOTTE, Appt.,

v.

JOHN M. KEON, Respnt.

(207 N. Y. 346, 100 N. E. 1116.)

Set-off — action to enforce tax — applicability.

A statute permitting taxes to be collected by suit, as upon contract, does not change the quality of the tax so as to make applicable a statute permitting set-off in actions upon contract.

(February 11, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Monroe County Court which affirmed a judgment of a Justice of the Peace allowing a set-off in an action brought to recover taxes alleged to be due and unpaid. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Fred H. Baker, for appellant:

The subject-matter of plaintiff's complaint, for which the action was brought to recover, is a tax, which is not a debt nor a contract, but is an impost, not founded on contract or collectable by action, except where there is express statutory authority.

Rochester v. Gleichauf, 40 Misc. 446, 82 N. Y. Supp. 750; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 16; New York v. McLean, 57 App. Div. 604, 68 N. Y. Supp. 606; Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. L. 398; Augusta v. North, 57 Me. 392, 2 Am. Rep. 55; Hibbard v. Clark, 56 N. H. 155, 22 Am. Rep. 432.

Mr. Joseph M. Feely, for respondent:

A tax is the social debt, resting in implied contract.

Where a statute allows an action to recover a tax, "there is no distinction between the claim for taxes and a debt which could be recovered in a personal action." Re Babcock, 52 Hun, 142, 4 N. Y. The tax was made a contract by statute.

Davis v. State, 119 Ind. 555, 22 N. E. 9.

By limiting the action to the known form of one upon contract, the intention of the legislature was to limit the procedure therein to the contractual forms, and to subject the village to all the incidents of actions upon contract,—among which are counterclaims.

Cuddeback, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a municipal corporation organized under the village law of the state. The defendant owns land within the village, for which he has been assessed and taxed in the annual tax levy. This action was brought in justice's court to recover the tax. The defendant by his answer alleged that the tax was illegal. The answer also contained two counterclaims based upon contract. The justice rendered judgment, dismissing the complaint as to the tax and awarding judgment in favor of the defendant upon counterclaims. The judgment of the justice has been affirmed by the county court and by the appellate division of the supreme court. The appellate division has certified that in its opinion a question of law is involved in the action which ought to be reviewed by the court of appeals.

The question to be considered is whether a counterclaim against a village can be sustained in an action brought to recover a tax. The village law (Consol. Laws, chap. 64) provides the usual remedies of levy and sale for the collection of a tax, and in § 126 further provides as follows: "After the lapse of thirty days from the return of the collector, an action may be maintained, as upon contract, by the village, to recover the amount of an unpaid tax. . . ." But for this statutory authority the village could not maintain an action at law to collect the tax. Rochester v. Bloss, 185 N. Y. 42, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 696, 77 N. E. 794, 7 Ann. Cas. 15. It is argued on behalf of the defendant that the statute also opens the door to the counterclaims pleaded.

The court has reached the opposite conclusion. The obligation of the tax does not rest on contract. It is a statutory liability imposed upon all the inhabitants of the state defined as taxable, to the end that they may contribute their just share to the expenses of government. Rochester v. Bloss, supra. The legislature did not change the nature of the obligation by providing that the village might collect the tax in an action "as upon contract." The intention was to provide an additional and convenient remedy for enforcing the tax. In some municipal charters it has been provided that taxes upon land may be collected by foreclosure of the tax lien and a sale of the land through an action in equity, as the lien of a mortgage is foreclosed; but with regard to village taxes the legislature gave an action at law in which the judgment may be enforced by execution. If the quality of the tax was not changed by § 126 of the village law, then the defendant's counterclaim cannot be allowed. Section 501 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in an action upon contract the defendant may set up in his answer as a counterclaim any other cause of action on contract. This is not such a case. It is the substance of the plaintiff's cause of action, and not the form of the action, which determines the right of set-off, and the plaintiff's cause of action is not upon contract.

But, passing all questions which rest merely upon a strict or liberal construction of the statutes, the reason why a counterclaim cannot be set up against a tax will be found to lie much deeper. The reason will be found in the village law itself. The amount of the annual tax levy in villages, and the various purposes for which taxes are imposed, are fixed and defined in advance of the levy, and the money raised must be expended for the purposes so defined. If the taxpayer can properly refuse to pay his tax when called upon by the collector, because he has a claim for services against the village which is not included in the tax levy, it is plain that some legitimate and necessary village expenditure must be curtailed. If the taxpayer's claim is disputed, the collection of the tax must await and abide the result of a lawsuit, and meanwhile the financial affairs of the village will be thrown into great confusion.

Therefore, public policy requires that taxes be paid, and that claims against the village be collected in independent proceedings. If such claims are admitted by the village trustees, they may be included in the tax levy. If disputed, the claims must be reduced to judgment and so collected.

The general rule prevailing throughout the United States is that taxes are not subject to counterclaim or set-off on the part of the taxpayer. See cases cited in note, 34 Cyc. 656. A much plainer declaration by the legislature than is found in § 126 of the village law should be required before it is held that a different rule exists in this state with regard to any tax whatsoever.

The judgment below should be reversed, and judgment ordered dismissing the plaintiff's complaint and the defendant's counterclaim, but with costs to the plaintiff appellant in the Appellate Division and in this court.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Spartanburg County overruling his demurrer to a complaint filed to hold defendant liable for profits in a transaction by which he purchased corporate stock from plaintiffs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bomar & Osborne, for appellant:

If, after the discovery of the fraud, one party still avails himself of the benefit of the contract, or permits the other to proceed with the execution of it, he will thereby be held to have waived the tort and affirmed the contract.

If there is any cause of action stated, the complaint sets forth a cause of action separate and distinct in favor of each of the plaintiffs, and they cannot be united in one action.

The holding of BLACK v. SIMPSON, that a joinder of plaintiffs (individual stockholders) is proper in an action for damages for fraud based upon false representations as to the condition of the corporation, by means of which the individual stock of the several plaintiffs is secured at a price much below its real value, finds support, in part at least, in the holding of Bradley v. Bradley, 165 N. Y. 183, 58 N. E. 887. In this case it is conceded that if a complaint by several stockholders against officers of the corporation for fraud in inducing a sale of the stock of the plaintiffs to such officers at a price much below its real value was at common law for the recovery of money, the demurrer to the complaint on the ground of misjoinder of plaintiffs would be well taken, since neither plaintiff has any pecuniary interest in the stock of the other, nor any interest in the damages sustained by the other. It is, however, pointed out that the action is in equity to rescind the contract of sale which the defendant induced plaintiffs to make of all the shares of capital stock held separately by each, by a fraud ingeniously contrived with the design and to the end that both should be misled, and hence is joint in operation and effect. And it is held that a joinder of parties plaintiff under such circumstances is proper where the complaint shows that, although the plaintiffs severally owned their quota of shares, they nevertheless acted in concert respecting them and the interests represented by them, and were, by the same fraud of the defendant, induced to act in concert in selling their stock to him. The court reasoned that the defendant baited and set one trap for both, and caught both in it. The wrong of the defendant destroyed their unity of action as owners of the stock, and it is agreeable to equity that the plaintiffs should be extricated together, and be permitted to act together in rescinding the sale and in reinstating themselves in their former position, since the fraud alleged is of that single character and bifold or manifold effect that, in order to present its full scope, both causes of action should be united; and also, in order to avoid two actions, equity should take cognizance of the fraud in one action and dispose of it once for all, to the relief of both 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Without discussing this point, Austin v. Murdock, 127 N. C. 454, 37 S. E. 478, sustains a joint action by several stockholders of a corporation for damages for fraud and deceit in inducing them to subscribe for the stock.

But see Deaderick v. Wilson, 8 Baxt. 108, holding that several stockholders cannot join in an action against officers and directors of a corporation to recover damages severally sustained by them through a sale to such officers and directors of their stock, although it is alleged that such sales were procured through a conspiracy of such officers and directors to speculate in the stock owned by the complainants to their damage, and that, in carrying out such conspiracy, such officers and directors availed themselves of their superior knowledge, information, and power, and other advantages incident to their position as such officers and directors, and as trustees of the stockholders, to carry such scheme into execution and procure such stockholders to transfer to them their shares of stock at prices far below their par value, and far below the prices their superior information enabled them to foresee such shares would command. While the question of misjoinder of parties plaintiff was raised, the court did not pass upon it, but disposed of the case on the ground that the action was not maintainable on the theory of any trust or fiduciary relation existing between the officers of a corporation and the stockholders thereof, in so far as concerned dealings between the two with reference to their stock. On this point it is asserted that the officers and directors of a corporation are not trustees for the stockholders or individual owners of the stock in such a sense as to forbid their purchasing shares of stock owned by individual stockholders, except under the stringent rules that govern as between trustee and beneficiary, or as between principal and agent, or attorney and client.

The foregoing case also presented a question of substantive law as to the duties and liabilities of officers of a corporation in dealing with stockholders with reference to the stock of the latter. This question is not covered by this note. In general, however it may be said that there is a conflict among the cases upon this question of duty as affording a ground for charging the directors of a corporation with a constructive fraud in purchasing shares of stock from stockholders without disclosing facts peculiarly within their knowledge enhancing the value of the stock. As to this point, see note appended to Strong v. Repide, 213 U. S. 419, 53 L. ed. 853, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 521.

While, in the following cases, the complaint was not based upon a transaction between officers and directors of an association and the stockholders, it is believed the cases themselves are of sufficient value upon this question to justify a reference to them. Thus, in Loewenstein v. Diamond Soda Water Mfg. Co. 94 App. Div. 383, 88 N. Y. Supp. 313, although not necessary to the opinion, it is asserted that stockhold-

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal is from an order of the circuit judge overruling defendant's demurrer to the complaint.

For the purposes of this discussion, the material facts set out in the complaint may be stated in few words. The defendant, Arthur O. Simpson, was a director and general manager of the Farmers' Fertilizer Company, in which the plaintiffs were shareholders. The defendant, while occupying this trust relation to the plaintiffs, conceived and entered upon a scheme of acquiring the entire corporate assets at much less than their actual value, by representing to each of the plaintiffs that the corporation was not prosperous, but financially embarrassed, and thus having assigned to him the shares of each of the plaintiffs at much less than their real value. The defendant successfully carried out his scheme by means of the false representations to the plaintiffs as to the condition of the corporation and the value of its property; and thus, in breach ers owning stock in severalty cannot join in an action to recover damages they may have sustained individually through the depreciation in the value of their stock caused by wrongful acts of the defendant officers of the corporation.

And in Cazeaux v. Mali, 25 Barb. 578, in holding that an injury to shares of stock in a corporation caused by a fraudulent overissue of stock by the directors renders the latter liable to the stockholders, and any stockholder may maintain an action against the directors to recover damages for the injury without joining other stockholders. It is said that fraudulent acts by the defendants which have made the stock to the plaintiff valueless to him constitute an injury which is peculiar to the plaintiff as regards the stock owned by him, hence he cannot join the other stockholders with him, because they do not own the shares of their stock jointly, but separately, each owning his own shares separately and each sustaining his separate loss on his own stock. To the same effect, see Mead v. Mali, 15 How. Pr. 347.

However, in Wells v. Jewett, 11 How. Pr. 242, an action based apparently upon the same state of facts, it is said that the stockholders have a common interest and are all affected in the same proportionate degree according to their respective shares of stock, and hence it is proper that they join in an action for fraud in inducing the purchase of the stock by the plaintiff, and also for a fraudulent overissue of the stock.

A. G. S.

of his trust, induced the plaintiffs and other shareholders to sell him their stock. After thus acquiring all, or nearly all, the shares of stock, he sold "the stock, franchises, real estate, buildings, and machinery" at much more than he had paid the shareholders, to his great profit, and to the great loss of the plaintiffs.

The grounds of demurrer to the complaint are as follows:

"First. Upon the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it fails to state facts which, if true, constitute a joint cause of action in behalf of the plaintiffs against the defendant, and, if it states any cause of action at all, states a separate and distinct cause of action in favor of each of the plaintiffs against the defendant, it being submitted that such separate and distinct causes of action do not constitute a joint cause of action, and cannot be joined in one cause of action.

"Second. Upon the further ground that the complaint fails to allege any facts showing that the plaintiffs, or any of them, have ever rescinded, or offered to rescind, the several contracts whereby the defendant purchased from several parties all stock in the Farmers' Fertilizer Company, and fails to allege any tender by the plaintiffs, or any of them, to the defendant of the amounts paid to the several plaintiffs by the defendant for the shares of stock purchased from each of them, it being submitted that such allegations are necessary and prerequisite to the maintenance of this action."

Considering the second and less important ground first, it is perfectly clear that tender by each plaintiff of the amount received for his stock was not a necessary condition of bringing an action of this character. The action is not for rescission. Indeed, the complaint alleges that the property has passed from the ownership and control of the defendant.

But, even if the property were still in the hands of the defendant, it is elementary that the plaintiffs could either tender back the price paid and demand a rescission, or they could elect to let their transfer to the defendant stand, and bring their action to require him to account for the true value of the property acquired at less than its true value by false representation in breach of his trust. Examination of their complaint shows that this last is the course the plaintiffs have elected to pursue, and that the action is one to require the defendant, as their trustee, to account to them for profit obtained by the acquisition and resale of property through a breach of his trust. Whittle v. Jones, 79 S. C. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The second question, whether the plaintiffs can sue jointly to require an accounting from the defendant, is one of greater difficulty. The argument in support of the demurrer on this point has been strongly presented, but it is plausible rather than sound. If the transactions alleged in the complaint amounted to nothing more than sales whereby a stranger had obtained from each of the plaintiffs separately a transfer of his stock by false representations, it would be true that each stockholder should maintain a separate suit in his own behalf for the difference between the real value of the stock and the price paid. But this case is much more than separate transactions of that sort between strangers. The defendant, as director and manager, was trustee, not only of the corporation, but for all the stockholders. 10 Cyc. 787; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1090. His duty was to manage the corporate property for the benefit of the stockholders; and in the performance of that duty he was chargeable with the utmost good faith. It was a breach of his trust to all of the stockholders to use any means to acquire for himself the corporate property, except in the open after giving to the stockholders, fully and candidly, all material information he possessed as to its condition and value. Yet, according to the complaint, he entered upon a scheme to control the corporation and acquire the corporate property for his own advantage, by positive concealment as to the real condition of the corporation and the value of its property. Each separate purchase of the shares of a stockholder was but one step in the general scheme to defraud the stockholders, as a class, consummated by the acquisition of all, or nearly all, of the stock and the subsequent sale of the corporate property at a great profit.

Looking at the complaint in this its full scope, it seems to me clear, both on reason and authority, that the plaintiffs as cestuis que trust may maintain a joint action against the common trustee for an accounting for the profits made by him in breach of his trust at their expense, each being charged in the accounting with the amount received by him from the trustee in the course of the execution of the fraudulent scheme. The subject of the action is the consummated scheme to defraud the stockholders, the cestuis que trust of the defendant; and all the plaintiffs are interested in the relief of an accounting. Hence the joinder is allowed by § 106 of the Code of Procedure, which provides that "all persons having an interest in the subject of the ac-

Turning to the authorities the test in determining when there may be a joinder of plaintiffs seems to be whether there is a wrong common to all, or, stated differently, whether all are interested in the matter or thing concerning which the action is brought. Hellams v. Switzer, 24 S. C. 40; Bliss, Code Pl. § 76. That the consummation of the defendant's scheme to acquire the property in breach of his trust was a wrong common to all the stockholders, and a matter or thing in which they were all interested, seems evident. In this the case is distinguished from the Hellams Case, just cited; for that was an action by persons who owned separate tracts of land for damages, and an injunction against the defendant who had dammed up a stream. There was no common interest, no trust relation common to all the plaintiffs, no wrong common to all; and therefore the court held the joint action could not be maintained. It is well settled that several distributees entitled to unequal portions of an estate, after receiving unequal payments, may unite in an action against an administrator to require him to account for breaches of his trust, and pay over to each his share, though the shares be unequal. Stallings v. Barrett, 26 S. C. 478, 2 S. E. 483; McCorkle v. Williams, 43 S. C. 66, 20 S. E. 744; Wagner v. Sanders, 49 S. C. 192, 27 S. E. 68. The present case falls under the same principle.

The examination of the authorities leads to the conclusion that no inflexible rule on the subject of joinder of parties can be laid down, and that the provisions of the Code of Procedure on the subject must be allowed considerable flexibility to meet the requirements of justice and convenience in the cases as they arise. Pom. Remedies, §§ 257, 266; 16 Cyc. 198. This was so even under the strict rules of the old practice. "It is a favorite object of this court to prevent multiplicity of suits and variety of litigation. Furthermore, 'if the nature of the transaction' (says an approved author, Adams's Eq. 310) 'makes a single suit convenient, the objection of multifariousness in such cases will not be sustained.' In Oliver v. Piatt, 3 How. 333, 411, 11 L. ed. 622, 657, the court say: 'Where the interests of different parties are so complicated in different transactions that entire justice could not be conveniently done without uniting the whole, the bill is not multifarious.' And again: 'There is no general rule by which to determine whether a bill, in such cases, is multifarious or not; but it must be left to the discretion of the court, under the circumstances of the case.' 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

See also Williams v. Neel, 10 Rich. Eq. 338, 73 Am. Dec. 94." Barkley v. Barkley, 14 Rich. Eq. 12. In a case like this, where, according to the complaint, an officer of a corporation conceives and consummates a scheme to defraud the stockholders by deceiving them as to the value of the corporate property, and purchases the stock of each as a step in his scheme of fraudulent acquisition, it seems to us not only illogical, but most inconvenient and unjust, to require each stockholder to allege and prove the fraudulent scheme and the breach of trust in a separate action. In many corporations there are hundreds, and in some thousands, of stockholders, many of them having small holdings and residing at a distance from the corporate enterprise. To establish a rule which would deny to stockholders in such cases the right to unite in attacking such a breach of trust as is here alleged, and demanding an accounting by the trustee, would be a practical denial of justice.

For these reasons, judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Gary, Ch. J., and Watts, J., concur.

Fraser, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority. The complaint in this action alleges that the plaintiffs were stockholders in the Farmers' Fertilizer Company, a corporation which owned valuable property. That the defendant was the general manager of the corporation, and as such had charge, control, and direction of its affairs, and knew the value of the stock. That the defendant conceived the idea of selling the property, and making a large profit for himself. That, in pursuance of this plan, he entered into negotiations with others for the sale of the franchises and property, but kept the knowledge to himself. That after ascertaining the true value of the property, and the price for which it could be sold, the defendant did not call the stockholders together, but went from individual to individual, and, concealing the value of the stock and the condition of the corporate affairs, and leading them to believe that the affairs of said corporation were in embarrassing condition, thereby induced the plaintiffs and other stockholders to sell their stock to him for much less than he knew it to be worth. That, after purchasing all or nearly all the stock, the defendant sold the property and franchise for a large sum, and at a much larger than the sum at which it was estimated in the purchase of said stock, and made large gains for himself, contrary to the obligation which he owed to the plaintiffs. The gains were the loss of the plaintiffs, and not an increase in market value. That the plaintiffs, in selling said stock to the defendant, relied upon his representations and good faith and defendant's knowledge arising from the position which he held as general manager of said corporation.

The plaintiffs brought suit on behalf of themselves and all others who would come in under these proceedings, and asked for an accounting, and a judgment for the difference between the value at which the stock was sold and the true value.

The defendant made a motion to make the complaint more definite and certain as to (a) unnamed plaintiffs; (b) unnamed purchasers; (c) separation of causes of action.

The defendant also demurred because they claimed (1) that there was no allegation of a joint cause of action; (2) that plaintiffs had not rescinded or offered to rescind the contract. The motion was heard before his Honor, Judge Gage, who overruled both motions, but ordered stricken from the complaint the words, "and those who were acting for or in conjunction with him." From this order the defendant appealed.

Exception 1: "Upon the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it fails to state facts which, if true, constitute a joint cause of action in behalf of the plaintiffs against the defendant, and, if it states any cause of action at all, states a separate and distinct cause of action in favor of each of the plaintiffs against the defendant, it being submitted that such separate and distinct causes of action do not constitute a joint cause of action, and cannot be sued upon as a joint cause of action, and cannot be joined in one cause of action." In my opinion this exception ought to be sustained. There must be some joint interest. Here there is none. The sales were made by each individual for himself. Separate contracts of sale, and so far as the complaint shows may have been at different prices. They claimed no interest in the corporate property. This was a suit on twenty-two contracts, made with twenty-two different people, at different times, and each demanding, it may be, and depending on different evidence, a different money judgment. The plaintiffs are not associated in any way, and each ought to bring his separate action. In Hellams v. Switzer, 24 S. C. 40, there was an injury that rose from one cause, and yet this court required all the plaintiffs to be withdrawn except one. 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. pp. 541, 542. "Where two or more persons have a separate interest and sustain a separate damage, they may and must sue separately, and cannot join, even though their several injuries were caused by the same 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

act." The injury here was to the holding of stock, and the holding of stock is several. If two or more owned jointly a certain block of stock, of course, the joint owners must sue together. There is no allegation of joint ownership in the complaint.

It will be observed that the evils that rise from a multiplicity of suits are in no way avoided by the consolidation of suits here. A is not entitled to recover because there was fraud in the purchase from B. A may have been in urgent need of money, and willing to take less than the value in order to provide for his immediate necessities, and a misstatement was not required. It would be manifestly unfair to allow A to recover because of the fraud in the contract with B. The fraud in each of the twenty-two contracts must be proven, or he who fails to prove fraud ought to fail. This is not a case in which there was a fraudulent sale of the property of the corporation where the same act necessarily affected all. The same testimony that proved fraud as to B would prove the fraud as to the others. The small and distant stockholder has the same burden in the consolidated as in the separate suit in theory. In practice it will be found that proof in one case will inure to the benefit of all, and the wholesome protection provided by the exclusion of res inter alios acta will be denied the defendant. I do not see a single bond of union. The complaint does not even allege that the defendant now has the proceeds of sale and the plaintiffs are entitled to the share in the fund.

For these reasons I dissent. I agree with the majority as to the other exceptions.

MEMPHIS STREET RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

W. N. CAVINESS.

(— Tenn. —, 157 S. W. 63.)

Carriers — passenger — negligent injury — liability.

A city fireman carried free on a street

Note. — Degree of care owed to free passengers in absence of a stipulation upon the subject.

Earlier cases covering this question will be found in a note to Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Lawson, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 721. As was the case in that note, this note covers cases only where the injured passenger was rightfully on a common carrier's conveyance designed for the car by way of courtesy may hold the company liable for injury inflicted upon him by the negligent operation of the car.

(May 31, 1913.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shelby County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Roane Waring, for plaintiff in error:

One riding on a pass cannot recover except for negligence that can be called gross, wilful, reckless, or wanton.

Marshall v. Nashville R. Light Co. 118 Tenn. 254, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1246, 101 S. W. 419, 2 Ann. Cas. 675; Kirtland v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 452; Coward v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 16 Lea, 225, 57 Am. Rep. 226; Boering v. Chesapeake Beach R.

transportation of passengers under a valid pass, or authorized invitation or permission to ride, and does not extend to cases where he was on the conveyance without any invitation, or under an unauthorized invitation, or was fraudulently riding on a pass issued to another.

Nor does it include the liability of a carrier to passengers traveling on passes or contracts contrary to provisions of statute or Constitution. For such cases, see note to Bradburn v. Whatcom County R. & Light Co. 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 526, and Southern P. Co. v. Schuyler, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 901.

Nor does it include cases involving care owed to one riding gratuitously upon a conveyance of a private carrier, such as logging roads. For such cases, see note to Harvey v. Deep River Logging Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 131.

Nor does it include cases where the transportation was because of some contract with the carrier, such as drovers accompanying shipment of cattle, express messengers, or postal mail clerks. For liability of railroad company for injuries received by postal clerks, see note to Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ketcham, 19 L.R.A. 339.

For note as to rights of person riding on pass or contract for free passage, see note to Muldoon v. Seattle City R. Co. 22 L.R.A. 794.

The few reported cases found since the earlier note are in harmony with the rule laid down in the cases there collected.

Thus, in Southern R. Co. v. Decker, 5 Ga. App. 21, 82 S. E. 678, it was held that a railway company and its servants must use ordinary care to protect one who is riding upon a train by permission of the conductor, though it be gratuitously.

And in Wood v. Valdes, 4 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 166, that a carrier owes a duty to 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. Anderson & Crabtree, for defendant in error:

If the conduct of the defendant indicates or evinces a reckless disregard of the rights of others, then that conduct is grossly negligent.

Watermelen v. Fox River Electric R. & Power Co. 110 Wis. 153, 85 N. W. 663; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hall, 105 Ala. 599, 17 So. 176; Trauerman v. Lippincott, 39 Mo. App. 478; Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. v. Robinson, 125 Ala. 483, 28 So. 28; Memphis Street R. Co. v. Roe, 118 Tenn. 613, 102 S. W. 343; Marshall v. Nashville R. & Light Co. 118 Tenn. 260, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1246, 101 S. W. 419, 12 Ann. Cas. 675.

Negligence, whether ordinary or gross, is for the jury to determine.

take reasonable care of one riding on a free pass. And to the same effect is Ryckman v. Hamilton G. & B. Electric R. Co. 10 Ont. L. Rep. 419, 4 Ann. Cas. 1126.

In Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Klentschy, 167 Ind. 598, 79 N. E. 908, it was held that a carrier owes the same duty to a person carried gratuitously by its invitation as it does to a person who pays full fare. This was an action arising out of the same accident as that in the Lawson Case, to which the former note was attached.

But where a city fireman rides on the left-hand running board of an open car in direct violation of a rule of the company prohibiting anyone from riding in such place, and also in violation of the rule which required, as a condition of his free transportation, that he ride on the rear platform, the company owes him no duty, except to refrain from intentional wrongdoing toward him.

In Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 486, 14 L. ed. 509, it was asserted that when a carrier undertakes to convey persons by the agency of steam, public policy and safety would require that it should be held to the greatest possible care and diligence, whether the consideration for the transportation be pecuniary or otherwise. And this principle was expressly reaffirmed in The New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 14 L. ed. 1019. These two cases were both actions involving injuries to gratuitous passengers,—the Derby Case being that of an injury to a stockholder riding at the invitation of the president of the railroad free and in the president's private car, and in the King Case, the passenger was a former employee of the boat, who was being carried free by permission of the captain, in accordance with the usual custom to grant free passage to such persons.

J. H. B.

Leiner, 202 Ill. 624, 95 Am. St. Rep. 270, 67 N. E. 398.

Regardless of the status of the plaintiff on the car, he was entitled to a recovery on the ground that the defendant was guilty of such gross negligence as indicated a conscious indifference to the rights of others.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff below, W. N. Caviness, brought suit for personal injuries received while riding on a street car that collided with a wagon under circumstances showing, it is conceded by defendant company, negligence on the part of the motorman less in degree than gross and wilful negligence. Plaintiff was a member of the city fire department, and, under customary grant of that courtesy by the company, was riding free, without a pass, "on his uniform."

The company's defense is based upon certain language used by Judge Wilkes in the opinion in Marshall v. Nashville R. & Light Co. 118 Tenn. 254, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1246, 101 S. W. 419, 12 Ann. Cas. 675, which it is insisted holds or tends to hold that where, as here, no fare was paid for the passage, the relationship of common carrier and passenger is not to be deemed to have attached, and that the company would be liable only in event its gross or wilful negligence was established.

While, in the argument and reasoning of the opinion, language is used (in reference to cases quoted from, which relate to carriage of goods, rather than to carriage of passengers, and therefore not analogous) which may be confusing, yet that opinion is not to be construed as laying down the doctrine contended for by the counsel of the company. The decision in favor of the company sued in that case was based upon a provision of waiver in a pass held by Marshall, to the effect that he rode upon the cars of the company entirely at his own risk of injury.

As early as 1859 this court held against the contention of defendant company in the present case, in Washburn v. Nashville & C. R. Co. 3 Head, 638, 75 Am. Dec. 784; and nothing said in the Marshall Case was meant to indicate a departure from the rule there laid down.

In that earlier case it appeared that an engineer of the defendant company, on a private errand of his own while off duty, without previous grant of permission, got on a passenger train, and was injured in a collision while sitting in the baggage car. After stating that he was not to have applied to him the rules applicable as between master and servant, but was substantially 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

in the attitude of a stranger, and that he had been received on the train without objection on the part of the conductor, the court said that the case was not affected by the fact that the plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was riding free, citing Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 14 L. ed. 502.

The rule that payment of fare is not requisite to the establishment of the relation of passenger to a carrier, and that such a one, who is fairly accepted for transportation, may recover for want of ordinary care like a paying passenger, is buttressed by abundant authority. Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Keefe, 168 Ill. 115, 39 L.R.A. 148, 61 Am. St. Rep. 87, 88, 48 N. E. 294, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 48; Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Lawson, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 721, 143 Fed. 834, 74 C. C. A. 630, 6 Ann. Cas. 666, and notes; Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Klentschy, 167 Ind. 598, 79 N. E. 908, 10 Ann. Cas. 869; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 2d ed. 507; 6 Cyc. 544.

Negligence on the part of the carrier being admitted, as indicated, the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is affirmed.

H. C. REYNOLDS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
S. C. ANDERSON.

Broker — commissions — when earned.

1. A real estate agent, in order to recover commission for the sale of real estate, must produce a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to buy, upon the terms and conditions agreed upon.

Same — written contract to purchase.

2. The only legal evidence of his intent to comply with those conditions is his written agreement to do so. Hence a real estate agent is not entitled to recover a commission for the sale of real estate, unless he has also (in addition to the foregoing requirements) procured and presented to the seller, from the purchaser, who is ready, willing, and able to buy, an enforceable contract in writing, binding him to take the land according to the terms and conditions agreed upon.

ERROR to the District Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover commissions for the sale of real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. S. A. Horton, with Messrs. Harry White and Phillip E. Mann, for plaintiff in error:

To entitle him to a commission where no sale is actually consummated, a broker employed to find a purchaser, must either produce to the owner a customer who is able, ready and willing to buy on the terms prescribed by the owner, or else take from the customer a binding contract of purchase.

Mr. H. M. Carr for defendant in error.

Robertson, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action by C. S. Anderson against H. C. Reynolds to recover commission alleged to be due for the sale of real estate. The petition charges that Anderson was a real estate agent living at Stratford, Oklahoma; that Reynolds owned a farm in Garvin county that he wanted to sell; that he listed the same with Anderson at $85 per acre, or a total of $12,350, and was to pay Anderson 5 per cent of the amount realized from the sale of the land when a sale had been made. Anderson charges that, immediately upon the listing of the farm with him, he proceeded to advertise the same in newspapers and by circulars; that in a few months he secured a buyer for the land at the agreed price, drew a deed for the same, which was signed by defendant, but not by his wife, she refusing to sign it; that the prospective purchaser waited for two months for the wife to sign the deed, but that defendant failed and refused to deliver the deed with his wife's signature, but that he (Reynolds) subsequently sold the farm to another person; that by reason of his failure to complete the sale he became liable to plaintiff in the sum of $617.50 as commission. To this petition defendant filed a general denial. The case was tried to a jury and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for. The evidence shows that the defendant listed his farm by oral contract with the plaintiff as alleged in the petition, and that the plaintiff advertised the same and endeavored to secure a purchaser; that during the early fall of 1909 a real estate firm in Oklahoma City, by the name of Witt & Grubb, wrote to Anderson, the plaintiff, that they had a buyer for the farm, and asked him to divide the commission with them in case they furnished a purchaser, to which he agreed; that he also received a letter from the defendant, about this time in which he stated that he could sell the farm if Anderson would divide the commission with Witt & Grubb; that the purchase was to be made by a man named W. C. Kandt, who was negotiating for the farm through the firm of Witt & Grubb; that the defendant was to take a house and lot in Oklahoma City in trade and $6,500 in addition; $5,000 of which was to be in cash secured by a first mortgage on the farm, and the balance of $1,500 to be secured to Reynolds by second mortgage on the farm.

It also appears that while Reynolds was in Stratford, about this time, he called on Anderson and talked the matter over with him, and Anderson drew up a deed for the land, and Reynolds signed the same and put the deed in his pocket with the evident intention of taking it to his wife and securing her signature. Reynolds and his wife were living apart during this time. The wife refused to sign the deed, leastwise Reynolds never delivered it to Kandt, and Kandt, after waiting for two months or more, notified Reynolds that on account of his failure to deliver the deed with his wife's signature that the deal was off. The evidence further shows that Anderson had nothing whatever to do with the trade; that he never saw Kandt and never had any correspondence with him; that Witt & Grubb negotiated the deal. Anderson claims his commission solely by reason of his oral contract to sell the farm; he does not claim to have made the sale, or to have produced the purchaser, although he insists that he had the exclusive agency for the sale of the farm. It is further shown that after this Reynolds sold the land himself to another party. There was no contract in writing of any kind or character between the prospective purchaser, Kandt, and the owner, Reynolds. The amended petition was not challenged by motion or demurrer; no objection was made to the introduction of testimony thereunder, nor was there any request for an instructed verdict. The petition is barren of any allegation with reference to a written contract of purchase from Kandt, nor is it anywhere claimed by plaintiff that any such contract was entered into between Kandt and Reynolds, or that Kandt ever offered such a contract to Reynolds for his signature, or that any act of his (Kandt's) would excuse him from the provisions or requirements of the statute of frauds, or give Reynolds an opportunity to compel specific performance from him in case a deed had been offered to him for the farm.

Many alleged errors are raised and urged by counsel in their petition in error and brief, and each specification has been given careful consideration, and aside from one assignment, which will be noted hereafter, we do not think it necessary to give them any consideration, inasmuch as the disposition of the one referred to will effectually dispose of the case. The alleged error to which reference has been made may be considered under the first, second, third, fourth, or eighth assignment of error, and relates to the insufficiency of the allegations of the petition to state a cause of action, and the total failure of proof on the question of the existence of a binding or enforceable contract of sale between Reynolds, the owner, and Kandt, the alleged prospective purchaser. In fairness to the lower court it may be said that while this question was not presented at the trial, except inferentially, yet it is urged here by plaintiff in error.

The law on this point in this state had not then been determined; but, since the trial of this cause in the district court, this question has been presented to, considered, and passed upon by this court, and the law on this question settled, as may be seen by reference to the case of Gilliland v. Jaynes, — Okla. —, ante, 129, 129 Pac. 8. In that case, the facts of which are not wholly dissimilar to those in this, the court says: "We are inclined to believe that the weight of authority, as well as the better reason, supports the rule that, in order to recover his commission, the real estate agent must produce a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to buy, and that the evidence of this fact must be such as would be recognized in a court of justice. The sale of real estate is an important step, which the law requires to be taken in writing, and it is explicitly provided that no contract or agreement for the sale of real estate shall be valid unless it is in writing. These safeguards are designed to prevent fraud, and we are inclined to believe that the rule we adopt will have a tendency to prevent fraud, and will not work any hardship in a just case. If the real estate agent has a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to buy, it will not be difficult for him to have such purchaser sign an agreement to buy, which will become a valid, binding, and enforceable contract as against the purchaser. On the other hand, if the real estate agent merely procures a man who says he is willing to buy, his statement does not bind him, and within legal contemplation he has done nothing which the law recognizes. The best evidence of his being willing to buy is his written agreement to do so. In fact, his written agreement is the only thing which can be enforced against him, and his mere word of mouth that he is willing to buy would not be recognized in an action against him to compel specific performance. It would not even be competent evidence as tending to show that he had agreed to buy."

It must not be forgotten that the record in this case shows that Witt & Grubb procured Kandt to make the offer of purchase; Anderson never saw or talked to Kandt; the contract between Anderson and Reynolds was for the sale of the premises, while the prospective purchaser furnished by Witt & Grubb depended on a trade for the same. To be sure it seems as though Reynolds was willing to make the trade, and as an incident showing such intent may be cited the fact that Anderson drew a deed from him to Kandt, which Reynolds signed, put it in his pocket, and took it away from Anderson's office ostensibly to secure his wife's signature thereto; but the signing of the deed was not conclusive evidence as to Reynolds' intention at that time, inasmuch as the deed was never delivered, and Kandt refused to accept the same without the signature of Reynold's wife. Under the authority of Gilliland v. Jaynes, supra, and the cases therein cited, there never was a complete consummation of the proposed contract between Reynolds and Kandt, and, of course, Anderson had no cause of action at the time this suit was instituted, even conceding that it was through his efforts that the parties were brought together. Kandt did nothing that would take his proposed agreement out of the statute of frauds, or give to Reynolds a cause of action for specific performance against him. Before a cause of action existed in Anderson's favor and against Reynolds, it was the duty of Anderson, under the terms of his contract, to have secured a binding and enforceable contract in writing from Kandt, and to have presented the same to Reynolds, when, if he refused to accept such offer, a cause of action would have accrued, and Reynolds would have been liable for the commission. We need but refer to the most excellent reasons, given by Judge Ames, in Gilliland v. Jaynes, supra, for the necessity of these requirements, and the present case is but an emphasis for the rule there announced. Under Anderson's claims in the present case he insists on a commission for the sale of the farm when he had, so far as we are able to see, absolutely nothing to do with procuring the prospective purchaser; his contract with Reynolds was oral, and its terms cannot be ascertained, for Anderson claimed it gave to him the exclusive right to sell the farm, while Reynolds claimed the very opposite. This question was not decided by the general verdict of the jury; it was not an issue in the case, was not alleged in the petition, or treated in any manner by the court's instructions. So, too, there is a diversity of opinion between Reynolds and the other parties as to the terms of the proposed trade with Kandt. Were it not for the law as announced in the case above, we might very properly leave all these collateral questions for the determination of the jury; but when it is the law that these contracts shall be in writing in order, among other things, that the intent of the parties may be ascertained without doubt or speculation for the very purpose of preventing misunderstandings and attendant lawsuits, and no compliance with such law has been attempted by the parties, it is, and should be, the policy of the courts to refuse to interfere in their quarrel, but to leave them where they were before this action was begun. It would impose no hardship on any one to comply with the requirements of the law as hereinabove announced, and, as is evidenced by the instant case, it would prevent unnecessary litigation and trouble.

It has been suggested that the rule in this state applicable to this question has been settled by the case of Carson v. Vance, — Okla. —, 130 Pac. 946, and that the doctrine announced in Gilliland v. Jaynes, supra, is in conflict with that holding and with the holding of this court in former decisions on the subject; but a careful reading of that case, together with the other Oklahoma cases referred to therein, shows that there is no conflict, either real or apparent. Thus in the Carson v. Vance Case, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the question of a valid, binding, and enforceable contract between the seller and prospective purchaser was not raised, nor was it in any wise considered by the court. It is presumed that the contract therein referred to as having been made and entered into by the parties was a legal, binding, and enforceable contract, such as is required by the statute of frauds, in connection with the sale of real estate; there is nothing in the record to indicate the contrary; the court below must have found it to be such, and by the failure of counsel in that case to urge its invalidity, and the failure of the court to treat, or in any wise consider, the same, is conclusive evidence to our mind that there was no such question in that case, and, not being in the case, it was, of course, unnecessary to, and the court did not, consider or decide the same. In that case, the question considered was: "When has a real estate broker earned his commission?" The court said in answer: "A real estate agent authorized to sell land for another for a stated price for a certain compensation has earned his commission when he produces a purchaser ready, willing, and financially able to purchase the land upon the terms and conditions agreed upon." The law provides that one of these terms or conditions, which every contract for the sale of real estate must contain, is that the parties thereto shall express their intent in a binding, enforceable contract in writing. The reasons for this salutary provision of statute are so numerous that it is unnecessary to here set them out. There was no binding contract in the case at bar between the prospective purchaser and the seller, and therefore the agent was not entitled, under the pleadings and the evidence, to recover. This is a requirement of law that cannot be waived impliedly by either of the parties, although we do not attempt to say that a seller might not in any case be estopped by his actions from availing himself of the protection of the law in this regard. But of this we venture no opinion at this time, contenting ourselves with the observation that no such estoppel exists in this case. There are many other, but minor, questions raised in the petition in error, but their consideration is rendered unnecessary by the above conclusion. We feel that the rule announced in Gilliland v. Jaynes, supra, not only states the law as it is, but as it should be.

Entertaining these views, it follows that the judgment of the lower court should be reversed.

Per Curiam:
Adopted in whole,

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES C. BURLINGHAM et al., Trustees, etc., of Thomas A. McIntyre et al., Appts.,

v.

CHARLES M. CROUSE.

Bankruptcy — assets — life insurance — cash surrender value.

1. Policies of life insurance on the life of the bankrupt which do not have a cash surrender value available to the bankrupt at the time of bankruptcy as a cash asset do not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy, under the bankrupt act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. at L. 565, chap. 541), § 70a, subd. 5, which, though investing the trustee with the title to property which, prior to the filing of the petition, he could by any means have transferred, or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him, provides that a bankrupt, when the cash surrender value of insurance policies having such value has been ascertained, may pay or secure such sum to the trustee, and continue to hold and own them free from claims of creditors, and that otherwise the policies shall pass to the trustee as assets.

Same — assignment.

2. The absolute assignment by a bankrupt of policies of life insurance on his life does not exclude them from the operation of the proviso in the bankrupt act of July 1, 1898, § 70a, subd. 5, that a bankrupt, when the cash surrender value of policies having such a value has been ascertained, may pay or secure such sum to the trustee, and continue to hold and own them free from the claims of creditors, otherwise they shall pass to the trustee as assets; and such policies, therefore, if they have no cash surrender value, do not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy.

Note. — Life insurance as assets of bankrupt.

The earlier notes on this question, appended to Morris v. Dodd, 50 L.R.A. 33; Re White, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 451; Re Orear, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 990, and Re Andrews, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 123, show that heretofore there has been considerable conflict of judicial opinion on the various phases of the question as to the status in bankruptcy of a policy of insurance on the life of the bankrupt, under § 70a of the bankruptcy act of 1898, 30 Stat. at L. 565, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1511, the language of which is set out in BURLINGHAM v. CROUSE.

As shown in the earlier notes, the United States Supreme Court sometime ago settled two phases of this question, holding in Hiscock v. Mertens, 205 U. S. 202, 51 L. ed. 771, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488, that the term "cash surrender value," as used in the proviso to § 70a, embraced not only policies which by their terms had such value, but also those having it by the practice or concession of the company issuing them; and in Holden v. Stratton, 198 U. S. 202, 49 L. ed. 1018, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 656, 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 94, that § 70a, providing that the trustee shall be vested with the title of the bankrupt, "except in so far as it is to property which is exempt," together with the proviso, did not limit § 6 of the bankruptcy act, providing that "this act shall not affect the allowance to bankrupt of the exemptions which are prescribed by state laws in force at the time of the filing of the petition," and that the meaning of such language in § 70a was that where a policy was exempt under state laws, the trustee had no right to it whatsoever, the proviso being intended as a benefit to the bankrupt, and to apply only to policies which were not exempt.

BURLINGHAM v. CROUSE, and two other decisions of the United States Supreme Court handed down at the same time, establish the rule that the trustee has no rights under a policy which had no cash surrender value at the time of the filing of the petition. In one of such decisions, Everett v. Judson, 228 U. S. 474, 57 L. ed. 927, Adv. S. U. S. 1912, p. 568, post, 154, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 568, it is held that the time when the petition in bankruptcy is filed fixes the cash surrender value, and that hence the death of the bankrupt between the time of the filing of the petition and the date of the adjudication does not make the proceeds of the policies, over and above the cash surrender value, assets in the hands of the trustee, although § 70a also provides that the trustee, upon his appointment and qualification, becomes vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt as of the date of the adjudication. In the other decision, Andrews v. Partridge, 228 U. S. 479, 57 L. ed. 929, Adv. S. U. S. 1912, p. 570, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 570, reversing 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 123, 112 C. C. A. 69, 191 Fed. 325, the court, upon the authority of the two contemporaneous decisions, holds that the right of the bankrupt to pay the cash surrender value, and to hold and own the policies free from the claims of creditors, is not extinguished by his death after the filing of the petition, and that such right may be exercised by his executors.

About the time of the decision of the three recent cases by the United States Supreme Court, the South Carolina supreme court decided the case of Sanders v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. — S. C. —, 78 S. E. 532, in which two judges held that the trustee had no rights under a policy payable to the wife, which had no cash surrender value at the time of the adjudication, though the bankrupt died before the estate was set-

A PPEAL by the trustees from a judgment of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirming a decree of the District Court for the Southern District of New York upholding the title of the assignee of a bankrupt to policies of life insurance on his life. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dorr Raymond Cobb and Irving L. Ernst, for appellants:

The policies in question constituted property which the bankrupts could have transferred.

Re Slingsluff, 5 Am. Bankr. Rep. 82, 105 Fed. 502.

Policies are property irrespective of their value.

Re Roger Brown & Co. 28 Am. Bankr. Rep. 340, 116 C. C. A. 386, 196 Fed. 758.

The policies were valuable.

Partridge v. Andrews, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 123, 112 C. C. A. 69, 27 Am. Bankr. Rep.

393, 191 Fed. 325; Kinzie v. Winston, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 21, 56 Ill. 56; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 396; Jackson ex dem. Pearson v. Housel, 17 Johns. 281.

Prior to the present decision, it had been repeatedly held in the second circuit that the interest of the bankrupt in all policies of life insurance payable to his estate vested in the trustee, subject to redemption by the bankrupt when they had either technically, or as a matter of fact or custom, a cash surrender value, upon his paying such value to the trustee.

Re Coleman, 69 C. C. A. 496, 136 Fed. 818, 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 461; Re White, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 451, 98 C. C. A. 205, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 90, 174 Fed. 333; Re Hettling, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 161, 99 C. C. A. 87, 175 Fed. 65; Van Kirk v. Vermont Slate Co. 15 Am. Bankr. Rep. 239, 140 Fed. 38; Re Mertens, 73 C. C. A. 561, 15 Am. Bankr. Rep. 701, 142 Fed. 445, 205 U. S.

112. These two judges also held that the right of the insured to change the beneficiary did not pass to the trustee as property which the bankrupt could have transferred, or which could have been levied upon against him, nor as a power which he could have exercised for his own benefit within the meaning of subdivision 3 of § 70a providing that the property which passed to the trustee should include powers which he might have exercised for his own benefit, but not those which he might have exercised for some other person. One judge concurred upon the ground that such power was one which the bankrupt might have exercised by some other person, thus being excluded from the trustee by the express provision of the statute. One judge dissented, contending that the policy passed to the trustee.

In Re Morse, 206 Fed. 350, the court declares that the beneficial interest in a policy to the extent of the cash surrender value passes to the insured's trustee in bankruptcy, unless exempt under state laws; but holds in this case that a policy payable to the bankrupt's wife as beneficiary is exempt under the Kansas statute entitled, "An Act to Exempt from Legal Process to Beneficiaries the Proceeds of Life Insurance Policies and Beneficiary Certificates, and providing that all such policies and their reserves of the present value shall inure to the sole and separate use of the beneficiaries, and shall be free from the claims against the insured, and shall also be free from the claims of the person or persons effecting such insurance, their creditors, and representatives, and shall be free from all taxes and the claims and judgments of the creditors and representatives of the person or persons named in said policy or policies of insurance.

Some of the other phases of the question have been recently passed upon.

Bankr. Rep. 291, it is held that an insured's trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to claim and realize the cash surrender value of a policy payable to the insured's executors, administrators, or assigns, which the insured, while insolvent, and when the policy had a cash surrender value payable on demand, assigned to his wife without her knowledge, and upon which he thereafter unnecessarily paid two premiums in advance.

The South Carolina supreme court holds that a policy having no cash surrender value on the husband's life, payable to the wife, who was copartner in business, does not vest in the trustee in bankruptcy of the individuals and firm, where the husband had the right under the policy to change the beneficiary; and that the fact that the husband obtained a change of beneficiary after bankruptcy, by falsely stating that he was not insolvent gives the trustee no better right. Sanders v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. — S. C. —, 78 S. E. 532.

The Alabama supreme court holds that the exemption of a policy payable in favor of a person named by the state exemption act is not affected by the fact that the insured was authorized by the contract to change the beneficiary. Young v. Thomason, — Ala. —, 60 So. 272, citing Holden v. Stratton, supra, as settling the rule that a policy of insurance which is exempt under the laws of the state of the bankrupt is exempt under the bankruptcy act.

Re Loveland, 118 C. C. A. 310, 200 Fed. 136, reversing 192 Fed. 1005, holds only that a bankrupt will not, in summary proceedings, be required to surrender a policy of insurance on his life payable to his wife, to the trustee, but will be required only to assign all his rights thereunder, where it appears that the wife has had possession of the policy from the beginning, and has paid premiums out of money earned by her.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was brought in the United States district court for the southern district of New York by the trustees of the firm of T. A. McIntyre & Company, and of the individual members of that firm, bankrupts, against Charles M. Crouse and the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, to recover the sum of $90,698.32, the net proceeds of certain policies of insurance issued by the Equitable Life Assurance Society upon the life of Thomas A. McIntyre, one of the bankrupts, deceased. The proceeds of the policies were paid into court by the society. The judgment of the district court in favor of Crouse was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals (104 C. C. A. 227, 181 Fed. 479), and the case has been appealed to this court.

It appears that on the 10th of April, 1902, Thomas A. McIntyre obtained two policies of life insurance in the Equitable Society. They were known as "guaranteed cash-value, limited payment, life policies," each providing that upon the death of the insured the company would pay to his executors, administrators, or assigns the sum of $100,000 in fifty annual instalments, or the sum of $53,000 in cash, a total of $108,000 for the two policies. On April 14, 1906, the policies were assigned absolutely to the firm of T. A. McIntyre & Company, and on April 24, 1907, they were by that firm assigned to the Equitable Society as collateral security for a loan of $15,370. On February 25, 1908, two months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, the policies were assigned by McIntyre & Company to the defendant, Charles M. Crouse, subject, however, to the prior assignment to the Equitable Society. A petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed against McIntyre & Company and its individual members on April 25, 1908, and on May 9, 1908, the defendant Crouse paid the premiums on the policies, in the sum of $6,078.38. McIntyre & Company and the individual members thereof were adjudged involuntary bankrupts on May 21, 1908, and the trustees were elected on the 24th of July, 1908. On the 29th of July, 1908, Thomas A. McIntyre died, and the policies became payable.

It appears that the policies had a cash surrender value, which, at the time when the trustees qualified, was $15,370, or the amount of the loans of the Equitable Society upon the policies. It is therefore apparent that on the day when the petition was filed, as well as the day of the adjudication in bankruptcy, the cash surrender value would not have exceeded the loan and lien of the society upon the policies. The circuit court of appeals for the second circuit held that.

under the circumstances, the policies did not pass to the trustees as assets, and therefore the action which had been begun to set aside the transfer to Crouse, as a preference within the bankruptcy act, could not be maintained.

The correctness of this decision depends primarily upon the construction of § 70a of the bankruptcy act, which reads:

"The trustee of the estate of a bankrupt, upon his appointment and qualification, and his successor or successors if he shall have one or more, upon his or their appointment and qualification, shall in turn be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt, as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, except in so far as it is to property which is exempt, to all (1) documents relating to his property; (2) interests in patents, patent rights, copyrights, and trademarks; (3) powers which he might have exercised for his own benefit, but not those which he might have exercised for some other person; (4) property transferred by him in fraud of his creditors; (5) property which, prior to the filing of the petition, he could by any means have transferred, or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him: Provided, that when any bankrupt shall have any insurance policy, which has a cash surrender value payable to himself, his estate, or personal representatives, he may, within thirty days after the cash surrender value has been ascertained and stated to the trustee by the company issuing the same, pay or secure to the trustee the sum so ascertained and stated, and continue to hold, own, and carry such policy free from the claims of the creditors participating in the distribution of his estate under the bankruptcy proceedings; otherwise the policy shall pass to the trustee as assets; and (6) rights of action arising upon contracts or from the unlawful taking or detention of, or injury to, his property." [30 Stat. at L. 565, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1511.]

The part of the section particularly to be considered is subdiv. 5 and its proviso. Subdivision 5 undertakes to vest in the trustee property which, prior to the filing of the petition, the bankrupt could by any means have transferred, or which might have been levied upon or sold under judicial process against him. Then follows the proviso with reference to insurance policies which have a cash surrender value, permitting a bankrupt, when the cash surrender value has been ascertained and stated, to pay or secure such sum to the trustee, and to continue to hold, own, and carry the policies free from the claims of creditors; otherwise the policies to pass to the trustee as assets.

Two constructions have been given this section, and the question, as presented in this case, has not been the subject of direct determination in this court. The one favors the view that only policies having a cash surrender value are intended to pass to the trustee for the benefit of creditors.[†] The other, conceding that the proviso deals with this class of policies, maintains that policies of life insurance which have no surrender value pass to the trustee under the language of § 70a immediately preceding the proviso, which reads: "Property which, prior to the filing of the petition, he could by any means have transferred, or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him."[‡]

To determine the congressional intent in this respect requires a brief consideration of the nature of the rights dealt with. Life insurance may be given in a contract providing simply for payment of premiums on a calculated basis which accumulates no surplus for the holder. Such insurance has no surrender value. Policies, whether payable at the end of a term of years or at death, may be issued upon a basis of calculation which accumulates a net reserve in favor of the policy holder, and which forms a consequent basis for the surrender of the policy by the insured, with advantage to the company upon the payment of a part of this accumulated reserve. This feature of surrender value was discussed by Judge Brown of the southern district of New York, in Re McKinney, 15 Fed. 535, 537:

"The first of these elements, the surrender value of the policy, arises from the fact that the fixed annual premium is much in excess of the annual risk during the earlier years of the policy,—an excess made necessary in order to balance the deficiency of the same premium to meet the annual risk during the latter years of the policy. This excess in the premium paid over the annual cost of insurance, with accumulations of interest, constitutes the surrender value. Though this excess of premiums paid is legally the sole property of the company, still in practical effect, though not in law, it is moneys of the assured, deposited with the company in advance, to make up the deficiency in later premiums to cover the annual cost of insurance, instead of being retained by the assured, and paid by him to the company in the shape of greatly-increased premiums, when the risk is greatest. It is the 'net reserve' required by law to be kept by the company for the benefit of the assured, and to be maintained to the credit of the policy. So long as the policy remains in force, the company has not practically any beneficial interest in it, except as its custodian, with the obligation to maintain it unimpaired and suitably invested for the benefit of the insured. This is the practical, though not the legal, relation of the company to this fund.

"Upon the surrender of the policy before the death of the assured, the company, to be relieved from all responsibility for the increased risk, which is represented by this accumulating reserve, could well afford to surrender a considerable part of it to the assured, or his representative. A return of a part in some form or other is now usually made."

This case has been cited with approval in this court. Holden v. Stratton, 198 U. S. 202, 49 L. ed. 1018, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 656; Hiscock v. Mertens, 205 U. S. 202, 51 L. ed. 771, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488.

Under the bankruptcy act of 1867 [14 Stat. at L. 522, chap. 176, § 14] no special provision was made for insurance policies. The section providing for the passing of the assets of the bankrupt to the trustee contained the broad language of "all the estate, real and personal." Under this statute it was held in Re McKinney, supra, that the insurance upon the life of the bankrupt vested in the bankrupt estate only to the extent of its cash surrender value at the time of the filing of the petition.

In Holden v. Stratton, supra, this court held that the law of the state of Washington, exempting the proceeds of life insurance policies, was applicable, and under the bankruptcy act of 1898, § 6, the bankrupt might retain such policies. The circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit, from which Holden v. Stratton, came by certiorari to this court, had held that § 70a was not controlled by the exemption provided in § 6 of the bankruptcy act, and had adhered to its former decision in Re Scheld, 52 L.R.A. 188, 44 C. C. A. 233, 104 Fed. 870, in which § 70a had been construed to pass insurance policies having a cash surrender value to the trustee, unless the bankrupt paid or secured the surrender value, as pointed out in the section. While this court held that the exempting under the state law applied under the bankruptcy act to the policy in question, coming to deal with the construction of § 70a, this court said (198 U. S. p. 213):

"As § 70a deals only with property which, not being exempt, passes to the trustee, the mission of the proviso was, in the interest of the perpetuation of policies of life insurance, to provide a rule by which, where such policies passed to the trustee because they were not exempt, if they had a surrender value their future operation could be preserved by vesting the bankrupt with the privilege of paying such surrender value, whereby the policy would be withdrawn out of the category of an asset of the estate. That is to say, the purpose of the proviso was to confer a benefit upon the insured bankrupt by limiting the character of the interest in a nonexempt life insurance policy which should pass to the trustee, and not to cause such policy when exempt to become an asset of the estate. When the purpose of the proviso is thus ascertained it becomes apparent that to maintain the construction which the argument seeks to affix to the proviso would cause it to produce a result diametrically opposed to its spirit and to the purpose it was intended to subserve."

The section came again before this court in Hiscock v. Mertens, supra, and it was held that the insured was entitled to retain the policies upon the payment to the trustee of a sum equivalent to the amount the company was willing to pay according to its custom, although there was no stipulation in the policies as to a cash surrender value, and upon this subject the court said (p. 212):

"What possible difference could it make whether the surrender value was stipulated in a policy or universally recognized by the companies? In either case the purpose of the statute would be subserved, which was to secure to the trustee the sum of such value and to enable the bankrupt to 'continue to hold, own, and carry such policy free from the claims of the creditors participating in the distribution of the estate under the bankruptcy proceedings.'"

And in that case it appeared that this sum was less than $6,000, whereas in a short time, some six months later, the maturity of one of the policies would give it a value of over $11,000. But this court held that this circumstance made no difference in the right of the insured to pay the surrender value and hold the policy.

True it is that life insurance policies are a species of property and might be held to pass under the general terms of subdiv. 5, § 70a, but a proviso dealing with a class of this property was inserted and must be given its due weight in construing the statute. It is also true that a proviso may sometimes mean simply additional legislation, and not be intended to have the usual and primary office of a proviso, which is to limit generalities and exclude from the scope of the statute that which would otherwise be within its terms.

This proviso deals with explicitness with the subject of life insurance held by the bankrupt which has a surrender value. Originally life insurance policies were contracts in consideration of annual sums paid as premiums for the payment of a fixed sum on the death of the insured. It is true that such contracts have been much varied in form since, and policies payable in a period of years, so as to become investments and means of money saving, are in common use. But most of these policies will be found to have either a stipulated surrender value or an established value, the amount of which the companies are willing to pay, and which brings the policy within the terms of the proviso (Hiscock v. Mertens, supra), and makes its present value available to the bankrupt estate. While life insurance is property, it is peculiar property. Legislatures of some of the states have provided that policies of insurance shall be exempt from liability for debt, and in many states provision is made for the protection from such liability of policies in favor of those dependent upon the insured. See Holden v. Stratton, supra.

Congress undoubtedly had the nature of insurance contracts in mind in passing § 70a with its proviso. Ordinarily the keeping up of insurance of either class would require the payment of premiums perhaps for a number of years. For this purpose the estate might or might not have funds, or the payments might be so deferred as to unduly embarrass the settlement of the estate. Congress recognized also that many policies at the time of bankruptcy might have a very considerable present value which a bankrupt could realize by surrendering his policy to the company. We think it was this latter sum that the act intended to secure to creditors by requiring its payment to the trustee as a condition of keeping the policy alive. In passing this statute Congress intended, while exacting this much, that when that sum was realized to the estate, the bankrupt should be permitted to retain the insurance which, because of advancing years or declining health, it might be impossible for him to replace. It is the twofold purpose of the bankruptcy act to convert the estate of the bankrupt into cash and distribute it among creditors, and then to give the bankrupt a fresh start with such exemptions and rights as the statute left untouched. In the light of this policy the act must be construed. We think it was the purpose of Congress to pass to the trustee that sum which was available to the bankrupt at the time of bankruptcy as a cash asset; otherwise to leave to the insured the benefit of his life insurance.

It should be observed, in this connection, that in the present case the company had advanced upon the policies their full surrender value, as stipulated in the policies, and that the only interest that could have passed to the trustees would have been the speculative right to the net proceeds of the policies, contingent upon the death of the bankrupt, and possibly dependent upon the payment of large annual premiums for thirteen years.

It is urged, however, that under § 70a, the cash surrender value was to be paid by the bankrupt when ascertained, and the policies kept alive for his benefit; and as these policies had been assigned by the beneficiary to McIntyre & Company, not as collateral, but absolutely, they would not come within the terms of the proviso, and therefore the proceeds of the policies vested in the bankrupt estate; but we find nothing in the act by which the right of the assignee of a policy to the benefits which would have accrued to the bankrupt is limited. As we have construed the statute, its purpose was to vest the surrender value in the trustee for the benefit of the creditors, and not otherwise to limit the bankrupt in dealing with his policy.

As to the reimbursement of Crouse for the premiums advanced by him, and the application by him of the proceeds of the policies to particular items of indebtedness of the bankrupt estate in his favor,—upon the facts found we have no occasion to disturb the decree of the circuit court of appeals.

It results that the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals must be affirmed.

CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed an order of the District Court for the Southern District of New York directing payment of the proceeds of policies of insurance upon the life of Alfred M. Judson, deceased, less their cash surrender value, to his executor. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles K. Beekman, for petitioner:

Life insurance policies of a bankrupt, payable to himself, his executors, administrators, or assigns, but having no actual surrender value payable at the time of the filing of an involuntary petition in bankruptcy against him, either by their terms or the concession of the company issuing the same, are property within the meaning of the bankruptcy act, and pass to a trustee as assets of his estate.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves the title to the proceeds of certain insurance policies upon the life of Alfred M. Judson, bankrupt, deceased, collected by the trustee in bankruptcy. The executor of Judson's estate brought suit against the trustee in the United States district court for the southern district of New York, asserting title to such funds. The district court ordered that the proceeds of the policies, less their cash surrender value, be paid to the executor (188 Fed. 702); the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, upon petition to revise, affirmed that order (113 C. C. A. 158, 192 Fed. 834), and the case comes here on certiorari.

A petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed against the firm of Judson & Judson and its members, Alfred M. Judson being one, on December 17, 1910, and on December 23, 1910; Judson entered a notice of his appearance in the proceedings. On January 9, 1911, the firm and its members were adjudged bankrupts, and on February 9, 1911, Everett qualified as trustee. Judson owned certain life insurance policies at the time of the institution of the bankrupt proceedings, and thereafter and until his death, payable to his executors, administrators, or assigns. So far as this case is concerned, at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, these policies, with cash surrender values and subject to loans, were as follows: One policy for $5,000, having a cash surrender value of $2,291.49, and subject to a loan of $2,238; another for $1,000, having a cash surrender value of $332.31, and subject to a loan of $322; and another for $10,000, having a cash surrender value of $5,030, and subject to a loan of $5,240. It therefore appears that the cash surrender value of the policies on December 17, 1910, was $63.80.

On January 4, 1911, Judson committed suicide. Notice was served on the trustee that the executor claimed the right, under § 70a of the bankruptcy act, to pay to the trustee the cash surrender value of the policies when ascertained, but the trustee denied such right and also the right of the executor to the balance of the proceeds of the policies. Under agreement, the insurance companies paid to the trustee $8,675.14 upon the policies. The executor asserted title to the difference between the sum realized on the policies and the cash surrender value; namely, $8,611.34. The district court, upon the authority of Burlingham v. Crouse, 104 C. C. A. 227, 181 Fed. 479, held that the proceeds of the policies, over and above the cash surrender value as of the date of the filing of the petition, passed to the executor. The circuit court of appeals affirmed the order of the district court, holding that the time when the interest of the bankrupt estate in the policies passed to the trustee was the date of the filing of the petition, and further, also upon the authority of Burlingham v. Crouse, supra, that the interest of the trustee in the policies extended only to their cash surrender value.

The present case was argued at the same time as the case of Burlingham v. Crouse, 228 U. S. 459, 57 L. ed. 920, ante, 148, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564, and in so far as it is like that case the principles therein laid down are controlling. The present case has, however, a feature not directly involved in the case of Burlingham v. Crouse, because Judson, the insured, committed suicide before the adjudication in bankruptcy, although after the filing of the petition, and it is the contention of the petitioner that the bankruptcy act vested the title to the property in the trustee as of the time of the adjudication, and that the death of the bankrupt between the filing of the petition and the date of the adjudication made the proceeds of the policies assets in the hands of the trustee.

While it is true that § 70a provides that the trustee, upon his appointment and qualification, becomes vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, there are other provisions of the statute which, we think, evidence the intention to vest in the trustee the title to such property as it was at the time of the filing of the petition. This subject was considered in Acme Harvester Co. v. Beekman Lumber Co. 222 U. S. 300, 56 L. ed. 208, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96, wherein it was held that, pending the bankruptcy proceedings, and after the filing of the petition, no creditor could obtain by attachment a lien upon the property which would defeat the general purpose of the law to dedicate the property to all creditors alike. Section 70a vests all the property in the trustee, which, prior to the filing of the petition, the bankrupt could by any means have transferred, or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him. The bankrupt's discharge is from all provable debts and claims which existed on the day on which the petition for adjudication was filed. Zavelo v. Reeves, 227 U. S. 625, 630, 631, 57 L. ed. 676, 678, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 365. The schedule that the bankrupt is required to file, showing the location and value of his property, must be filed with his petition.

We think that the purpose of the law was to fix the line of cleavage with reference to the condition of the bankrupt estate as of 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the time at which the petition was filed, and that the property which vests in the trustee at the time of adjudication is that which the bankrupt owned at the time of the filing of the petition. And it is as of that date that the surrender value of the insurance policies mentioned in § 70a should be ascertained. The subsequent suicide of the bankrupt before the adjudication was an unlooked-for circumstance which does not change the result in the light of the construction which we give the statute.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

G. E. CROTTY, Appt.,
v.

NEW RIVER & POCAHONTAS CONSOLIDATED COAL COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 78 S. E. 233.)

Easement — way of necessity — physical obstructions.

1. A way of necessity over the lands of a grantor is implied in a deed, if, by reason of a physical obstruction to access to the granted land, the grantee cannot construct a road from a considerable portion thereof over the residue without an expenditure wholly disproportionate to the value of the land.

Same — when passes with land.

2. Such a way is appurtenant to the granted land, and passes to subsequent grantees thereof, and a subsequent grantee of land not used at the time of the severance of the larger tract by the common owner may, when the use of such way becomes necessary to the enjoyment of the land, claim it under the remote deed of severance.

Note. — Right of remote grantee to claim easement by way of necessity not opened by immediate grantee.

The question raised by the subject of this note is dependent upon several broader principles which have already been covered in previous notes, and there are not many cases falling entirely within the scope of this note as to all of the facts. But sufficient cases have been found to justify the conclusion that the principle underlying the decision in CROTTY v. NEW RIVER & P. CONSOL. COAL Co. is correct. The applicability of the principle to the facts of a particular case is, however, a different question.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Fayette County dismissing a bill filed to establish a right of way. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. R. Summerfield and Hubbard & Lee, for appellant:

The record in this cause discloses the actual right of plaintiff to the pass way in controversy as a way of necessity.

Although it appears that in some of the cases the servient as well as the dominant tenement had passed into the hands of a remote grantee, this note does not purport to deal with the question whether a grantee of the servient tenement is chargeable with notice of the potential right of way.

Generally, as to easements created by severance of tract of land with appurtenant benefits existing, see note to Rollo v. Nelson, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 315.

That the owner of land may grant a right of way over the same either by an express or implied grant is, of course, elementary law. Necessity on the part of a grantee is not the basis of his right to a way over the land of the grantor, but it is the basis for a presumption that the grantor actually granted the right of way when he sold the landlocked property. On the general question of ways by necessity, see note to Logan v. Stogdale, 8 L.R.A. 58. And as to what necessity will give rise to such presumption, see note to Corea v. Higuera, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1019, and supplementary note thereto in 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1075.

And it seems to be the prevailing rule that the presumption of a reservation may be based upon the grantor's necessity where he has disposed of the locus in quo. See notes in 13 L.R.A. 657, and 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 355, although the latter note has reference more especially to cases where the need for the way was apparent at the time of the grant.

From this it would seem that, where the contest is between two grantees tracing their titles to a common grantor, the relative time when the common grantor was divested of title to the respective properties would be immaterial, and it has been so held. See Collins v. Prentice, 15 Conn. 43, 38 Am. Dec. 61. But this principle does not apply to visible easements. See note in 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 337.

Since an easement runs with the land, the proposition that a remote grantee is entitled to all that was contained in the original grant is deducible from the above stated principles. The particular subject 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

here under annotation is, Does the remote grantee's necessity (assuming the existence of sufficient necessity) for a way over the locus in quo establish the presumption that a right of way sufficient to supply his needs was included in the original grant, where such way was never opened, nor the right asserted, by the intermediate grantee? CROTTY v. NEW RIVER & P. CONSOL. COAL Co. answers the question in the affirmative, and the holding is supported by Myers v. Dunn, 49 Conn. 71, where the whole tract was between two roads; the part sold touched neither road, but the deed contained a specific grant of a way limited in terms and by physical conditions to the single use of carting wood, which way seems to have supplied all the needs of the immediate grantee, who, after building a house, sold the property; the grantor sold the part of the property over which the limited way had been granted, and this grantee restrained the remote grantee, who was then living upon the property, from using the specific way for any other purpose than that of carting wood, even though physical conditions made any other use almost impossible; it was held that the remote grantee had a way by necessity sufficient to meet all his needs, over another portion of the original tract, which portion was then owned by the heirs of the original grantor. The court said: "The owner of land has a right to the most profitable use, the most beneficial enjoyment thereof, subject to limitations not necessary here to be mentioned. He may erect buildings and raise grain upon, and dig ores beneath, it; and when, by their conveyance to the defendant's grantor, the administrators imposed, in favor of the land granted, a way of necessity over the locus in quo, they are to be presumed to have intentionally done it for any or all of these purposes, and the law will declare that it may be used for all, for it desires and encourages proprietors to increase the value of their land by building houses upon and cultivating it."

The same principle was sustained in Pearne v. Coal Creek Min. & Mfg. Co. 90 Tenn. 619, 18 S. W. 402, where the in-dard, Easements, Bennett's ed. 26; Paine v. Chandler, 134 N. Y. 385, 19 L.R.A. 99, 32 N. E. 18; 14 Cyc. 1171; Pettingill v. Porter, 8 Allen, 1, 85 Am. Dec. 671; Washb. Real Prop. § 1236; Jones, Easements, § 316.

The right of way passes to successive grantees.

Blum v. Weston, 102 Cal. 362, 41 Am. St. Rep. 188, 36 Pac. 778; Proudfoot v. Saffle, 62 W. Va. 54, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 482, 57 S. E. 256; 14 Cyc. 1184; Burke v. Wall, 29 La. Ann. 38, 29 Am. Rep. 316; 2 Washb. Real Prop. § 1240; Logan v. Stogsdale, 123 Ind. 372, 8 L.R.A. 58, 24 N. E. 135; Thomas v. Bertram, 4 Bush, 317; Winston v. Johnson, 42 Minn. 398, 45 N. W. 958; Borst v. Empie, 5 N. Y. 33; Brown v. Thissell, 6 Cush. 254.

intermediate grantees had opened the way as to all their necessities, but had never done so for the purpose of developing the minerals, and the implied grant was held to be inclusive of a right of way sufficient for that purpose. The court said that if there had been a specific grant that did not include the right sufficient for the development, it could not be enlarged, but since no terms were stated, but wholly implied, the presumption was that the grant was sufficiently broad to cover a right of way for all reasonable uses of the property.

Although there was another and independent ground for the holding in Smyles v. Hastings, 22 N. Y. 217, the decision is also based upon the doctrine here under annotation, and the court said that since there was no occasion for the intermediate grantees to assert their claim to a right of way by necessity, because the land was wild and unimproved until it was acquired by the remote grantee, the right had never been lost.

In Nichols v. Luce, 24 Pick. 102, 35 Am. Dec. 302, where the remote grantee claimed a second way by necessity, in addition to the one to which the intermediate grantee had been entitled, on the ground that the additional way was necessary to reach a part of the property which was claimed to be inaccessible by the other way, the court approved the theory of the claim, but refused to grant it for the reason that not sufficient necessity had been shown.

In Moore v. White, 159 Mich. 460, 134 Am. St. Rep. 735, 124 N. W. 62, the court apparently approves this doctrine; probably not to its full extent, however, for there were some distinguishing features in the case, in that the "remote grantee" obtained title by inheritance from the only intermediate grantee, and it appeared that the intermediate grantee, while never claiming the exact way that was here claimed, had made some use of the locus in quo in getting in and out, and even this right had been denied to the complainant.

There are some cases in harmony with this doctrine, in which the reports are silent as to whether or not the intermediate grant-

It is appurtenant to every part of the tenement.

Messrs. Dillon & Nuckolls, for appellee:

To establish a right of way, it must appear that it has been exercised for the statutory period, with the acquiescence of tee had ever opened or claimed the right of way, and the omission of this fact somewhat weakens their force as authority on the proposition. Thomas v. McCoy, 48 Ind. App. 403, 96 N. E. 14; Taylor v. Warnaky, 55 Cal. 350; Kimball v. Cochecho R. Co. 27 N. H. 448, 59 Am. Dec. 387.

In Morse v. Benson, 151 Mass. 440, 24 N. E. 675, the owner of two lots with a public road across one of them sold the landlocked one, thus creating a way by necessity over a portion of the one retained; subsequently both lots passed into the hands of different persons, and the public road was relocated upon the locus in quo in such manner that the original way of necessity did not reach it, and it was held that the remote grantee had no right of way by necessity over that portion necessary to enable him to reach the road as newly located, but that his way extended only to the old location of the road. This decision, however, rests upon the ground that the intermediate grantee could not have extended the way, being limited by the terms of the implied grant, and precludes the supposition that the intermediate grantee had never exercised all the rights contained in his grant. Therefore the holding is not authority against the proposition.

But the government or state in disposing of public domains cannot be taken as the common grantor. Bully Hill Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Bruson, 4 Cal. App. 180, 87 Pac. 237; Pearne v. Coal Creek Min. & Mfg. Co. 90 Tenn. 619, 185 S. W. 402.

The doctrine that the extent of the right of way by necessity is limited by the necessity which creates it, and cannot be extended to suit the convenience of the owner beyond what is actually necessary (see 14 Cyc. 1202), is not necessarily inconsistent with the principle here considered, since that doctrine, like the holding in Morse v. Benson, supra, is a limitation upon the extent of the implied grant at its inception, and does not prevent a remote grantee from obtaining all the rights that can be presumed to have passed by the implied grant.

Poffenbarger, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill, filed to vindicate the plaintiff's alleged right to a way over the land of the defendant, claimed as a public one, a private one by prescription, and a private one by necessity, must be sustained, if at all, upon the last theory, since the evidence wholly fails to sustain either of the other two. The appeal is from a decree dismissing the bill.

The way in question is a short one, only 322 feet in length, leading from the plaintiff's 4.5-acre lot through the land of the defendant to a public road. This lot and the road are on two separate tracts of land which at one time constituted a portion of a still larger tract owned, prior to the year 1831, by Henry Banks under a patent issued by the state of Virginia December 6, 1794. This large tract, containing 12,300 acres, was divided into lots, and sold in 1831 and 1832, John Bowyer becoming the purchaser of lot No. 15, and Samuel Blake of lot No. 21, containing, respectively, 150 acres and 497 acres. The plaintiff's 4.5-acre lot is a portion of the former. At the time of this division a public road ran through lot No. 15, but there was none through lot No. 21. The portion of lot No. 15 out of which plaintiff's small lot was taken was cut off from the public thoroughfare by a cliff so high and steep as to render it impossible to go over it without very great expense. This portion containing about 30 acres lies about 400 or 500 feet lower than the table land on which the residue of the tract, through which the road ran, is situated. Above and below the cliff the mountain side is very steep, and the cliff itself is nearly perpendicular, and 100 feet high. The plaintiff's title goes back regularly to the deed to John Bowyer, and that of the defendant to the deed to Samuel Blake. The portion of lot No. 15 lying below the cliffs, excluding the plaintiff's 4.5 acres, is owned in small lots by the heirs of one Wood, and is unimproved. The plaintiff obtained his lot in 1905, and erected a butcher shop thereon. Later he put up a substantial building for residence and mercantile purposes. Until that time he had been permitted to use the way claimed by him out to the county road constructed on the adjacent land, lot No. 21, long after the division of the Banks land. About the time of the completion of the building, the defendants obstructed the road, and denied him the right of use thereof.

When Effie and Frank Roach, the heirs of Woods, conveyed this 4.5-acre lot to the plaintiff, more than sixty years had elapsed from the date of the division of the Banks survey and conveyances of its several parts. They conveyed, not a small lot out of a larger one, but all that had been assigned to them in the partition of the Woods estate. Hence, it cannot be said that at the date of this grant there was a grant by implication, on the ground of necessity, of a right of way through their remaining lands. They had none. If, however, there was a way of necessity included in the partition among the Woods heirs, which became appurtenant to this 4.5-acre lot, the deed to that lot to the plaintiff may have carried it. But, as the partitioned land did not extend to the public road in question, that way would avail plaintiff nothing. To sustain his claim, it becomes necessary to go back to the division of the Banks land in the years 1831 and 1832.

Whether an owner of land can go back beyond the deed of the immediate grantee, to the common source of title, however remote it may be, and claim a way by necessity as appurtenant to the land, is a vital and far-reaching question in the case. The authorities uniformly hold there must have been at some time privity of title. There cannot be a way of necessity over the land of a stranger to the title. Linkenhoker v. Graybill, 80 Va. 835; Kimball v. Cochecho R. Co. 27 N. H. 448, 59 Am. Dec. 387; Pomfret v. Ricroft, 1 Wms. Saund. 323, 10 Eng. Rul. Cas. 16; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 17. Mr. Sergeant Williams's note 6 to Pomfret v. Ricroft asserts the right to go back to unity of possession and title, however remote. It says: "If the origin of a way of necessity cannot any longer be traced, but the way has been used without interruption, it must then be claimed as a way, either by grant or prescription, according to the circumstances of the case. Where the fact is that there existed at one period an unity of possession, it must then be claimed as a way by grant." The principle and conclusion intimated in this note have been embodied in actual decisions. In Logan v. Stogsdale, 123 Ind. 372, 8 L.R.A. 58, 24 N. E. 135, the court, after very thorough consideration of the authorities, upheld the claim to a right of way asserted on the ground of necessity, by going back to a remote common grantor, citing Taylor v. Warnaky, 55 Cal. 350. The following is taken from the opinion: "The decision in the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case referred to is sustained by the doctrine maintained by the ancient and modern authorities, that the original grantor grants, as appurtenant to the parcel expressly conveyed, a way which will enable his grantee to obtain access to the corporeal property expressly conveyed to him. Both the corporeal property and the incorporeal right pass from the grantor at the same time,—one as the inseparable incident of the other,—and a subsequent grantee must necessarily take the land conveyed to him subject to the burden created by the implied grant." The character and weight of the considerations upon which this implication rests argue strongly the correctness of the theory of the decisions here referred to. Land without means of access is practically valueless. No reasonable use can be made of it, and it has no market value. The presumption of intent on the part of the parties to the conveyance, to provide a means of access, is so strong for this reason, that the contrary thereof can hardly be supposed. This brings the implied grant within a well-settled principle of construction and interpretation of contracts.

That the land was in a state of nature at the date of the division of the Banks land, and there was no road on lot No. 21, nor any occasion for an outlet in that direction for a number of years thereafter, are asserted and relied upon as inconsistent with a presumption of intent to grant the way in question. These circumstances are not broad enough in their scope to preclude it. The parties may well be presumed to have contemplated such conditions as the future was likely to bring forth. This principle is asserted in Uhl v. Ohio River R. Co. 47 W. Va. 59, 34 S. E. 934, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 263, in which the following is quoted from Jones on Easements, § 323: "The prevailing view in this country is that a way of necessity is not limited to such use of the land as was actually made or contemplated at the time of the conveyance, but is a way for any use to which the owner may lawfully put the granted land at any time." In that case Judge Brannon said: "Though such a use of that crossing may not have been dreamed of at the date of the deed, yet the crossing was for use for any purpose which might thereafter be called for in the conveyance from the land of its products,—whether a wagon carrying wheat or coal, or a pipe or other appropriate means of carrying gas,—so it did not practically impair the use of the right of the railroad to use its track." The principle thus applied necessarily includes, or accords with, what has been said in the preceding paragraph. A way of necessity springs out of the deed at the date of the grant, and becomes appurtenant to the granted estate. If it includes such a way as is necessary for any purpose to which the land may thereafter be adapted, and becomes appurtenant and attaches to the subsequent grant, when the occasion for a broader use of the adjacent land or a heavier burden thereon arises, the right to it is found in the remote conveyance. In the case just referred to, there was an express grant of a right of way, but not such a way as afterwards became necessary to the full enjoyment of the land, and the court held such larger grant had been made by implication. If a remote grant by implication can be invoked to enlarge a way expressly granted, no reason is perceived why recourse cannot be had to one for a way of necessity by implication for property which at the time, owing to its position and the surrounding circumstances, was unoccupied, and in connection with which no road was actually used. According to the legal theory, a way of necessity is granted for any and all purposes for which the land is adapted, and, if the grantee has at the time of the grant occasion for an outlet and demands it, he can enforce the right. It is therefore a right appurtenant to the land, and, having become fixed, it goes to subsequent grantees.

As to whether physical obstruction to access to land, such as the insurmountable cliff standing between the plaintiff's lot and the public road on the table land within the boundary of lot No. 15, will sustain an implication of a grant of a way of necessity, the authorities are in conflict, some saying the grantee cannot have a right of way out over the adjacent land of the grantor, if, by any means, no matter at what cost, he can get out over his own land; while others say necessity within the meaning of the terms as it is used in the law of contracts suffices. The latter class of cases seems to accord with reason and the considerations upon which the rule rests. If the cost of the construction of a right of way or road out over a man's own land would exceed the value of the land itself, or be greatly disproportionate thereto, it may well be supposed such means of access was not within the contemplation of the parties, and that a way out over the land of the grantor was contemplated. That a road over the adjacent land of the grantor is more convenient, and could be constructed at a lighter cost than one over the grantee's own land, will not sustain a grant of such right on the theory of necessity, of course, but, if it is practically impossible to get out over the grantee's own land, there is as clear a case of necessity, within the reasonable meaning of the term, as if it were surrounded by adjacent land of strangers; for, in the latter case, a right of way can generally be secured if a sufficient amount of money is offered for it, just as a road can be made up such a cliff as is described here by the expenditure of an amount of money wholly disproportionate to the value of the land, and so great the grantee cannot be supposed ever to have intended to burden himself with it. Logically, it is the necessity that gives rise to a grant by implication, not the character or form or occasion thereof. Very few, if any, of the cases in which it has been held that a way of necessity does not exist when a man can get to his own property through his own land, and that steepness or narrowness of the way does not prevent it, presented such as the situation we have here. In practically all of them the grantees had sought ways out over the grantors' lands on the ground of convenience and economy only. Such was the case of Shaver v. Edgell, 48 W. Va. 502, 37 S. E. 664. Of the evidence in that case Judge Brannon said: "It shows that his land runs a long distance along the public highway, and there is no obstruction of access to it, save some tolerably steep ground, and that a very usable road can be made to the highway at small expense, ranging from $5 up to $60, according to different witnesses, the most reliable putting the cost at $15 or $20." In cases like this the courts have said there need not be an absolute physical obstruction. The following text from Jones on Easements, § 316, is well sustained by authority: "The word is to have a reasonable and liberal interpretation. The way must be reasonably necessary. If it were limited to an absolute physical necessity, a way could not be implied if another way could be made by any amount of labor and expense, or by any possibility. If, for example, the property conveyed were worth but $1,000, it would follow from this construction that the purchaser would not have a right of way over the intervening piece as appurtenant to the land, provided he could make another way at an expense of $100,000." See Pettingill v. Porter, 8 Allen, 1, 85 Am. Dec. 671; Smith v. Griffin, 14 Colo. 429, 23 Pac. 905; Oliver v. Pitman, 98 Mass. 46; Schmidt v. Quinn, 136 Mass. 575; Paine v. Chandler, 134 N. Y. 385, 19 L.R.A. 99, 32 N. E. 18; Goodall v. Godfrey, 53 Vt. 219, 38 Am. Rep. 671; O'Rorke v. Smith, 11 R. I. 259, 23 Am. Rep. 440.

Applying the foregoing principles and authorities, we think the plaintiff is entitled to a way of necessity. The practicability of a way by a different course is relied upon, but, as it too would pass over a portion of lot No. 21, and be very inconvenient as compared with the road plaintiff now uses, the fact constitutes no defense.

The decree complained of will be reversed, and the injunction reinstated and perpetuated.

BEEMAN-SPAULDING-WOODWARD COMPANY et al.,
and

MILTON G. SMITH, Appt.

(— Or. —, 131 Pac. 1006.)

Bills and notes — guarantor — rights against accommodation makers.

1. One who, after the note of a corporation has been signed by stockholders as accommodation makers, places his guaranty on the back, may, under the negotiable instrument act, recover from such accommodation makers in case he is compelled to pay the note.

Trial — ignoring issue.

2. An issue raised by an answer, which is contrary to the other pleadings and the testimony, may be ignored in the findings.

Bills and notes — guarantor — assent to assignment for creditors — effect as to accommodation maker.

3. A guarantor of a corporation note cannot, before he pays anything on his guaranty, agree to an assignment by the corporation for creditors which will release the obligation to him of an accommodation maker.

Pleading — supplemental answer — judgment against codefendant.

4. One of several accommodation makers of a note who wishes to take advantage of the entry of a judgment by default against a comaker after the joining of issue in a proceeding against himself, must file a plea setting up such fact under a statute permitting a defendant to make a supplemental answer or reply alleging facts material to the cause occurring after the former answer or reply.

Bills and notes — comaker — joint liability — effect of judgment against comaker.

5. An accommodation maker of a note containing a joint promise to pay cannot defeat an action against himself by a guarantor, because a judgment has been taken against a comaker.

Same — suit by guarantor — attorneys' fees.

6. A guarantor of a note which he is compelled to pay is not entitled to the benefit of a provision in the note for payment of attorneys' fees in an action against an accommodation maker, although the statute provides that when the instrument is paid by a person secondarily liable, it is not discharged, but the party by paying is remitted to his former rights as regards all prior parties.

Interest — note — payment by guarantor.

7. A guarantor who pays the note is entitled to interest at the statutory rate only, regardless of the rate provided for in the note.

APPEAL by defendant Smith from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount of a note which plaintiff was compelled to pay for defendants. Modified.

Statement by Burnett, J.:

About March 30, 1908, the Beeman-Spauldning-Woodward Company, hereinafter called the corporation, applied to the Hibernia Savings Bank, to be called the bank, for a loan of $2,500. The bank officers drew up a note of that date, of which here follows a copy:

$2,500. Portland, Or., March 30, 1908.

On demand, after date, without grace, I promise to pay to the order of Hibernia Savings Bank at the Hibernia Savings Bank, of Portland, Oregon, twenty-five hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States of America, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from date until paid; value received. Interest payable quarterly, and if not so paid the whole sum, both principal and interest, to become immediately due and collectible at the option of the holder of this note; and I further agree to pay all taxes and assessments which may be levied or assessed to the holder of this note on account thereof; and in case suit or action is instituted to collect this note or any portion thereof, I promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable, as attorneys' fees in said suit or action.

This note was signed by the corporation and forwarded by the bank to its correspondent at Seattle, Washington, with this writing on the back, to be presented to the plaintiff there for his signature: "For value received, I hereby guarantee the payment of the within note at maturity, or any time thereafter, with interest at 8 per cent per annum until paid, and hereby waive demand, protest, and notice of nonpayment, and consent that the payment of this note may be extended from time to time without affecting my liability thereon." Noble refused to sign the writing last above quoted unless the defendants Julius Beeman, Lewis V. Woodward, and M. G. Smith, who were members of the corporation, would sign the note as makers, and it was returned to the bank. The three individual defendants then signed the note, which was again sent to Seattle, where Noble signed the writing on the back, and, after again receiving it, the bank paid to the corporation $2,500, the principal of the note. It is admitted by all parties that this money was borrowed by the corporation for its own use, and that neither the plaintiff nor any of the individual defendants received any of it, though the latter were members of the corporation. The interest was paid to March 30, 1909.

The complaint sets out the note and the writing on the back thereof in full, alleges the payment of the interest, and that, the defendants having failed to pay the note, the bank compelled the plaintiff to pay the same, and he did pay it to the bank on April 14, 1910. It was agreed that he paid $2,700 on that date to take up the note, and he alleges that he has been and now is the owner and holder thereof. It is charged also that, by the terms of the note, the defendants promised and agreed to pay the bank the sum of $2,500 on demand, but that, although demand was made upon them by the bank, they had refused to pay the same or any part thereof; that the plaintiff never received any of the proceeds of the note, but indorsed the same as stated for the accommodation of the defendants and to enable them to procure a loan of $2,500 from the bank. It is also averred that the plaintiff was compelled to employ a firm of attorneys to bring an action upon the note, and agreed to pay them a reasonable attorneys' fee therefor, which the plaintiff alleges is $500. The plaintiff demands the amount paid by him on the note, together with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from April 14, 1910, and for $500 attorneys' fees. The summons was served on the corporation and the defendant Woodward respectively May 5, 1910, and May 10, 1910, but neither of them answered. It was served upon the defendant Smith May 20, 1910, and he is the only person who answered in the action. The first answer was filed May 28, 1910. On October 13th of that year, summons having been served upon the defendant Beeman by publication, his default was entered and judgment taken against him for the sum demanded in the original complaint. On December 23d Smith filed an amended answer, upon which the case was tried. He admitted the execution of the promissory note set out in the complaint, but says that he executed it only as surety for the corporation and without any consideration to himself whatever. The execution and indorsement of the plaintiff's written guaranty of payment of the note as inducement to the bank to loan money to the corporation is also admitted, but Smith denies that it was an inducement to the bank to loan money to anyone except the corporation. The answer concedes that the bank compelled the plaintiff to pay the note on April 14, 1910, but denies that he is the owner or holder of it, or as such is in possession thereof. The employment of the attorneys and the necessity therefor, the reasonableness of the fee of $500, or any other sum, are all challenged by the answer. Further answering the complaint, Smith avers, in substance, that the $2,500 included in the note of March 30, 1908, was loaned to and received by the corporation for its sole benefit, and no part of the same was ever received or used by Smith; that he signed the note as surety only for the accommodation of the corporation and without any consideration whatsoever; and that the plaintiff both before and at the time he executed said written guaranty of payment of the note, and at the time he paid the same on April 14, 1910, had full knowledge and notice and well knew that said $2,500 was being loaned to the corporation alone for its sole and exclusive use, and that this defendant signed said promissory note as a surety only. As a second defense Smith avers substantially that the corporation borrowed said sum of $2,500 from the plaintiff for its own use and benefit alone, and gave the note, signed by itself as principal and by the other defendants as sureties, to secure payment of the same, and that, knowing all this, the plaintiff did on or about August 2, 1909, duly enter into an agreement with the corporation and its other creditors that it should assign all its property to S. C. Spencer in trust for the benefit of all said creditors to dispose of and convert the same into money, and, after deducting his necessary expenses in that behalf, to divide and distribute the residue among said creditors pro rata in full payment of their claims against the corporation, and that said assignment of the assets of the corporation to Spencer should release the corporation from all liability on account of all claims of its said creditors against it. He further states that, in accordance with this agreement and with plaintiff's assent thereto, the corporation transferred all its property to Spencer, who has converted and is converting the same into money in execution of the agreement, and that by reason of the premises Smith is released and discharged from all obligations or liability on the note. The amended answer of Smith was traversed by the reply.

The cause was tried before the court without a jury, and the judge found facts substantially according to the allegations of the complaint, and in addition thereto found that Smith signed the note as surety only, receiving no part of the proceeds of the loan nor any consideration for signing it, and that he executed the same only as an accommodation maker for the corporation. The judge also made this finding: "That on or about August 2, 1909, the corporation turned all of its assets over to S. C. Spencer in trust for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation, and that said Spencer was to reduce the assets of said corporation to money and take out his reasonable charges and expenses therefor and in connection therewith, and pay the creditors of the corporation pro rata out of the net amount realized, so that the creditors of the corporation would receive said pro rata share in full of their claims against it, and that a large number of the creditors of the corporation signed this agreement with said Spencer, but that the plaintiff herein never did sign it; that said Spencer entered upon the duties of his trust and has reduced some of the assets to cash, but that he never paid said plaintiff anything for or on account of the note herein nor anything to the Hibernia Savings Bank." The answering defendant made various objections to the findings of the court, but the one principally relied upon is to the effect that it was not determined by the court whether the plaintiff assented to or became bound by the agreement between the corporation and its creditors and the transfer of its assets to Spencer as trustee in accordance therewith. The court disregarded all the objections to the findings and entered judgment against Smith for $2,700, with interest at 8 per cent per annum from April 14, 1910, and $275 attorneys' fees, with costs and disbursements. From this judgment the defendant Smith appeals.

Burnett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It may be conceded that as to the bank the plaintiff, who signed the writing on the back of the note, and the defendants in this action, all of whom signed the note as makers, were all directly liable. Such is the doctrine taught by all the cases cited in the defendant's brief. Hungerford v. O'Brien, 37 Minn. 306, 34 N. W. 161; Hecht v. Acme Coal Co. 19 Wyo. 10, 113 Pac. 786; Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Co. v. Farnham, 1 Okla. 375, 33 Pac. 867; Roberts v. Hawkins, 70 Mich. 566, 38 N. W. 575, and other cases. The question, however, here to be determined is not between the bank and the parties to this suit, but it is for us to decide what is the relation existing between the plaintiff, who signed the instrument on the back of the note, on the one hand, and the defendants here, who signed as makers, on the other. In the first place it is laid down in the case of Staver & Walter v. Locke, 22 Or. 519, 524, 17 L.R.A. 652, 29 Am. St. Rep. 621, 30 Pac. 497, 498, that "in determining the liability of a surety or a guarantor, it must be remembered that he is a favorite of the law, and has the right to stand upon the strict terms of his obligation when such terms are ascertained."

It is manifest, upon the face of the writings involved, that at the outset the parties intended to be bound to the bank in different capacities for, as conceded by all parties, Noble refused to sign the contract of guaranty indorsed on the note, unless the individual members of the corporation, including the answering defendant here, should themselves sign the note; and it was only when the note was again presented to him with the signatures of the individual defendants as makers that he signed as he did. Our Negotiable Instrument Law (Laws 1899, p. 27, § 63) provides: "A person placing his signature upon an instrument otherwise than as a maker, drawer, or acceptor is deemed to be an indorser, unless he clearly indicates by appropriate words his intention to be bound in some other capacity." Under this section it is plain that Noble was not an indorser, because he indicated by the appropriate word "guaranty" his intention to be bound in that capacity, and not as an indorser. Section 5862 L. O. L., says: "An accommodation party is one who has signed the instrument as maker, drawer, acceptor, or indorser, without receiving value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person. Such a person is liable on the instrument to a holder for value, notwithstanding such holder at the time of taking the instrument knew him to be only an accommodation party." The Code has thus limited accommodation parties to the four classes of maker, drawer, acceptor, or indorser. True enough it has not made it unlawful for any person to enter into a contract of guaranty as to the debts of another party, but by the law, "the mention of one being the exclusion of the other," such a guarantor is not an accommodation party. Although, by placing his name only on the back of the note, Noble would have been an indorser, he clearly excluded himself from that category by the terms of the writing which he signed, indicating his intention to be bound in a different capacity. So far as anything is concerned in this case, the writing which Noble signed would have been equally efficacious if it had been inscribed on an entirely separate piece of paper, with appropriate words describing the instrument to be secured.

Taking Noble's agreement and the note together, nothing else being shown, his liability is not concurrent with that of those who signed the note as makers, but successive to theirs, and this would be true, in the absence of any other showing, even if Noble had merely written his name on the back of the note before it was delivered to the bank and the money advanced thereon. The law of this state says that "the person 'primarily' liable on an instrument is the person who by the terms of the instrument is absolutely required to pay the same." L. O. L. § 6023. On the face of the note this is the liability of the defendant Smith. The same section says further: "All other parties are secondarily liable." Even if Noble had merely written his name on the back of the note and thus became an indorser under the terms of § 5896, L. O. L. he would still have been only secondarily liable, as respects the makers, and hence not in the same category with Smith. But if we should treat Noble as strictly an indorser, and not a guarantor, as far as appears from the note itself and its indorsements, "it is the established rule that the parties to ordinary commercial paper, negotiated for value in the regular course of business, are liable to each other in succession as their names appear upon the instrument; the acceptor of a bill or the maker of a note being the principal debtor and the indorsers being liable severally in the order in which their names are written. The same rule applies in the absence of special agreement to successive accommodation parties, and a subsequent accommodation indorser, who has been compelled to meet the obligation, may maintain an action upon the instrument against any prior accommodation party and recover the whole amount paid, although he knew that the latter's signature was given for accommodation merely. . . . It follows that successive accommodation parties, acceptor and indorser, maker and indorser, or successive indorsers, are not to be considered as co-sureties, and therefore they are not entitled to contribution among themselves unless they specially agree that they are to be bound jointly, and not severally; but where such an agreement exists, contribution may be enforced, and the agreement may be proved by parol or may be evidenced by the circumstances of the case." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 356. To the same effect is the doctrine taught by the case of Montgomery v. Page, 29 Or. 320, 44 Pac. 689. There Montgomery had signed a note as maker which had already been signed by a partnership in its firm name and by the individual partners. Montgomery was in fact a surety, and at the same time, as part of the transaction, the defendant Page wrote on the back of the note and signed these words, "for value received I hereby guarantee the payment of the within note," and, having been compelled to pay the note, brought an action against Page, and alleged that, at the time of the making of the note and the indorsement by Page, it was agreed between them that, in case either should be compelled to pay the note, the other would contribute half of the amount required to be paid. Based upon such an allegation, this court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Wolverton, held that the agreement could be proved by parol, and could be relied upon to take the case out of the natural operation of the law upon the writings embodied in the note and the indorsement thereof. The contract raised by operation of the law between the makers of a promissory note and the indorsers thereof is that the liability is successive. This contract may be overcome and the natural operation of the law be superseded only by a special contract between the parties thus bound to pay the note.

Turning to the answer of the defendant Smith, we find it to be utterly silent about any agreement between himself and Noble about the relation to be sustained between each other as to the note, independent of the effect of the note itself and the contract indorsed thereon by Noble. All that the answer alleges in that respect is that Noble, at the time he executed the written guaranty on the note, knew that Smith was a surety or an accommodation maker, and not a principal. Not having alleged any special agreement taking it out of the ordinary category, whereby Noble's liability would be subsequent to that of Smith, the latter could not resist the action of Noble against him on that point. Moreover, if this were an open question on the pleadings, the trial court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint in that respect, and this amounts to a verdict which we cannot disturb, unless we can affirmatively say there is no evidence to support it. Evidence of a nature tending to support the findings of the court in this particular is found in the circumstance that Noble was a stranger to the corporation, while Smith himself was a director and interested therein; that Smith signed as a maker, while at best Noble was only an indorser. The result is the same whether we consider the matter as one of pleadings or one of evidence.

It is next contended that the assignment of the corporation's assets to Spencer, as trustee under the agreement of August 2, 1909, constituted a payment of the debts and a release to the company and of the sureties as to all creditors of the company signing an agreement consenting thereto, and that the assent of Noble was a material issue upon which the court refused to find. This contention is fallacious in at least two features: First, the answer upon which this contention is based alleges that the corporation borrowed the money directly from the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff accepted the promissory note as security for the payment of the loan, thus placing the plaintiff in the position of an original principal creditor of the corporation. This is manifestly so contrary to the other pleadings of the parties, as well as the testimony in the case, that the court would have been justified in utterly disregarding the contention as sham. In short, there is no testimony whatever tending to show that the plaintiff originally loaned the money to the corporation. On the contrary, all agree that the money was advanced by the bank on the note, signed, as stated in the pleadings, by the defendants here, and the agreement of Noble indorsed thereon. Further, the court did substantially determine the issue in the fourteenth finding of fact, in substance, that a large number of the creditors of the corporation signed the agreement with Spencer to convert the assets of the corporation into cash, but the plaintiff never did sign the agreement, and that nothing has ever been paid by Spencer to the bank or to the plaintiff on account of the note. Secondly, whatever was done with Spencer about realizing upon the assets of the concern was agreed upon before the plaintiff had paid anything on the note and while he was still either guarantor or indorser, as the case might be. He did not, and could not, release anything of value to the defendant Smith, for he had no control over the assets of the corporation, and was not in a position to exercise any control over them. He could not do anything either favorable or unfavorable to Smith in that connection at that time, and hence it is immaterial to consider whether he assented to the Spencer contract or not.

The defendant also maintains that the default judgment taken against Beeman operates to release Smith from any liability; in other words, that it is a bar to any judgment against Smith. Prior to the rendition of this default judgment against Beeman, the issues had been made up between the plaintiff and the defendant Smith. If he had intended to rely upon the Beeman judgment as a bar to a judgment against himself, Smith should have operated under § 108, L. O. L. reading thus: "The plaintiff and defendant respectively may be allowed, on motion, to make a supplemental complaint, answer, or reply, alleging facts material to the case, occurring after the former complaint, answer, or reply." This is a statutory rule analogous to the common-law plea of puis darrein continuance; and, if a party would rely upon anything occurring since the issues were joined, it was his duty to bring it to the attention of the court by a proper plea. 31 Cyc. 493; Trotter v. Stayton, 45 Or. 301, 77 Pac. 395.

Again, the obligation of the defendant, which Noble guaranteed, was a joint and several obligation, being a note on which the words were, "For value received, I promise to pay." Noble stands in the situation of saying to the defendants: "I guaranteed the performance of your joint and several obligation. Having performed that obligation for you and in your place, I now demand of you that you perform the same to me as you should have done to the bank." Under such circumstances, the obligation which they assumed to him who stood sponsor for them is not materially different from that which they assumed to the bank. In good reason, therefore, the obligation of the defendants to their guarantor, Noble, is joint and several. It presents a case within the meaning of Sears v. McGrew, 10 Or. 48, where it was held that, when the action was upon a contract joint and several, a several judgment would be proper, as the defendant might have been sued alone in said case; therefore judgment might be rendered against one or more without waiting for the final trial.

It is lastly contended that Noble was not entitled to recover from Smith any attorneys' fees, and this will be considered in determining what judgment should have been entered in the court below, as we are empowered to do under article 7 of the Constitution. Without having taken an assignment of the note, Noble is not the owner or holder thereof in the true meaning and intent of the law. In legal effect he is not bringing an action upon the note. It is said in § 5954, L. O. L., that "where the instrument is paid by a party secondarily liable thereon it is not discharged, but the party so paying it is remitted to his former rights as regards all prior parties, and he may strike out his own and all subsequent indorsements and again negotiate the instrument,"—with certain exceptions not here material. It is argued that the right of again negotiating the instrument includes the right to bring an action upon it, from which it would follow that the present proceeding is directly upon the note entailing the allowance of attorneys' fees. Manifestly this section refers only to indorsers for value, and not for mere accommodation. An indorser for value at some time prior to his indorsement owned the note with the right to sue upon it at maturity. With this right he parted when he discounted the paper by indorsement to a purchaser for value, who in turn by like process may transfer the title, becoming liable by his indorsement to the new indorsee, and so on without limit until the maturity of the instrument. Then, whichever of the successive indorsers is compelled to pay is restored to his former rights within the meaning of this section, upon striking out his own and subsequent indorsements.

The case is entirely different, in reason, concerning an accommodation indorser or a guarantor. Neither of them has any "former rights," or, indeed, any right whatever, until he pays the note or bill, and then it is the right of contribution or of reimbursement according to whether he is liable jointly with the others as among themselves, or liable after them. So it is with the plaintiff here. He has performed his contract as a guarantor, and is contending, not for the principal and interest and attorneys' fees provided for by the note, not for contribution from a cosurety, but for reimbursement, or, as some authorities term it, "exoneration" for the amount which he paid for the defendants in execution of his contract of guaranty. As against the apparent makers of the note, he has no cause of action, except that arising upon the contract which he carried out. This contract with them does not provide for an attorneys' fee. As we have seen, he is not an accommodation party, being neither a maker, a drawer, acceptor, nor indorser. By his contract he excludes himself from all those classes who alone, under § 5862, are accommodation parties. Strictly speaking, he cannot enforce the terms of the note. He can only rely upon the contract which he himself made, and cannot extend its terms to matters not included therein. He is entitled to reimbursement, and no more.

The amount he paid became due to him from and after April 14, 1910, the date he paid it. Interest in such cases is reckoned at 6 per cent per annum. L. O. L. § 6028.

The judgment will be modified and one entered here in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for $2,700, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from April 14, 1910.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT. (In Banc.)

G. A. POWERS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CITY OF BOULDER.

(— Colo. —, 131 Pac. 395.)

Pleading — ambiguity — waiver.

1. Ambiguity of a complaint is waived by failing to move to make it more certain, or to demur upon that ground.

Municipal corporation — negligent injury — notice — service on wrong officer — effect.

2. Service of notice of an injury through the negligence of a municipal corporation, upon the mayor, instead of the clerk, as the statute requires, will not defeat the action, if the mayor accepted the service on behalf of the city, and the clerk and council received full notice in their official capacity of the accident and the injury arising therefrom.

(Hill, Garrigues, and White, JJ., dissent.)

Note. — Upon whom may notice of injury or claim against municipality be served.

Notice or presentment of a claim to a municipality for injuries is not necessary as a condition precedent to an action thereon, unless expressly required by statute; but the legislature has power to require it, and in most municipalities it is required either by the charter or the General Statutes (see 28 Cyc. 1447; and 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1231). It is with one phase of the construction of such statutes that the present note is concerned; namely, upon whom may the notice be ERROR to the District Court for Boulder County to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a complaint filed to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. T. Johnson and J. M. Eslington, for plaintiff in error:

Service of the notice directly upon the mayor, who is the chief executive officer of the city and the presiding officer of the council, brings home to the knowledge of the city all that the statute requires or could require.

Denver v. Saulcey, 5 Colo. App. 423, 38 Pac. 1098; McIntee v. Middletown, 80 App. Div. 434, 81 N. Y. Supp. 124; Dobson v.

served. The answer to this question depends, of course, largely upon the phraseology of the various statutes, the only real conflict being as to whether or not the terms of such statutes must be strictly complied with. Some of the courts expressly say that they are mandatory and must be strictly complied with, while others say that substantial compliance which fulfils the purpose of the statute is sufficient.

Of course, no notice need be served upon others than those named in the statutes. See Kleopfert v. Minneapolis, 90 Minn. 158, 95 N. W. 908, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 381, holding that no notice need be served upon the park board where such board is not enumerated among those which must be served.

And where the statutes merely require notice to be presented to the "city" or "municipal corporation," service of the required notice upon the mayor has been held sufficient. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Chicago, 144 Ill. App. 293, affirmed without reference to this point in 242 Ill. 178, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 358, 134 Am. St. Rep. 316, 80 N. E. 1022 (in which the Illinois mobs and riots liability act of 1887 was under consideration); McCartney v. Washington, 124 Iowa, 382, 100 N. W. 80 (notice served upon and accepted by both the mayor and the city solicitor).

And under a statute which merely provides that the claim "must be presented for payment" it has been held that notice may be served upon the common council, that being the body which had power to pay the claim, and that notice need not be served upon the treasurer. Butler v. Rochester, 4 Hun, 321, 6 Thomp. & C. 572.

There is a divergence of conclusion as to what constitutes sufficient service upon a common council. Thus, where the statute provided that notice must be given to the city or town council, service of notice upon the mayor has been held insufficient (Doyle v. Duluth, 74 Minn. 157, 76 N. W. 1029); as has service upon one of two branches of the council (Whalen v. Bates, 19 R. I. 274, 33 Atl. 224; McKenna v. Bates, 19 R. I. 610, 35 Atl. 580, 36 Atl. 1133); upon the town treasurer (Seamons v. Fitts, 21

Oneida, 106 App. Div. 377, 94 N. Y. Supp. 958; Blount v. Troy, 110 App. Div. 609, 97 N. Y. Supp. 182; Walden v. Jamestown, 178 N. Y. 213, 70 N. E. 466, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 171.

All the law requires of an ordinary layman, or should require of him, is that he live up to and comply with the law in a substantial manner, which we say has been done in this case, so far as giving the notice is concerned.

Grand Forks v. Allman, 83 C. C. A. 554, 153 Fed. 532; Pyke v. Jamestown, 15 N. D. 167, 107 N. W. 359; Lyons v. Red Wing, 76 Minn. 20, 78 N. W. 868.

Service upon the mayor, and acceptance, was a sufficient service on the city.

Coleman v. Fargo, 8 N. D. 69, 76 N. W.

R. I. 236, 42 Atl. 863); upon the city secretary (Ft. Worth v. Shero, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 487, 41 S. W. 704); upon the city clerk (Hiner v. Fond du Lac, 71 Wis. 74, 36 N. W. 632—overruled by later Wisconsin cases which are set out infra); and upon the individual members of the council when separate and apart (Seamons v. Fitts, 21 R. I. 236, 42 Atl. 863).

But in such case the service has been held sufficient where made upon the clerk or recorder having charge of the records and files of the council, he having presented and read it to the council (Lyons v. Red Wing, 76 Minn. 20, 78 N. W. 868, referred to in POWERS v. BOULDER; Roberts v. St. James, 76 Minn. 456, 79 N. W. 519, holding in such case that it is immaterial that the notice passed through the hands of the president of the common council before it reached the clerk; Peterson v. Cokato, 84 Minn. 205, 87 N. W. 615, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 576; Seamons v. Fitts, 21 R. I. 236, 42 Atl. 863 [town clerk]), as it has where made upon the assistant clerk, he also having charge of the files and records of the council (Kelly v. Minneapolis, 77 Minn. 76, 79 N. W. 653). And under such a statute it has been held sufficient to file the notice with the city clerk. Tiggerman v. Butte, 44 Mont. 138, 119 Pac. 477 (notice was directed to the common council); Durham v. Spokane, 27 Wash. 615, 68 Pac. 383; Mason v. Ashland, 98 Wis. 540, 74 N. W. 357 (notice filed with the city clerk for action by the council); Bacon v. Antigo, 103 Wis. 10, 79 N. W. 31; Oshkosh Waterworks Co. v. Oshkosh, 106 Wis. 83, 81 N. W. 1040. Hiner v. Fond du Lac, 71 Wis. 74, 36 N. W. 632 (set out supra) must be considered as overruled by the above Wisconsin Cases, it being expressly so stated in Bacon v. Antigo.) And the common council has been held properly served, by service on the president thereof, where it was provided by statute that a board or body may be served by service on the clerk or chairman. McIntee v. Middletown, 80 App. Div. 434, 81 N. Y. Supp. 124, followed in O'Donnell v. Syracuse, 102 App. Div. 80, 92 N. Y. Supp. 555, reversed on 1051; Wormwood v. Waltham, 144 Mass. 184, 10 N. E. 800; Denver v. Saulcey, 5 Colo. App. 423, 38 Pac. 1098; Pueblo v. Babbitt, 47 Colo. 597, 108 Pac. 175; Herman, Estoppel, § 556; Canfield v. Jackson, 112 Mich. 120, 70 N. W. 444, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 626; Griswold v. Ludington, 116 Mich. 401, 74 N. W. 663; Wright v. Portland, 118 Mich. 23, 76 N. W. 141; *McCarthy v. Mr. J. T. Atwood for defendant in error.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon the part of the plaintiff on account of personal injuries other grounds in 184 N. Y. 1, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1053, 112 Am. St. Rep. 538, 76 N. E. 758, 6 Ann. Cas. 173, where service was made upon both the president and the clerk of the common council. So, service upon the president of the council has been held sufficient, where it was made when the council was not in session and the notice was received by the council at its first meeting after the service upon its president. Blount v. Troy, 110 App. Div. 609, 97 N. Y. Supp. 182.

And a requirement that a claim be presented to a town board of audit has been held sufficiently complied with by presentation of a claim to the town clerk who is the clerk of such board, with written directions to file same and to present it to the town board. Parish v. Eden, 62 Wis. 272, 22 N. W. 399.

But a statute requiring notice to be presented to the board of trustees has been held not to have been complied with by notice to the chamberlain and president of the village (Mark v. West Troy, 69 Hun, 442, 23 N. Y. Supp. 422), nor by notice to the treasurer of the city water board (King v. Randolph, 28 App. Div. 25, 50 N. Y. Supp. 902). But such a requirement has been held sufficiently complied with by the serving of notice upon the village clerk, where he was the clerk of the board and it was provided by statute that, when notice is required to be given to a board, service on the clerk thereof shall be sufficient. Dobson v. Oneida, 106 App. Div. 377, 94 N. Y. Supp. 958.

And a statute requiring presentation of claims to the board of county commissioners has been held not to have been complied with by the filing of claims with the county treasurer. San Mihuel County v. Pierce, 6 N. M. 324, 28 Pac. 512.

And under a charter requiring notice of injury to be served upon either the mayor or city council, it has been held that handing a notice to a single alderman was not sufficient. Denver v. Saulcey, 5 Colo. App. 420, 38 Pac. 1098, wherein the reason, as is shown by quotations in the dissenting opinions in POWERS v. BOULDER, was that 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of certain acts of negligence upon the part of the defendant city. A general demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained by the trial court. The plaintiff elected to stand upon his amended complaint, and the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrer is the only question presented, and this is confined to the allegations as to service of notice of the injury required by the statute. The allegation of the amended complaint in this particular is as follows: "That on or about August 24, 1911, plaintiff caused a written notice of said accident to be served upon the defendant by serving the same upon its mayor, respectively, setting forth the time, place, and cause of said injuries, and plain-since the liability of the city is statutory, the provisions of the statute must be strictly complied with, and therefore that the notice must be served upon the party designated in the statute, such service being a condition precedent to the right of the injured to maintain his action. However, the vigor of the language used in this case seems to have been relaxed somewhat in POWERS v. BOULDER.

But under statutes requiring as a condition precedent to the maintaining of an action against a city for personal injuries the presentation of a verified claim therefor to the mayor and common council for audit, a claim was held in Grand Forks v. Allman, 83 C. C. A. 554, 153 Fed. 532, set out and quoted in POWERS v. BOULDER, to have been duly presented where it was presented to the city auditor, who filed it and advised the council thereof; the reason being that, since the purpose of the statute had been fulfilled, its requirement had. And construing the same statutes it was held in Coleman v. Fargo, 8 N. D. 69, 76 N. W. 1051, that filing of the claim with the city auditor, and its presentation to the mayor and council by the auditor within the statutory period, was a sufficient presentation of the claim under the statutes. And a similar conclusion was reached in Pyke v. Jamestown, 15 N. D. 157, 107 N. W. 359, set out in POWERS v. BOULDER, where notice was served upon both the mayor and the city auditor for presentation to the council.

And where the statute provides that the claim must be filed with the supervisor of the town against which recovery is sought, it has been held sufficient compliance that the claim was mailed to the town clerk or town board of which the supervisor was a member, and was actually received by the supervisor in question. Soper v. Greenwich, 48 App. Div. 354, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1111.

And under a statute which provides that notice may be given to the city clerk, the following parenthetically noted notices have been held sufficient: Canon City v. Cox, — Colo. —, 133 Pac. 1040 (notice delivered to the mayor and by him delivered to the clerk); Wormwood v. Waltham, 144 Mass.

tiff further alleges that at the time of said service plaintiff was informed by said mayor that he, the said mayor, would accept service of said notice for and in behalf of said defendant, and that plaintiff need not serve any other or further notice upon any other officer of said city, all of which plaintiff relied upon as being sufficient and valid in every way so far as serving any other or further notice was concerned; and plaintiff alleges upon information and belief that as a matter of fact the said city and its duly constituted authorities, consisting of its mayor, board of council, and clerk thereof, had full notice of said accident and plaintiff's injuries arising therefrom in their official capacity within ninety days from the

Revised Statutes of 1908, § 6661, provides: "No action for the recovery of compensation for personal injury or death against any city of the first or second class, or any town, on account of its negligence, shall be maintained unless written notice of the time and place and cause of injury is given to the clerk of the city or recorder of the town by the person injured, his agent or attorney, within ninety days, and the action is commenced within two years from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury or death. But the notice given under the provision of this act shall not be deemed invalid or insufficient solely by reason of any inaccuracy in stating the time, place, 184, 10 N. E. 800, referred to in POWERS v. BOULDER (notice given to an alderman, who presented it to a board meeting, which referred it to the city solicitor, who handed it to the city clerk, it being said that the alderman to whom it was handed was the agent of the injured person); Janse v. Boston, 201 Mass. 348, 87 N. E. 633, set out in POWERS v. BOULDER (notice given to clerk, found in city clerk's office, the city clerk and the assistant city clerk both being absent); Johnson v. St. Paul, 52 Minn. 364, 54 N. W. 735 (notice addressed to mayor and common council, but delivered to city clerk); Kelly v. Minneapolis, 77 Minn. 76, 79 N. W. 653 (notice served upon assistant city clerk). But see Benson v. Hoquiam, 67 Wash. 90, 121 Pac. 58, wherein it was held that such a provision was mandatory, and that notice must be served upon the city clerk as provided by statute.

So, a statute requiring service of proper notice upon the "corporation council" or his "chief assistant" has been held complied with by serving the notice upon the chief clerk found in charge of the corporation council's office, provided the notice reached one of the proper officers. But otherwise if it did not reach him within the prescribed period. Abbott v. Detroit, 150 Mich. 245, 113 N. W. 1121. And in McAuliff v. Detroit, 150 Mich. 346, 113 N. W. 1112, construing the same statute, service upon a messenger in the corporation council's office was held insufficient where not brought to the attention of the proper officer. But the corporation council was held properly served in McMahon v. New York, 1 App. Div. 321, 37 N. Y. Supp. 289, by delivery of the notice to the chief assistant by one of the assistant corporation councils. So, the city solicitor was held properly served in Rafferty v. Pittsburg, 15 Pa. Super. Ct. 77, by delivery of notice to the assistant city solicitor. And a statute requiring a notice of claim to be filed "in the office of the city attorney" has been held to have been complied with by the filing of notice directed to the city attorney and acknowledgment thereof by the acting city attorney. Fairfield v. Sechrest, 136 Ill. App. 8. And see 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Donaldson v. Dieterich, 247 Ill. 522, 93 N. E. 366, reversing 157 Ill. App. 38, wherein it was held that where the statute requires notice of a claim for injuries to be filed "in the office of the city attorney (if there is a city attorney)" as a condition precedent to suit on the claim, no such notice need be given unless there is a city attorney who is a licensed attorney having an office where the notice can be filed, it not being sufficient that the municipality has a de facto attorney.

But under the rule of strict compliance it has been held that the mandatory provisions of a statute requiring service of notice upon "one of the municipal officers" were not complied with by serving the notice upon the city clerk, where by statute the mayor and aldermen constitute the "municipal officers" of the city. Huntington v. Calais, 105 Me. 144, 73 Atl. 829.

And where the provisions of a statute requiring service of notice to be made upon the clerk, mayor, or member of the board of trustees are regarded as mandatory and a strict compliance a condition precedent to suit, it has been held that service of notice upon the city attorney was not sufficient although he notified the proper officials. Rushville v. Morrow, — Ind. App. —, 101 N. E. 659.

So, presentation of a claim to the city council has been held not to be a sufficient compliance with a statute requiring service of notice upon the mayor or city clerk as a condition precedent to suit on the claim. Dorsey v. Racine, 60 Wis. 292, 18 N. W. 928.

And it has been held that where the requirement is that notice be served upon the street commissioner, or city sidewalk superintendent, or alderman of the ward where the injury occurred, service of notice upon the mayor and city clerk is not sufficient. Harris v. Fond du Lac, 104 Wis. 44, 80 N. W. 66. But, construing the same statute, it was held in Zoellner v. Fond du Lac, 147 Wis. 300, 133 N. W. 35, that it was sufficient to give notice to one who had been hired as sidewalk inspector, but whose duties were to construct, repair, and inspect or cause of injury; Provided, it is shown that there was no intention to mislead and that the city council or board of trustees was in fact not misled thereby."

There is no objection that the notice was not in writing, nor that it was not in all respects sufficient, nor that it was not served within the time provided, but only that it was served on the mayor of the city rather than the city clerk, as provided by the statute. Did such allegation of service upon the mayor, when considered with the additional allegation as to official consideration by the constituted authorities, meet the substantial requirement of the statute? The complaint, in addition to service of the notice upon the mayor, alleged "that the mayor, clerk, and board of aldermen all had full notice of the accident and plaintiff's injuries in their official capacity within ninety days thereafter, and that the mayor declared at the time of the service on him, that no further notice would be required." There is no claim that the city council did not have full or sufficient notice, or that they did not act on it. The defendant rests solely upon the technical contention that the service was not made upon the city clerk as designated by the statute, but who by the very nature of things could perform no other duty in the matter than to present it to the mayor and council, who were vested with authority to act in the premises.

It may be conceded that the part of the complaint wherein it is said that the may-sidewalks, and who purported to be and was recognized by the city as sidewalk superintendent.

In Baine v. Rochester, 85 N. Y. 523, where the statute required the notice to be filed with the chief fiscal officer of the city, it was held that notice must be filed with the city treasurer, he being declared by statute to be the chief fiscal officer.

Where there are separate statutes, each requiring notice to be served upon different officials or bodies, notice must be served upon both where the purposes of such statutes are different. Thus, it has been held that where one statute requires service to be made upon the corporation counsel, the purpose being to enable him to prepare his defense, and another statute requires notice to the city comptroller, the purpose being to give him an opportunity to examine into the validity of the claim and by adjustment or payment thereof to avoid the expenses of action, notice must be given to both the comptroller and the corporation counsel. Frankel v. New York, 18 N. Y. S. R. 241, 2 N. Y. Supp. 294; Babcock v. New York, 56 Hun, 196, 9 N. Y. Supp. 368 (holding service upon the comptroller insufficient although he transmitted it to the corporation counsel for the special purpose of investigation); Kennedy v. New York, 34 App. Div. 311, 54 N. Y. Supp. 261, affirming 18 Misc. 303, 41 N. Y. Supp. 1077; Smith v. New York, 88 App. Div. 606, 85 N. Y. Supp. 150; Watts v. New York, 133 App. Div. 400, 117 N. Y. Supp. 612 (holding that notice upon the corporation counsel only was not sufficient, at least in the absence of proof that it was acted upon by the comptroller); Bernreither v. New York, 123 App. Div. 291, 107 N. Y. Supp. 1006, affirmed without opinion in 196 N. Y. 506, 89 N. E. 1096. And the same has been true where the statutes required notices to both the city council and the corporation counsel. Higgins v. Albany, 130 App. Div. 276, 114 N. Y. Supp. 516; Curry v. Buffalo, 135 N. Y. 366, 32 N. E. 80, affirming 57 Hun, 25, 10 N. Y. Supp. 392. And under separate statutes requiring presentation of claims to the comptroller and to the deputy commissioner in the department in which claimant was employed, the filing of such a claim with such a deputy commissioner, but not with the comptroller, has been held insufficient although the claim filed with the commissioner eventually reached the comptroller. Ruprecht v. New York, 102 App. Div. 309, 92 N. Y. Supp. 421. But see Missano v. New York, 160 N. Y. 123, 54 N. E. 744, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 652, reversing 17 App. Div. 536, 4 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 186, 45 N. Y. Supp. 892, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 586, wherein it was held that service upon the comptroller was sufficient where he sent it to the corporation counsel, who filed it and acted upon it.

But in Clark v. Austin, 38 Minn. 487, 38 N. W. 615, where one charter provision required all claims to be presented to the common council and another provision required notice of claims for personal injuries, etc., to be presented to the mayor or the city recorder, it was held that it could hardly be contemplated that a claim falling within the latter provision need be presented twice, and that notice to the mayor was sufficient. And see Grand Forks v. Allman, 83 C. C. A. 554, 153 Fed. 532, set out and quoted in POWERS v. BOULDER, wherein the statutes provided that notice of the claim must be presented to the mayor and the common council for audit and allowance; that the mayor and common council constitute the city board of audit; and that the city council consists of the mayor and aldermen, and it was held that it was not necessary that the claim should be presented to the mayor separately from the council, but was properly presented if presented to the mayor and council sitting together as a board of audit.

In the following cases in which it does not appear to whom the statute provided that notice should be given, it was held that the notice given was not sufficient: Miles v. Lynn, 130 Mass. 398 (notice given to police officer during friendly call upon injured person was held not sufficient, although the injured person understood that he was talking to the officer in an official capacity); Mooney v. Salem, 130 Mass. 402 or, board of council, and clerk all "had full notice of said accident and plaintiff's injuries arising therefrom, in their official capacity, within ninety days from the happening thereof, and duly acted thereon in their official capacity," was ambiguous, and that the court may have well sustained a motion to make the complaint more specific, definite, and certain in that particular, or have sustained a demurrer upon such specific ground; but no such motion or demurrer was presented, and therefore the right to attack the complaint on the ground of such ambiguity was waived. The complaint was not for this reason alone subject to general demurrer. Under these circumstances, the complaint may be construed to charge that the mayor, clerk, and council were in fact presented with the notice so served on the mayor, and that they acted officially thereon, and within the time required by law. If so, then every purpose of the notice was accomplished.

It is true that service of a sufficient notice on the clerk would have bound the city in that respect, even though he may not have presented it to the mayor and council at all. But the sole purpose of the statute is to give the mayor and council notice of the claim of damage for the specific injury within the designated time, so that they may have opportunity to take official action thereon, and to properly protect the interests of the city.

In the case of Grand Forks v. Allman, 83 C. C. A. 554, 153 Fed. 532, it was held by the United States circuit court of appeals, where such notice was required by the statute to be presented to the mayor and city council, that the presentation of such notice to the city auditor was a sufficient compliance with the statute, and the court there said: "A brief reference to the statutes and decisions of North Dakota will serve to show that the filing of the claim with the auditor was a presentation of it to the mayor and council within the meaning of the law. The mayor and common council of each city is constituted a board of audit of such city. § 2171, Rev. Code 1899. The city council consists of the mayor and aldermen. § 2172, Rev. Code 1899. Only one writing signed by the plaintiff and properly verified is contemplated by § 2172, supra. When so executed and verified, it is to be presented to the mayor and council 'for audit and allowance.' § 2174. Giving due consideration to these provisions of the statutes considered collectively, we cannot agree with counsel for the city that the claim should have been presented to the mayor separately from the council. The claim manifestly should be so presented to the body authorized to audit it as to secure the attention of that body, and, when that is done, it would seem that the requirement of the statutes has been complied with."

To the same effect is Pyke v. Jamestown, by the supreme court of North Dakota, 15 N. D. 157, 107 N. W. 359, construing the same statute. The facts in that case were as follows: "He presented one copy to the mayor and one copy to the city auditor. The copy presented to the mayor was delivered at his office. The copy delivered to the auditor was delivered upon the street. Accosting that officer, he inquired whether he was the city auditor, and, receiving an affirmative answer, he gave him the copy, informed him what it was, and stated that he desired to have it presented at the next meeting of the city council. The claim was addressed: 'To the City Council of the City of Jamestown, N. D.' The mayor testified that he submitted the copy he received to Mr. Thorp, the city attorney. He also testified that 'the notice was not discussed or presented to the council at any time.' Two (notice given to police officer who called in his official capacity); Roach v. Somerville, 131 Mass. 189 (notice given to police officer during casual conversation).

And in the following cases in which it does not appear upon whom the notice should have been served, notice was held served upon a proper person: McCabe v. Cambridge, 134 Mass. 484 (notice served upon the assistant city clerk, the city clerk being absent); McCarthy v. Dedham, 188 Mass. 204, 74 N. E. 319 (notice served upon selectman); Burnette v. St. Joseph, 112 Mo. App. 668, 87 S. W. 539 (notice served upon mayor).

aldermen testified to the same effect. The present city auditor testified that he could find no copy of the claim among the records and no entry in reference thereto. The auditor to whom the claim was presented died in the following December." Commenting upon this, the court said: "We are of opinion that the presentation was sufficient. The manifest purpose of the statute is to protect cities from the unnecessary expense and the annoyance of legal proceedings until claims against them can be investigated. The person injured must present his claim within sixty days from the date of the injury, during which period the facts are fresh and ascertainable. The city is given sixty days thereafter in which to inform itself as to the merits of the claim and determine whether it will audit and allow it. If not allowed at the end of that period, the party injured may pursue his remedy by action."

The Minnesota statute requires such notice to be given to the city council or other governing body. In Lyons v. Red Wing, 76 Minn. 20, 78 N. W. 868, the notice was left with the clerk, who read it to the council. This was held to be sufficient compliance with the statute.

In Wormwood v. Waltham, 144 Mass. 184, 10 N. E. 800, the law required the notice to be given to the mayor, clerk, or treasurer. The notice was given to an alderman, and was afterward read to the board, of aldermen. This was held sufficient.

In Janse v. Boston, 201 Mass. 348, 87 N. E. 633, construing the same statute, it appears that one acting for the plaintiff handed the notice to a person in the clerk's office, and asked that it be handed to the clerk; the person saying, "All right." This was held to be good. So, in this case if the notice was handed to the mayor, and if such notice was officially considered by the mayor, clerk, and council, what important difference can it make to the defendant? Every purpose of the law was thus accomplished, and to hold that the plaintiff must hand the notice to the clerk personally in order to substantially comply with the statute is to demand form and ignore substance.

If the allegations in the amended complaint, as herein construed, are sustained by the proof, then the notice in this case was sufficient.

The demurrer should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accord with this opinion.

Gabbert, J., concurring:

There is an additional reason why the judgment should be reversed. The plaintiff's cause of action is the alleged negligence of 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the city. In order to maintain his action, unless legally excused, he is required to give the statutory notice. The purpose of this notice is to afford the municipal authorities opportunity to investigate his claim and take steps to protect the city. It is therefore solely for the benefit of the city, and service upon the official designated in the statute may be waived. In my opinion the complaint alleges facts from which it appears that service of notice upon the clerk was waived.

White, J., dissenting:

I think the giving of the notice of injury in the form and in the manner prescribed by statute, and upon the person designated, is a condition precedent to the right of plaintiff to maintain his action, and, that the complaint having failed to allege such facts, the demurrer thereto was properly sustained. In Denver v. Saulcey, 5 Colo. App. 420, 422, 38 Pac. 1098, 1099, it is said: "The notice must not only contain all the things the statute requires, but it must be served on the persons which the law designates, and in the way specified, if the statute be specific in this particular. . . . The importance of making the service on the proper person has been a matter of judicial consideration; and it has accordingly been adjudged that, where the service must be upon a trustee or upon a mayor or upon a council, service upon the clerk, even though he be one of the principal officers of the corporation, is not such a compliance with the provision as to permit the maintenance of the suit,"—citing Nichols v. Boston, 98 Mass. 39, 93 Am. Dec. 132; Underhill v. Washington, 46 Vt. 767; Wade, Notice, §§ 1312, 1313. And in 28 Cyc. 1459, it is said that "service of notice or presentation of the claim must be made in the manner prescribed by the statute; or, if not prescribed, then as provided by general law for the service of notice, and within the time prescribed. The notice or statement must be served upon or presented to the board or officers, designated in the statute to be notified, such as the corporation counsel or city council." It may be that if the city clerk and council were, in fact, presented with the notice within the time limited by the statute, it would be a sufficient service upon the clerk, though it had actually been brought before him by the mayor. But I am unable to find in the complaint any fact alleged that would warrant the conclusion, or even inference, that these things occurred. How it can be said that the allegation, "that the mayor, clerk, and board of aldermen, all had full notice of the accident and plaintiff's injuries in their official capacity within ninety days thereafter," "may be construed to charge that the mayor, clerk, and council were in fact presented with the notice so served on the mayor," is beyond my comprehension. Neither can I conceive that there is anything ambiguous in the language quoted from the complaint. How can it be said that an allegation that certain persons "had full notice of the accident and plaintiff's injuries in their official capacity" is in any wise ambiguous? There is not the slightest intimation in such allegation that the notice of the injury required by the statute as a condition precedent to plaintiff's right to maintain the action had ever been brought before the clerk or the council, or that they had knowledge of its existence. It is said in the opinion that "there is no claim that the city council did not have full or sufficient notice, or that they did not act on it." The very fact that a demurrer was filed to the complaint upon the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in respect to the service of the notice is essentially a claim that the city did not have full and sufficient notice to make it liable under the statute. Moreover, that which the statute required the plaintiff should do, as a condition precedent to maintain his cause of action, cannot be legally excused by the courts, even though the latter should think the requirement harsh or unwise. To do so is to annul legislation and determine the rights of litigants, not in accordance with the law of the land, but as the court thinks the law should be.

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice Hill and Mr. Justice Garrigues concur in the views I have herein expressed.

Garrigues, J., dissenting:

I cannot agree with the majority opinion. I think service of the notice required by statute to be made upon the clerk before bringing suit is a condition precedent to the right to bring the action. The legislature, having the power to deny the right to bring the suit, could prescribe the conditions under which it could be brought. In my opinion Denver v. Saulkey, 5 Colo. App. 420, 38 Pac. 1098, is decisive of this case. It is there said on page 422 of 5 Colo. App.: "The charters of nearly all cities contain a provision like that found in the charter of this city. In providing satisfactory plans for municipal government, it seems to have been found expedient to attach this requirement as a condition precedent to the general right which the injured person is given to recover damages for such alleged wrongs. Since the right to sue the city is a matter of statute, lawmakers have the undoubted right to require the observance of these 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) reasonable conditions. Wherever similar provisions have come before the courts for construction, it has been almost, if not quite, universally held that the giving of the notice in the form and in the manner prescribed is a condition precedent, without which the plaintiff may not maintain his action."

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice Hill and Mr. Justice White concur in this dissenting opinion.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ETTA H. OSINCUP, Appt.,

v.

JENNIE HENTHORN et al., Admrs., etc., of Julia A. George, Deceased.

(89 Kan. 58, 130 Pac. 652.)

Descent — voluntary distribution — mistake — relief.

1. The mistake of the wife and mother of a decedent in regard to the law of descents and distributions of a state other than that of their residence, which led to the apportionment and transfer of land owned by the decedent at the time of his death to the mother, when, under the statute, the widow was entitled to all of it, is a mistake of fact against which equity will relieve, unless some principle of equity bars the granting of such relief.

Laches — relief from mistake — effect.

2. The general rule is that equity will not interpose to relieve from a mistake where there is inexcusable delay and negligence in asserting a right, or where the granting of the relief would operate inequitably; but laches is an equitable defense, and will not bar a recovery from mere lapse of time, nor where there is a reasonable excuse for nonaction of a party in making inquiry as to his rights or in asserting them.

Trial — laches — question for jury.

3. In view of the testimony herein, as to the delay of appellant in making inquiry or in asserting her right to land owned by her, but which was conveyed to the mother of decedent by mistake, the question whether she was guilty of laches was one of fact, and the ruling of the trial court sustaining a demurrer to her evidence was error.

Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Note. — Mistake as to law of another state or country as one of law or of fact.

The scope of this note includes cases where the parties were wholly ignorant of the law of another state, as well as cases where they were mistaken in regard thereto, both classes of cases standing on the APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Trego County in defendants' favor in an action brought to set aside an agreement between plaintiff and Julia A. George, deceased, for the equal division of the estate of plaintiff's deceased husband, and the deed conveying the same. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Herman Long, for appellant:

A mistake as to the law of another state is regarded as a mistake of fact, and is on the same basis, so far as diligence is concerned, as any other matter of fact; there is no fiction of law which presumes that a resident of Iowa is familiar with the laws of Kansas, and which makes it negligence not to know the laws of another state.

same footing. It may also be stated that the "other state or country" meant is another from the standpoint of the party mistaken, and not merely from that of the court.

The parent case on this subject is Haven v. Foster, 9 Pick. 112, 19 Am. Dec. 353, decided in 1829, which involves a situation substantially identical with that in OSINCUP v. HENTHORN. There a citizen of Massachusetts had died intestate, leaving as his heirs a niece, the daughter of a deceased sister, and three nephews, the sons of another deceased sister. The nephews and niece united in a deed of lands of the intestate in the state of New York, and divided the proceeds among themselves per capita. By a statute of New York, the land in that state descended to the niece and nephews per stirpes, and not per capita, as in Massachusetts. Upon discovering this fact, an action was brought against a nephew for the amount of purchase money received by him over and above his share. The court, in holding that the mistake of the parties was one of fact against which equity would relieve, and not of law, said: "The mistake in the distribution of the consideration money for which the land was sold arose from the mutual ignorance of the law of descents in New York. Can this mistake be corrected and the plaintiff be restored to the rights which he had under this statute? It is, in the first place, objected that the plaintiff's ignorance was owing to his own negligence, that he shall not be allowed to take advantage of his own laches; that what a man may learn with proper diligence, he shall be presumed to know; and that against mistakes arising from negligence, even a court of equity will not relieve. In all civil and criminal proceedings every man is presumed to know the law of the land, and whenever it is a man's duty to acquaint himself with facts, he shall be presumed to know them. But this doctrine does not apply to the present case. It was not the duty of the plaintiff to know the laws of New York, nor does ignorance of them imply negli-

And if it be not negligence to make such a mistake, neither is it negligence nor laches to fail to discover the mistake, even for years and years afterward.

First Nat. Bank v. Wentworth, 28 Kan. 183; Duvall v. Simpson, 53 Kan. 291, 36 Pac. 330; Williams v. Merriam, 72 Kan. 312, 83 Pac. 976.

gence. Knowledge cannot be imputed to the plaintiff, and it is expressly agreed that he, as well as the defendant, was entirely ignorant of the statute of New York. Besides, it was as much the duty of the defendant as of the plaintiff, to be acquainted with the laws of New York. And, if either is guilty of negligence, both are in this respect in pari delicto. . . . The principal objection to the plaintiff's recovery, and the one most relied upon by the defendant's counsel, is that the payment to the defendant was made through misapprehension of the law, and therefore that the money cannot be reclaimed. It is alleged that to allow the plaintiff to recover in the present action would be to disregard the common presumption of a knowledge of the law, and to violate the wholesome and necessary maxim, Ignorantia juris quod quisque tenetur scire, neminem excusat. This objection has been strongly urged by the defendant's counsel, and learnedly and elaborately discussed by the counsel on both sides. It is believed that all the authorities applicable on the point, from the civil as well as the common law, have been brought before the court. Whether money paid through ignorance of the law can be recovered back is a question much vexed, and involved in no inconsiderable perplexity. We do not court the investigation of it, and, before attempting its solution, it may be well to ascertain whether it is necessary to the decision of the case before us. That a mistake in fact is a ground of repetition is too clear and too well settled to require argument or authority in its support. The misapprehension or ignorance of the parties to this suit related to a statute of the state of New York. Is this, in the present question, to be considered fact or law? The existence of any foreign law must be proved by evidence showing what it is. And there is no legal presumption that the law of a foreign state is the same as it is here. 2 Starkie, Fv. Metcalf's ed. 568; Male v. Roberts, 3 Esp. 163, 6 Revised Rep. 823. If a foreign law is unwritten, it may be proved by

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Manfred E. Hull and his wife, Etta H. Hull, now Etta H. Osincup, the appellant, were, in 1894, residents of the state of Iowa, and with them lived his mother, Julia A. George. Manfred E. Hull was possessed of certain property in the state of Iowa, and also of certain land in the state of Kansas. On October 24, 1894, Hull died intestate, leaving surviving his wife and mother, but no children. In order to settle up the estate, and acting upon the advice of an attorney, who, as it is alleged, informed appellant and Julia A. George that they were each entitled to one half of the Kansas land, appellant and Julia A. George entered into a contract which recited that, "in consideration of the love and affection existing between the parties," the estate, including the Kansas land, should be equally divided between them, after the payment of debts and funeral expenses. To carry out this agreement, appellant made a quitclaim deed for the Kansas land to Julia A. George "in consideration of one dollar and other valuable considerations," and later received from Julia A. George a quitclaim deed for an undivided one half interest in the land for the same consideration. In each of the deeds it was recited that Julia A. George was the mother and only heir of Manfred E. Hull. In 1910, Julia A. George, while a resident of Illinois, died, leaving a will naming the appellees as devisees. At this parol evidence; but if written, it must be proved by documentary evidence. Kenny v. Clarkson, 1 Johns. 385, 3 Am. Dec. 336; Frith v. Sprague, 14 Mass. 455; Consequa v. Willings, Pet. C. C. 229, Fed. Cas. No. 3,128. The laws of other states in the Union are in these respects foreign law. Raynham v. Canton, 3 Pick. 293. The courts of this state are not presumed to know the laws of other states or foreign nations, nor can they take judicial cognizance of them, till they are legally proved before them. But when established by legal proof, they are to be construed by the same rules, and to have the same effect upon all subjects coming within their operation, as the laws of this state. That the lex loci rei sitæ must govern the descent of real estate is a principle of our law with which everyone is presumed to be acquainted. But what lex loci is the court can only learn from proof adduced before them. The parties knew, in fact, that the intestate died seised of estate situated in the state of New York. They must be presumed to know that the distribution of that estate must be governed by the laws of New York. But are they bound, on their peril, to know what the provisions of these laws are? If the judicial tribunals are not presumed to know, why should private citizens be? If they are to be made known to the court by proof, like other facts, why should not ignorance of them by private individuals have the same effect upon their acts as ignorance of other facts? Juris ignorantia est, cum jus nostrum ignoramus, and does not extend to foreign laws or the statutes of other states. We are of opinion that, in relation to the question now before us, the statute of New York is to be considered as a fact, the ignorance of which may be ground of repetition."

Although the statement which is made in some of the cases, that the doctrine that ignorance of foreign law is to be deemed ignorance of fact proceeds upon the principle that foreign laws are matters of fact, to be proved like other facts, before even the courts can notice them (see Ellison v. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Branstrator, 153 Ind. 146, 54 N. E. 433; Bolinger v. Beacham, 81 Kan. 746, 106 Pac. 1094; Bank of Chillicothe v. Dodge, 8 Barb. 233; King v. Doolittle, 1 Head, 77), and which seems to have had its origin in the argument used by the court in Haven v. Foster, 9 Pick. 112, 19 Am. Dec. 353, may suggest a distinction between cases where the mistake is by a resident of the state of the forum as to the laws of another state or foreign country, and cases where the mistake is by a nonresident as to the law of the forum state, of which the court takes judicial notice, no such distinction has in fact been taken, as is indicated by the decisions hereinafter cited. And if, as seems to be the case, the true basis of the rule is that the duty of every person of sound and mature mind to know the law is limited to the law of one's residence, so that one is under no duty to know the law of another state or country, the suggested ground for distinction disappears. Compare Haven v. Foster, supra, and Vinal v. Continental Constr. & Improv. Co. 53 Hun, 247, 6 N. Y. Supp. 595, where it is said: "Foreign laws (including laws of other states) are facts. The presumption that everyone knows the laws of his own state is hard enough. He never is presumed to know the laws of all the other states in this country and the laws of all the nations of the world."

The rule that ignorance or mistake as to the law of another state or country is ignorance or mistake of fact is also supported by the following cases: Bolinger v. Beacham, 81 Kan. 746, 106 Pac. 1094; Nicholson v. Nicholson, 83 Kan. 223, 109 Pac. 1086; Lyle v. Shinebarger, 17 Mo. App. 66; Rosenbaum v. United States Credit System Co. 64 N. J. L. 34, 44 Atl. 966, reversed on other grounds in 65 N. J. L. 255, 53 L.R.A. 440, 48 Atl. 237, in which the ignorance or mistake was that of a resident of the forum as to the laws of another state; Williams v. Merriam, 72 Kan. 312, 83 Pac. 976, in which the mistake was that of a nonresident of the forum as to the law of another state; Patterson v. Bloomer, 35 Conn. 57, 95 Am. Dec. 218; time appellant was a resident of California, and, after Julia A. George's death, appellant alleges that, by consulting an attorney regarding her interest, if any, in the estate, she for the first time found herself to have been entitled to the whole of the Kansas land owned by Manfred E. Hull, and she thereupon brought this action to set aside the agreement entered into with Julia A. George, and the deed conveying the land. She gave testimony that she had not resided in the state of Kansas, and had therefore had no opportunity to become familiar with Kansas laws. In their answer to appellant's petition, appellees deny that, at the time of the making of the contract and deed, appellant was laboring under any mistake as to the legal rights of the parties, and assert that the instruments were voluntarily given and entered into. As a further defense, appellees set up that appellant was guilty of laches in not familiarizing herself earlier as to her legal rights under the Kansas laws. On a trial of the cause, the appellant produced the evidence above outlined; but a demurrer to her evidence was sustained, and the case dismissed.

Accepting as true all of the testimony which tends to support the allegations of the appellant in her petition, and drawing every fair inference from it favorable to her, as must be done upon a demurrer to evidence, did she present a case for equitable relief? She alleged that, upon the death of her husband, she became the ab-

Atchison, 19 Tex. 303, where the ignorance was that of an immigrant as to the law of the forum; and by dicta in Schaefer v. Wunderle, 154 Ill. 577, 39 N. E. 623; Norton v. Marden, 15 Me. 45, 32 Am. Dec. 132; and King v. Doolittle, 1 Head, 77.

And see also Leslie v. Baillie, 7 Jur. 77, 12 L. J. Ch. N. S. 153, 2 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 91, holding payment of a legacy by the executors of an English will, to a married woman domiciled in Scotland, after her husband's death, a good payment in the absence of proof that they knew the Scotch law on the subject, though according to the Scotch law the payment should have been made to the husband's personal representatives; since the executors were not bound to know the law of Scotland.

So, also, where it is necessary to prove a person's knowledge of the law of a state or country other than that of his residence, such knowledge must be proved as a fact. Stedman v. Davis, 93 N. Y. 32; Bank of Chillicothe v. Dodge, 8 Barb. 233; Merchants' Bank v. Spalding, 12 Barb. 302, affirmed in 9 N. Y. 53.

There is, however, a class of cases (of which Cambioso v. Maffett, 2 Wash. C. C. 98, Fed. Cas. No. 2,330; Knower v. Haines, 31 Fed. 513; Wooten v. Miller, 7 Smedes & M. 380; Hill v. Spear, 50 N. H. 253, 9 Am. Rep. 205, and Tyson v. Passmore, 2 Pa. St. 122, 44 Am. Dec. 181, may be cited as examples) which hold that where the contract of a foreigner is to be completed in, or has reference to its execution in, a foreign country, he will be presumed to know the laws of that country. Now while this presumption is a proper one for the purpose of ascertaining the rights acquired by such a contract, or of determining whether the contract is one which the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

courts of the country in which it is to be performed will enforce, it would seem that it does not necessarily follow that a mistake in regard to the law of that country should, for the purpose of determining the right of the nonresident to equitable relief, be regarded as one of law.

Such, nevertheless, seems to be the position taken in Bentley v. Whittemore, 18 N. J. Eq. 366. There a resident of New York made to two persons, also residents of New York, an assignment for the benefit of creditors, valid under the laws of New York, which included real estate in New Jersey upon which one of the assignees held a mortgage. The assignees sold the New Jersey property to complainant, the one holding the mortgage giving it up at the time of the sale, although it does not appear that he received payment thereof, and the purchaser paying a cash consideration, and assuming another mortgage on the property, which he subsequently paid off. In this situation, certain judgment creditors of the assignor, claiming that the assignment for the benefit of creditors was invalid under the laws of New Jersey, caused executions to be issued and levied upon the New Jersey property, whereupon the complainant filed his bill for an injunction to restrain the sale of the property under the executions, and to have the mortgages, alleged to have been canceled by mistake, again set up and declared valid liens to protect his title. The assignee who had given up his mortgage on the property filed a cross bill to have the mortgage to him set up as having been canceled under misapprehension, as he supposed that the assignment was valid, and that the deed to the complainant conveyed the title. The court, holding the assignment to be void as to the lands in New Jersey, refused to reinstate the mortgages, and dismissed the bill and cross bill on the ground that the mistake of the parties was one of law, saying: "Although a mistake as to the law of a foreign state is considered a mistake of fact in most cases, yet when a nonresident enters into a contract to be performed in another state, or relating to lands in a solute owner of the Kansas land, but that she and Julia A. George were advised by the attorney and led into the mistaken belief that the law of Kansas was the same as the law of Iowa, where they resided, giving the mother of decedent one half of the land in Kansas as well as in Iowa, and that transfers were made by each to the other of a one-half interest in the land, without any consideration, and that neither of them resided in Kansas, and neither discovered the mistake before the death of the mother, in 1910, and that after her death, and upon inquiry, appellant discovered the mistake, and that she promptly came to a court of equity in order to correct the mistake and obtain relief.

The testimony shows plainly enough that a mistake was made, and also that it was a mutual mistake. The oral evidence of appellant is supported by the recitals in the deeds that were executed. In the deed executed by appellant, it is recited: "The grantee is the mother and only heir at law of said Manfred E. Hull, deceased, who died intestate without living issue." In the deed from Julia A. George to appellant, there is a recital as follows: "The said Julia A. George is the mother and sole heir at law of Manfred E. Hull, and the grantee is the widow of said Manfred E. Hull, deceased, who died intestate without living issue."

The mistake was not an unnatural one. The deceased owned land in Iowa, where he lived with his wife and mother, and, under the law of that state, one half of the real estate which he had owned there descended to the mother and the remainder to the widow. They believed that the law of descents and distributions was the same in Kansas as in Iowa, and of this they were reassured by the advice of a lawyer of that state.

It is contended that, if a mistake was made, it was one against which equity will not relieve. Passing the question as to whether equity ever gives relief for a mistake of a person as to his legal rights or as to the law, it must be held that the mistake claimed by appellant was one of fact. It was not a mistake as to the legal effect of the deeds executed, but it was a mistake as to the law of descents and distributions of a state other than the one in which the parties resided, and of the rights of the parties under that statute. It has been decided that a mistake as to the law of another state is one of fact against which relief may be had in the absence of countervailing equities. On this question it has been said: "The general rule that a mistake of law, pure and simple, is not adequate ground for relief, rests upon the fundamental assumption that persons of sound and mature mind are presumed to know the law; but this assumption does not apply to the laws of another state. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 842. Ignorance of these laws is deemed to be ignorance of fact." Bolinger v. Beacham, 81 Kan. 746, 750, 106 Pac. 1094, 1095. Other cases of like import are Alexandria A. & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Johnson, 61 Kan. 417, 59 Pac. 1063; Williams v. Merriam, 72 Kan. 312, 83 Pac. 976; Loyal Mystic Legion v. Brewer, 75 Kan. 729, 90 Pac. 247; Morgan v. Bell, 3 Wash. 554, 16 L.R.A. 614, 28 Pac. 925.

Through this mistake of fact, based on erroneous advice from one on whom she would naturally rely, appellant conveyed property to which she had a clear and complete title to one who gave no consideration for it, and who had no interest in or foreign state, he is held to know the law of such state, and in that case the mistake is one of law. Besides, Bentley, who seeks the relief, and paid the mortgages and canceled them by mistake, was a resident of this state." Upon appeal (19 N. J. Eq. 402, 97 Am. Dec. 671), the assignment was held valid; and it consequently became unnecessary for the appellate court to pass upon the question whether the mistake of the cross complainant as to the legal effect of the assignment was one of law or of fact.

It seems worthy of note that even if the mistakes in question in OSINCUP v. HENTHORN, and in some of the other cases which hold a mistake in regard to the law of another jurisdiction to be a mistake of fact against which equity will relieve, had been held to be mistakes of law, they would nevertheless have constituted grounds for equitable relief under the rule suggested by Mr. Pomeroy (Eq. Jur. vol. 2, 3d ed. § 849): "Wherever a person is ignorant 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) • or mistaken with respect to his own antecedent and existing private legal rights, interest, estates, duties, liabilities, or other relation, either of property or contract or personal status, and enters into some transaction the legal scope and operation of which he correctly apprehends and understands, for the purpose of affecting such assumed rights, interests, or relations, or of carrying out such assumed duties or liabilities, equity will grant its relief, defensive or affirmative, treating the mistake as analogous to, if not identical with, a mistake of fact." And in the same section he states that whenever cases of this kind have arisen, relief has almost always been granted, although not always on this ground.

right to it. The preliminary contract between them referred to the consideration of love and affection, and in the deeds the consideration recited was "one dollar and other valuable considerations,"—an expression used to indicate a nominal consideration, and is ordinarily employed in cases where nothing is actually paid. It is not easy to infer that appellant intended to donate and convey land of which she had an absolute title to Mrs. George; but her testimony, which is uncontradicted, is that there was no consideration in fact paid, and no intention to make a gift to the grantee, but that, through the erroneous advice and the mistake as to their rights of inheritance under the statute, they apportioned the land between them in equal shares, and deeds were accordingly executed.

The next contention is that equity will not grant relief from the mistake in question, because of the laches or negligence of appellant in making inquiry and in asking for redress. The general rule is that equity will not interpose to relieve from mistake where there is inexcusable negligence, or where the granting of the relief asked would operate inequitably and do an injustice. On the other side, it is said that there were good reasons for the delay; that no circumstances arose to cause distrust of the advice given to appellant until about the time that the action was brought. It appears that neither of the parties ever lived in Kansas. For about six years after the transfers were made, appellant and Julia A. George lived together in Iowa. After that time Mrs. George removed to Illinois, while appellant went to California. When Julia A. George died, appellant consulted an attorney in California as to whether she had an interest in the estate of Julia A. George, when she was informed for the first time that, under the Kansas statute, she was entitled to all of the Kansas land which her husband owned at the time of his death. The advice given the parties, and the circumstances under which they acted, the exchange of deeds, which would naturally end inquiry and be accepted as the final division and settlement of their rights in the lands of the deceased, the absence of appellant from Kansas, and the fact that no circumstances arose to challenge the correctness of the advice or the legality of the apportionment of the land, are the excuses assigned for the long delay in discovering the mistake and in asking for relief; and, in view of these facts, it can hardly be said that the inaction of appellant was inexcusable. Laches is an equitable defense, and ought not to be applied in a way that would do injustice or defeat the real owner of land from recovering it. Although about sixteen years elapsed between the execution of the deeds and the bringing of this action,—a fact which made it incumbent upon appellant to show some sufficient excuse for the delay,—it is well settled that the lapse of such a time will not necessarily defeat the granting of equitable relief. If a party has no knowledge of his rights, he can hardly be charged with negligence in failing to assert them; neither can he be regarded as having abandoned such rights as he may have.

In Gallihier v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. 368, 372, 38 L. ed. 738, 740, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 873, 874, the court said: "They [cases on laches] proceed on the assumption that the party to whom laches is imputed has knowledge of his rights, and an ample opportunity to establish them in the proper forum; that, by reason of his delay, the adverse party has good reason to believe that the alleged rights are worthless, or have been abandoned; and that, because of the change in condition or relations during this period of delay, it would be an injustice to the latter to permit him to now assert them."

If, as the testimony tends to show, appellant acted as soon as she learned of the mistake, and of the fact that her land was held by another, how can it be said that there was any abandonment of her rights or laches in asserting them? It would be inequitable to impute negligence to one who was ignorant of her rights. It has been said: "There can be no laches in failing to assert rights of which a party is wholly ignorant, and whose existence he had no reason to apprehend." Halstead v. Grinnan, 152 U. S. 412, 417, 38 L. ed. 495, 497, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 641, 643.

In Nicholson v. Nicholson, 83 Kan. 223, 109 Pac. 1086, a case similar to the one under consideration, it was said: "It is conceded that a mistake as to the law of another state is a mistake of fact; but it is urged that the plaintiff's petition discloses laches; that she has been negligent in not reading up on the law of Ohio. A woman eighty-four years of age, who has resided in Kansas for many years, and is ignorant of the laws of another state, and who relies upon the statements of her adopted son that such laws are thus and so, cannot, as a matter of law, be held guilty of laches in failing to discover the truth with respect thereto."

No one would have questioned the right of appellant to relief if it had been asked for within a short time after the mistake was made; and it should not be denied now, unless there are other considerations than the mere lapse of time. If the rights of creditors were involved, or innocent purchasers affected, or if the granting of relief would operate unjustly as against anyone, other considerations would arise. There has been no change of conditions connected with the delay, so far as the testimony of appellant goes, which would necessarily make it inequitable to grant relief to her.

The appellees are claiming under Mrs. George, and have no better rights to the property than she had. The death of one of the parties, it is true, is a consideration for the court, as it may affect the production of evidence as to the circumstances of the transfer; but this, of itself, is not sufficient to prevent the granting of relief in this case. On all of the testimony of appellant, it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that she has been guilty of laches either in failing to discover the mistake or in failing to act with promptness after making the discovery. It is not determined, of course, that appellant is entitled to a judgment for the recovery of the property, as the testimony of appellees has not yet been produced, but only that the testimony of appellant appears to make out a prima facie case for relief, so that it became a question of fact whether there were laches or any circumstances which would make the granting of the relief asked inequitable or unjust.

There was error in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence of appellant, and for that reason the judgment will be reversed.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

M. M. STONE & COMPANY
v.
POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE COMPANY.

(— R. I. —, 87 Atl. 319.)

Telegraph — waiver of contract provision — requirement of written notice.

1. A telegraph company does not waive a

Note. — As to when a telegraph company is chargeable with notice of importance of a commercial message, see note to Western U. Tele. Co. v. True, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1188. As to duty with respect to cipher and unintelligible telegrams, see note to Baily v. Western U. Tele. Co. 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 503.

Generally as to the right of an addressee of a telegram to sue for delay in delivery, see note to Anniston Cordage Co. v. Western U. Tele. Co. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1116, and as to the damages recoverable by him, see pages 1133 et seq. of that note.

For duty of a telegraph company to dis-provision of its contract requiring notice in writing of a claim for damages for delay in transmitting a message, within sixty days after the delay occurred, by failing to object when verbal notice was given or when written notice was given after the expiration of the sixty-day period.

Same — misdelivery of message — gross negligence.

2. Gross negligence in the delivery of a telegram which will avoid a stipulation limiting liability in case of unrepeatable messages is not shown by the fact that, when receiving a message for a business man, the company consulted only the city directory and delivered the message at his house address, the only one appearing in such directory, although his business address appeared in the telephone directory and was on file in the telegraph office, and he had previously complained of failure to deliver messages at his business address.

Same — care required — time and place of delivery.

3. A telegraph company is not bound to exercise the highest degree of diligence and promptness in delivering a message, or to use the greatest care as to the place of delivery.

Damages — delay in delivering telegram — rule.

4. The damages to be recovered in an action in tort by the sendee of a telegram, against the telegraph company, for delay in delivery, are governed by the same rule which would govern in an action by the sender on the contract.

Same — telegram — notice of special loss.

5. A message to a commission merchant, stating "sell" two cars, and naming the price, or "packed" a certain quantity of apples, is not sufficient to notify the company of possible loss in case of failure to deliver, so as to charge it with the loss which he suffers because he loses a sale which he had negotiated, and to fill which he sent an order for the goods, which was accepted by the telegram, so that he was compelled to sell the property at a loss.

Bristol Counties made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for alleged negligent failure promptly to deliver certain telegrams which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William J. Brown, for plaintiff:

The mere fact that the telegram was a business telegram was sufficient notice to the company to render it liable for the natural and proximate loss or damage resulting from negligence on its part.

Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Lathrop, 131 Ill. 575, 7 L.R.A. 474, 19 Am. St. Rep. 55, 23 N. E. 583; Dixon v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 3 App. Div. 60, 38 N. Y. Supp. 1056; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 299, 45 Am. Rep. 480; Ferrero v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 9 App. D. C. 468, 35 L.R.A. 548; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Merritt, 55 Fla. 462, 127 Am. St. Rep. 169, 46 So. 1024; Mowry v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 51 Hun, 126, 4 N. Y. Supp. 666; Hadley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 115 Ind. 191, 15 N. E. 845; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lehman, 105 Md. 442, 66 Atl. 266; Jones, Teleg. & Teleph. Cos. §§ 535, 536; 37 Cyc. 1753.

The question as to whether or not the defendant company, by reason of the language of the telegram or otherwise, did have sufficient notice to render it liable for the actual damages sustained by the plaintiff, should have been submitted to the jury for their determination.

Fererro v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 9 App. D. C. 473, 35 L.R.A. 548; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Merritt, 55 Fla. 462, 127 Am. St. Rep. 169, 46 So. 1024; Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Lathrop, 131 Ill. 575, 7 L.R.A. 474, 19 Am. St. Rep. 55, 23 N. E. 583; Jones, Teleg. & Teleph. Cos. § 537; 37 Cyc. 1742.

The defendant had waived its right to rely upon the sixty-day clause as a defense to the first count of the declaration.

Hill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 85 Ga. 425, 21 Am. St. Rep. 166, 11 S. E. 874; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stratemeier, 6 Ind. App. 125, 32 N. E. 871; Hayes v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 S. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury upon the question of gross negligence on the part of the company, in connection with the messages originating in New York.

Plaintiff was entitled to recover for the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

damages sustained by him by reason of the failure to deliver the two telegrams originating in Illinois.

M. M. Stone & Co. v. Postal-Teleg. Co. 31 R. I. 174, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 795, 76 Atl. 762; Tyler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 60 Ill. 421, 14 Am. Rep. 38, 74 Ill. 168, 24 Am. Rep. 279; Webbe v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 169 Ill. 610, 61 Am. St. Rep. 207, 48 N. E. 670.

Messrs. Carver, Wardner, Cavanagh, & Walker, G. Philip Wardner, and Clifford H. Walker, for defendant:

The rule of damages for negligent delivery of a telegram is the same whether the form of the action be contract or tort, and whether the plaintiff be sender or addressee.

Wheelock v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 197 Mass. 119, 83 N. E. 313, 14 Ann. Cas. 188; Swift River Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 169 Mass. 326, 61 Am. St. Rep. 288, 47 N. E. 1015; Weston v. Boston & M. R. (N.S.) 795, 76 Atl. 762.

In the absence of notice of special circumstances rendering negligence in delivery likely to produce extraordinary and extended damages, the company's liability does not exceed the amount paid for sending the message; and the liability is not extended by notice, unless the company is informed thereby of the nature of the transaction to which the message refers and the character and possible extent of the damages which might occur, and assumes liability for such damages.

Messrs. Edwards & Angell also for defendant.

Sweetland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case for negligence brought against the defendant to recover for losses alleged to have been sustained by reason of the negligent failure of the defendant to deliver with promptness certain telegrams addressed to the plaintiff. The case was tried before a justice of the superior court sitting with a jury, and upon the conclusion of the testimony a verdict was rendered for the defendant by direction of the court. The case is now before this court upon the plaintiff's exceptions to the direction of a verdict, and to certain other rulings of said justice made during the progress of the trial.

The declaration alleges that the plaintiff was a broker and commission merchant in the city of Providence, doing business under the style of M. M. Stone & Company, engaged in buying and selling beans and similar commodities; that on the dates when each of said telegraphic messages was sent he had on hand orders for certain quantities of such commodities, subject to confirmation before the close of business hours on such dates; that previously he had sent by mail or telegraph to dealers in the state of New York and in Chicago orders for the quantities of said commodities needed to fill the orders of his customers, with the request to each of said dealers that if he should accept such order given by the plaintiff, to telegraph such acceptance to the plaintiff at once; that each of said dealers delivered to the defendant in the state of New York or in Chicago, in season to be delivered to the plaintiff at his business address before the close of business hours on the same day, a telegram addressed to the plaintiff in his tradename of M. M. Stone & Company, at Providence, Rhode Island, accepting said order, and paid for the transmission of said message to the plaintiff; that the defendant, having notice of the location of the plaintiff's office, did not deliver said messages to the plaintiff at his business address, but negligently delivered them at his home, so that they were not received by him in season to confirm and fill his customers' orders, whereby he lost his commission and profit on said orders.

The declaration is in four counts. The message which is the subject of the first count was delivered by the plaintiff's correspondent to the defendant in New York city, directed to the plaintiff, and was in the following terms:

New York, Aug. 26.

M. M. Stone & Co.

Letter received accept your order beans although refused to sell to others below two dollars send check.

[Signed] Bennett Day & Co.

The message which is the subject of the second count was delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff's correspondent in Chicago for transmission to the plaintiff, and was in the following terms:

Chicago, Ill., Sep. 10/09.

M. M. Stone & Co., Providence, R. I.

Too low. Sell two cars two twenty-eight deld there.

[Signed] A. J. Thompson Co.

The message which is the subject of the third count was delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff's correspondent at Holley, in the state of New York, and was in the following terms:

Holley, N. Y., Oct. 6.

M. M. Stone & Co.

Letter received. Have booked Swift order two twenty prompt shipment.

[Signed] W. D. Hatch.

The message which is the subject of the fourth count was delivered by the plaintiff's correspondent at Chicago to the defendant for transmission to the plaintiff, and was in the following terms:

Chicago, Ill., Nov. 3.

M. M. Stone.

Packed fifty boxes crop apples.

[Signed] A. J. Thompson.

The different dates upon these telegrams are all in the year 1909.

Among other defenses, the defendant set up in its plea to each of these counts that it undertook to transmit and deliver each of said messages subject to the terms and conditions printed upon the back of the blank upon which said message was written by the sender thereof. One of the terms and conditions so printed on the back of the blank and known as the "sixty days" stipulation provided in substance that the defendant would not be liable for damages in any case where the claim was not presented in writing within sixty days after the message was filed with the defendant for transmission. The defendant further alleged in its pleas that in the case of each of these messages, which the plaintiff claimed had been delayed in delivery, the plaintiff had failed to present to the defendant his claim of damages in writing within sixty days after said message had been filed for transmission. Another of the terms printed upon the back of said blank provided for repeating the message upon the payment by the sender of a toll greater than the regular rate charged; and also provided, by what is known as the "unrepeated message" stipulation, that the defendant would not be liable for damages in the case of an unrepeated message beyond the amount received by it for sending the same. All the messages referred to in the declaration were unrepeated messages.

Prior to said trial certain questions of law were certified to this court by the superior court, and the opinion of this court thereon appears in 31 R. I. 174, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 795, 76 Atl. 762. In said opinion it was held that the so-called "sixty days" and "unrepeated message" stipulations were valid conditions which the defendant might impose upon the contract with the sender of the message, and that any right of action which the plaintiff may have is based upon and limited by the terms of the contract for transmission. As the receiver of the telegram, he may come in and avail himself of the defendant's express and implied obligations arising under the contract; but the plaintiff's right can be no greater than those of the party to the contract. All the courts of last resort in the different states of the Union are not in accord upon the question of the validity of these stipulations; and it was further held in said opinion that the validity and effect of said stipulations, so far as concerns the addressee's right to recover for loss arising from negligent delay in delivery of the message, is governed by the law of the state where the message originated. It is admitted by the plaintiff that the courts of the state of

New York hold the stipulations in question to be reasonable and valid conditions which the defendant might impose upon its contract with the sender of the message, and that in the case at bar, under the New York decisions, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover upon the first and third counts of his declaration only in case the defendant was guilty of gross negligence, or in case the defendant had waived said condition. The validity and effect of these stipulations with reference to the telegrams which are the subject of the first and third counts of the declaration are determined by the law of the state of New York, where said messages were delivered to the defendant, and must be held to be valid and binding conditions.

The plaintiff did not file a written notice of his claim for damages for loss arising from negligent delay in the delivery of the four telegrams in question until November 5, 1909, more than sixty days after the telegram of August 26th was filed with the defendant for transmission, but within sixty days after the other telegrams were filed for transmission. The plaintiff contends that, although the said "sixty days" and "unrepeated message" stipulations are valid under the laws of the state of New York in ordinary circumstances, yet as to the telegram of August 26th, which originated in the city of New York, said "sixty days" regulation has been waived by the defendant, and that as to said message of August 26th and the message of October 6th, which originated at Holley, in the state of New York, the "unrepeated message" stipulation is inapplicable because of gross negligence on the part of the defendant.

In regard to the message of August 26, 1909, the plaintiff bases his contention that the defendant had waived the provision that it would not be liable for damages if the claim was not presented within sixty days after the message was filed for transmission upon the following facts: On August 27th he made a verbal complaint to an employee at the Providence office of the defendant because the message of August 26th had not been delivered at his office, and on September 11, 1909, he made another verbal complaint to the manager of the Providence office of the defendant with regard to the same matter; also, when the plaintiff presented to the defendant the written notice of his claim for damages for its failure to deliver the several telegrams in question at the plaintiff's office, the defendant made no objection to the claim of loss as to the telegram of August 26th, on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to give the defendant written notice of his 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) claim within sixty days. These facts fall far short of establishing a relinquishment by the defendant of its right to insist upon the provision of said stipulation. The plaintiff cannot recover for any loss occasioned by negligence in the delivery of said telegram of August 26th.

The facts relied upon by the plaintiff to establish gross negligence on the defendant's part in the delivery of the message of October 6th are as follows: This telegram, as well as the others named in the declaration, was delivered at the home of the plaintiff rather than at his business office, whereby he failed to receive it until after the close of business hours on the day of delivery. The plaintiff's office was in the same building as the defendant's main office. The plaintiff commenced doing business as a commission merchant about June 1, 1909. Shortly thereafter he went to the defendant's office and arranged to have a cable address recorded with the defendant, and informed the defendant's servant where telegrams addressed to M. M. Stone & Company should be delivered. Between June 1, 1909, and October 6, 1909, the defendant delivered a number of telegrams transmitted over defendant's wires and addressed to M. M. Stone & Company to the plaintiff at his business office. On August 27th, and again on September 11th, he made complaint to the defendant's agent that the telegrams of August 26th and September 10th had been delivered at his home rather than at his office. At other times between June 1, 1909, and October 6, 1909, the plaintiff requested the agent of the defendant to deliver telegrams addressed to the plaintiff as M. M. Stone & Company at his business office. The plaintiff's business address appeared in the Providence telephone directory, but did not appear in the ordinary city directory. The plaintiff's business address was not placed in the messages by the senders thereof. When the messages in question arrived at Providence, the defendant's servant neglected to look in the telephone directory, or to consult its record of cable addresses, but consulted merely the Providence city directory and delivered said messages at the only address of the plaintiff appearing in said directory; namely, his home address. Without deciding whether, upon these facts, a jury might properly have found the defendant guilty of negligence with regard to the delivery of the message of October 6th, we think that the justice presiding properly ruled that this evidence was not sufficient to warrant a finding of gross negligence on the part of the defendant. The degree of negligence, which, under the New York decisions, will render the defendant liable, notwithstanding the provision restricting liability, is much greater than ordinary negligence or carelessness. It is very great negligence, amounting to a reckless disregard of consequences to the sender or addressee of the message. The facts relied upon by the plaintiff do not show such a condition. The plaintiff cannot recover for any loss arising from the manner of delivery of the message of October 6, 1905.

The courts of the state of Illinois hold the "unrepeated message" stipulation to be unjust, without consideration, contrary to public policy, and void. Tyler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 60 Ill. 421, 14 Am. Rep. 38; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Tyler, 74 Ill. 168, 24 Am. Rep. 279. The defendant, however, contends that under the Illinois decisions it is the law of the place of performance which governs; and hence as the two telegrams, which are, respectively, the subject of the second and fourth counts of the declaration, although forwarded by the defendant in Illinois, were to be delivered in Rhode Island, the stipulation should be held as valid by this court although against public policy in Illinois, the place where the contract originated. The defendant bases this claim upon the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. North Packing & Provision Co. 188 Ill. 366, 52 L.R.A. 274, 58 N. E. 958. This view was adopted by the justice of the superior court. In our opinion this is not a correct interpretation of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. North Packing & Provision Co. supra. That case first came to the appellate court of Illinois, first district, on appeal from the circuit court of Cook county. By the opinion reported in 70 Ill. App. 275, the judgment rendered for the defendant was reversed, and the case was remanded to the circuit court for a new trial. The action was in assumpsit for failure to deliver promptly in Chicago a telegram originating in Boston. The message, when it was filed with the defendant, had the "unrepeated message" stipulation printed on its back. This stipulation is held to be valid in Massachusetts, but against public policy in Illinois. The appellate court held, contrary to the great weight of authority, that as the message was to be delivered in Chicago the contract should be construed in accordance with the law of Illinois. The case was retried in the circuit court, resulting in a decision for the plaintiff, and again came to the appellate court on appeal. 89 Ill. App. 301. In that opinion the appellate court said: "It is contended by counsel for appellant that the court should have held that the law of Massachusetts, in relation to liability for unrepeated messages, should control in this case. The question is disposed of by the decision of this court upon the former appeal. 70 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Ill. App. 275. But if it were not, no question of controlling importance could arise in that regard." The court then proceeded to a discussion of the other exceptions, and approved the judgment. The case then went to the supreme court, and the opinion of that court appears in 188 Ill. 366, 52 L.R.A. 274, 58 N. E. 958. Apparently no question of the conflict of law was before the supreme court. The court said: "The various errors assigned will all be considered together." Following which is an extended discussion of questions relating to the legal effect, upon the matter of damages, of certain conduct on the part of the plaintiff and its agent; but the opinion is silent as to whether the law of Massachusetts or that of Illinois governs as to the validity of the conditions printed on the back of the message blank. It is clear that no assignment of error carried that question to the supreme court. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. North Packing & Provision Co. supra, therefore, is not an authority for the proposition that, under the Illinois law, the law of the place where the message was delivered governs as to the validity of the "unrepeated message" stipulation. In that case the courts of Illinois might, with propriety, refuse to enforce such a provision, although it constituted a valid part of the contract in Massachusetts, in accordance with the well-recognized doctrine that a contract will not be upheld, though valid in the place where it was made, if regarded as against public policy of the state in which it is attempted to be enforced. We must hold the conclusion of the justice of the superior court as to the state of the Illinois law in this regard to be unwarranted. As we have previously held in this case (31 R. I. 174, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 795, 76 Atl. 762), the question as to the validity and effect of this regulation is governed by the law of the state where the message originated. In the messages which are the subject of the second and fourth count of the declaration, the stipulations printed upon the back, by which the defendant sought to restrict its liability, were of no effect when the contract was made. They were against the public policy of the state of Illinois, entirely void, and unenforceable. As they did not become a part of the contract when it was made, the courts of this state cannot place them therein.

We will now pass from this general consideration of the case to the specific exceptions before us. The plaintiff excepted to rulings by the justice presiding, excluding evidence offered by the plaintiff to show the actual damage sustained by him by reason of the manner in which the defendant delivered said messages. As to the messages of August 26, 1909, and October 6, 1909, both of which originated in the state of New York, we have said above that no recovery can be had. The exceptions to the exclusion of such testimony in regard to those telegrams, therefore, are overruled. As to the messages of September 10th and November 3d, which were filed with the defendant in the state of Illinois, the legal liability of the defendant is such as results from the agreement to transmit the same for a reasonable compensation, unaccompanied by any limitation of its liability by express terms or conditions. Without special agreement, telegraph companies are not insurers of the correctness of the message delivered, nor are they bound to exercise the highest degree of diligence and promptness in its delivery, or to use the greatest care as to the place of delivery; but they must be held to the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care in the performance of their obligations.

As this plaintiff was not privy to the contract between the defendant and the sender of these messages, his action is properly in tort. We have held, however, that his action is founded upon and limited by that contract, and his rights thereunder can be no greater than those of the party to the contract. 31 R. I. 174, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 795, 76 Atl. 762. His action is governed by the same rule as to damages as would be that of the sender of the message in an action ex contractu founded upon the same alleged negligent act of the defendant.

The rule as to special damages for breach of contract, followed by the courts of England and the United States and approved by this court in Greene v. Creighton, 7 R. I. 1, was laid down by Baron Alderson in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 353, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 502, in the following terms: "Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive, in respect of such breach of contract, should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally—i. e., according to the usual course of things—from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. But, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at most, could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances, from such breach of contract."

The testimony offered by the plaintiff, the exceptions to the exclusion of which is now under consideration, was that, by reason of the delay in the receipt by him of the messages in question, he was unable to accept the offer of his customers made for the commodities referred to in these telegrams, and that he was obliged to make sales of said goods to other persons at a loss, either actual or of profits. Can such loss be said to be one which naturally flowed from the alleged breach of the defendant's duty as to delivery of these messages; or can such loss be regarded as within the contemplation of the parties as a result of such breach of the defendant's duty? The only loss which would naturally flow from the failure to deliver this message would be the loss to the sender of what he paid to the defendant for its service. In the absence of knowledge on the part of the defendant as to the contents of the messages, the loss which the plaintiff now claims cannot have been in the contemplation of the defendant when it accepted the messages for transmission. The plaintiff contends, however, that under the authority of a number of cases in several of the states, enough appeared in the messages in question to show that they related to business transactions between the plaintiff and the senders, and that that is sufficient to charge the defendant with all the damages resulting from its negligence in transmission and delivery. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Lathrop, 131 Ill. 575, 7 L.R.A. 474, 19 Am. St. Rep. 55, 23 N. E. 583. The plaintiff claims that that circumstance would bring this case within the portion of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, which provides that if the special circumstances under which the contract was made were communicated to the defendant, it would be liable for the extraordinary damages which might arise from a breach of the contract under those special circumstances. The weight of authority, however, and it seems to us the better reason, is that the knowledge merely that the messages are important or that they relate to a business transaction, without information as to the exact nature and extent of that business transaction, does not constitute such a disclosure of special circumstances as would render the defendant liable for damages arising from a breach of the contract. Primrose v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 154 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 883, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1098; Whelock v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 197 Mass. 119, 83 N. E. 313, 14 Ann. Cas. 188; Baldwin v. United States Teleg. Co. 45 N. Y. 744, 6 Am. Rep. 165, 3 Mor. Min. Rep. 70; Candee v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 34 Wis. 471, 17 Am. Rep. 452; United States Teleg. Co. v. Gildersleve, 29 Md. 232, 96 Am. Dec. 519. In the case at bar the only notice which the defendant had of the transactions to which the messages of September 10, 1909, and November 3, 1909, related, was contained in the messages themselves, which were as follows: "Too low. Sell two cars two twenty-eight deld there," and "Packed fifty boxes crop apples." From the language of these telegrams the defendant might have conjectured that they related to some sort of business transaction, but they were insufficient to give it any information of the possible damages which might arise from the delivery of the telegram at the defendant's home, rather than at his business office. The testimony in question offered by the plaintiff was properly excluded, and the exceptions should be overruled.

The defendant excepted to the ruling of said justice directing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. As to the first and third counts of the declaration, relating to the messages delivered to the defendant in the state of New York, we have said above that no cause of action arose to the plaintiff from the matters alleged in said counts. As to the second and fourth counts of the declaration, relating to messages delivered to the defendant in the state of Illinois, we have said above that the justice was in error in his conclusion that the plaintiff could not recover on said counts because of the validity of the "unrepeated message" stipulation, which the defendant sought to impose as a condition attached to the transmission of said messages. There is, however, no testimony upon which the jury could base a finding of damages for the plaintiff upon said counts if they should find the defendant was guilty of negligence in the manner of delivery of said messages. There was, therefore, no reversible error in the direction of a verdict by said justice.

All of the plaintiff's exceptions are overruled, and the case is remitted to the Superior Court, with direction to enter judgment upon the verdict.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

MURRAY VANDIVER, State Treasurer, et al., Appts.,
v.

EDWIN W. POE et al., Receivers of United Surety Company.

(119 Md. 348, 87 Atl. 410.)

Guaranty fund — state treasurer — surender to receiver.

Funds deposited by a surety company with the state treasurer to secure its contracts, under a statute providing that they shall be held in trust by the treasurer for contract holders, subject to sale by him and application of the proceeds only on the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, will not be required to be turned over to a receiver appointed to liquidate the affairs of the company, which remains solvent.

(January 14, 1913.)

A PPEAL by the state treasurer and the United States from decrees of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City granting a petition, and reaffirming the same on petition to reopen the matter, directing the state treasurer to deliver a deposit of stock held by him to petitioners. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Right of receiver of insurance company to funds deposited with state official to secure performance of contracts.

The question raised by this note must of necessity depend to a great extent upon the wording and construction of the particular statute permitting or requiring the deposit. The decisions seem to indicate a disposition, if not a settled rule, on the part of the courts, to hold that the state official cannot be compelled to turn the deposit over to the receiver, unless the statute either, in plain words or by implication, so directs. The reason underlying such rule is that the state officer has been by law made trustee of the fund for a special use, and, in the absence of fraud on the part of the trustee the court has no power to hinder him from performing his trust.

In case the state officer held more funds than were required to fulfil the trust, the reason for the rule would be lacking as to the excess, and in such case the rule would probably to that extent not be applied. The court in VANDIVER v. POE distinguished the American Casualty Ins. Co.'s Case (Boston & A. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust & D. Co.) 82 Md. 535, 38 L.R.A. 97, 34 Atl. 778, from the case before the court: "There the insolvency of the company was

The court in VANDIVER v. POE sufficiently sets out the facts in the case of Cooke v. Warner, 56 Conn. 234, 14 Atl. 798, and says that the statute involved was substantially like the one under consideration. The wording of the statute in the Cooke Case was as follows: "When any state shall require insurance companies of other states to deposit with some officer of such other state securities in trust for policy holders of such companies, as a prerequisite to their transacting business in such state, the treasurer of this state may receive from any insurance company of this state the securities required by the laws of such other state on deposit, and hold the same in trust for the policy holders of such company; but such company may collect and receive the interest and dividends thereon."

Stockbridge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 13th of January, 1911, the United Surety Company was placed in the hands of receivers. The bill filed in the case was by some of the stockholders and directors of the company, and, among other things, alleged that, through mismanagement and wastefulness in the conduct of its affairs, the surplus of $250,000 had been altogether wiped out, and its capital stock had been impaired, but nevertheless the said company was solvent, but had been prohibited by an order of the state insurance commissioner from writing any further bonds of any nature or description until the impairment of its capital stock had been made good. The prayer of the bill was: First, that receivers might be appointed; second, for an injunction requiring the officers, agents, and employees of the company to deliver to receivers the books, papers, and accounts, and all the property of the company, and to refrain from interfering in any manner with the possession of the property by the receiver; and, third, that a day should be fixed before which all claims of every description should be filed in court or be forever barred from participation in the assets of the corporation. The allegations of the bill were admitted by the company by its answer.

E. 605, are also adequately explained in the opinion.

J. W. M.

In May, 1906, the company had deposited with the treasurer of Maryland $100,000 of the registered stock of the city of Baltimore par value, in order to comply with the provisions of the act of 1896, chap. 160, Code 1912, art. 23, § 110. At the same time it had deposited with the treasurer of the state of Maryland an additional $100,000 par value of the registered stock of the city of Baltimore, in order to meet the legal requirements imposed by the laws of some of the other states in which the company wished to do business. On the 27th of July, 1911, the receivers filed a petition, the object of which was to require the state treasurer to deliver over to them the $200,000 par value of Baltimore city stock, and by its order of July 28, 1911, the circuit court of Baltimore city ordered such transfer from the state treasurer to the receivers. Thereafter, and before the decree had become enrolled, the state treasurer filed a petition to reopen the order of July 28th, in order that he and his bond might be heard thereon and present objections thereto. These objections came on to be heard later, and after such hearing, on March 16, 1912, the court reaffirmed its order of July 28, 1911, and directed the securities in the hands of the state treasurer to be by him delivered over to the receivers of the company, and it is from these two orders or decrees that the present appeal has been taken.

The question presented is a narrow one, and one for which no precise precedent has been cited or found. While there are a number of cases in which receivers of insolvent corporations, or corporations which have been dissolved, or the charters of which have been declared forfeited, have sought to recover from an official depository securities placed in his hands for the security of those doing business with the company, in order that the proceeds of such securities might be distributed among claimants according to their respective legal rights, no case has been found of a like application to gain possession of the securities of a solvent company. The solvency of the company in question is not merely alleged in the bill, but has been reiterated time and again by these receivers in various papers filed by them, and was distinctly testified to on the stand by one of the receivers, and it is alleged to have been the reason for the dismissal of an action instituted by certain of the stockholders of the company for the dissolution of the company. One of the receivers testifies in these words: "We are endeavoring to work out a practical liquidation that will result in a benefit to those who own the property; 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) that is, those who own its bonds, policies, and stock."

In the case of the American Casualty Ins. Co. 82 Md. 535, 38 L.R.A. 97, 34 Atl. 778, $200,000 had been deposited in a similar manner with the state treasurer, and an application was made by receivers of that company to turn over to them such securities, but in that case no question appears to have been raised as to the power or propriety of Mr. Jones, then state treasurer, surrendering the property. At the time when the deposit was made in the American Casualty Case, the statute (act 1892, chap. 109) then in force did not require a deposit with the state treasurer of any securities by a company doing a surety business. In the able opinion filed in that case, the late Chief Judge McSherry held that the circumstances under which the deposit was made were such as to create a valid trust, and to be administered as a trust, and further that, if the state treasurer "did not care to take upon himself the responsibility of distributing the fund among the parties entitled to it, he had the undoubted right either to invoke the aid of a court in its distribution, or upon the petition of the receivers to surrender it to the court, whose officers the receivers were," and that the fund then in court "must be treated as impressed with a trust, and must be applied solely to the payment of the claims of the policy holders," subject to prior or paramount liens. By the act of 1896, chap. 160, companies doing a surety business were brought within the control of the law, and the securities of such companies so deposited with the state treasurer were required to be "registered in the name of said treasurer officially, as held in trust under and pursuant to this act, and the same shall be held by said treasurer in trust for all the holders of policies or guaranties of said corporation. . . . And all of the said stocks so held in trust by the said treasurer . . . shall be held by said treasurer subject to sale and transfer, and to the application of the proceeds of such sale by the said treasurer only on the order of any court of competent jurisdiction." This represents the case of a fund distinctly required by a legislative act of assembly as a condition of doing business, designated as a trust fund, for a specific purpose, with a trustee created by the act and the mode of the execution of his trust in some measure pointed out. The question is thus not identified with the situation which was presented in the Casualty Case. There the insolvency of the company was established; here solvency is said to exist; there no statute had been provided covering the case; here we have an explicit one.

In Beach on the Law of Insurance, vol. 1, § 82, it is said: "The effect of statutes of the states providing for the deposit by insurance companies of securities with some state official, . . . for the protection of its policy holders, and the act of the companies in complying with such statutes is to create a trust fund in the hands of such official, he thereby becoming a trustee for the class of beneficiaries represented by the insured in those states. Such trusts have been held as perfect as those created by deed or will, and as much entitled to protection from courts. In a case where a life insurance company which had deposited with the state treasurer an amount in securities, under a statute passed to enable it to thus comply with the requirements of statutes of other states, that it might do business in those states, had become insolvent, and its affairs and assets had been placed in the hands of receivers, it was held that the receivers could not by action recover this amount from the state treasurer. It was a trust fund in his hands for the benefit of the various policy holders. The state had made him a trustee, placed no limitation upon his rights and powers as such, and presumably intended to leave him subject to the general law of trusts. When the trust terminates, it is his duty to distribute the fund among the beneficiaries."

The rule is thus expressed in Joyce on Insurance, vol. 4, § 3593: "In many states the insurance companies are required to deposit a fund with the state treasurer or other state officer for the security of the policy holders in such states. In case of a deposit being made in pursuance of such a requirement, the receiver of the company cannot obtain possession of the fund for the benefit of the general creditors, but it must be divided among the persons for whose protection it was deposited, and no others can acquire the benefits thereof."

The leading case on this subject is Cooke v. Warner, 58 Conn. 234, 14 Atl. 798. In that case the insurance Commissioner of Connecticut had taken proceedings against the Continental Life Insurance Company upon the ground that its assets were less than its liabilities, and asked the appointment of a receiver, and that the charter be annulled; and a decree was passed by which the charter was annulled (corporation dissolved) and receivers were appointed; and the receivers then demanded of the state treasurer the securities which had been deposited with him under a statute substantially like that in this state. The application of the receivers was refused, the court holding that the trustee could not thus have the trust funds taken from him for use or even distribution by others, in the absence of an allegation that he was wrong either in possession or administration; that the statute could no more compel a trustee to surrender property lawfully subjected to a trust, than it could compel a mortgagee or pledgee to release the mortgage or pledge without payment; that, if turned over to the receivers, it might be diverted from the specific trust purposes to which it was dedicated.

The New York court of appeals in the case of Ruggles v. Chapman, 59 N. Y. 163, adopted the same rule, and an act was then passed by the New York legislature in which it was thought that the rule had been modified, and in that way, in the case of the People ex rel. Ruggles v. Chapman, 64 N. Y. 557, the question a second time reached that court, and its former ruling was affirmed. These cases were followed in the later case of the Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 13 Hun, 115, although the judge deciding that case would evidently have been very glad if he could thus have diverted the fund from the hands of the trustee into those of the receivers.

In Re Home Provident Safety Fund Asso. 129 N. Y. 288, 29 N. E. 323, there was a voluntary dissolution of the company, and it was held that, while the court had power to make a distribution of its funds among those entitled, it had no power to take from a trustee funds placed in the hands of that trustee for a specific purpose, and distribute them through its receiver instead of through the trustee; that the trustee was entitled to hold the fund notwithstanding the dissolution; but the courts might require the trustee to make the distribution of the fund in accordance with the terms of the trust on which it was held.

The case of People v. American Steam Boiler Ins. Co. 147 N. Y. 25, 41 N. E. 423, was one which turned mainly upon the right of the receiver to demand of the trustee the interest which had been received on the deposit, and that right was affirmed; but it was further held that under the then existing statute of New York, which had been passed in part to obviate the effect of the decision in Ruggles v. Chapman, supra, that a receiver was not entitled to have the fund turned over to him until the rights of the policy holders had been settled.

The appellee relies strongly, for the purpose of sustaining the right of the receivers to the securities now in the hands of the state treasurer, upon the case of Hayne v. Metropolitan Trust Co. 67 Minn. 245, 69 N. W. 916. In that case certain securities had been deposited with the state insurance commissioner for the benefit of policy holders, and subsequently an exchange was effected by the company by which securities of a less value were substituted for the securities originally deposited, and the receiver proceeded against the trust company which then held the original securities, to recover them for the benefit of the policy holders. This presented a far different case from the one before us; there had been a diversion of the trust fund; and it was a proceeding, not against the official who should have been the custodian of the security, but against a corporation which had gained possession of those securities to recover them back; or, in other words, restore a fund which had been permitted by the state official, whose duty it was to guard it, to be diverted, and under such a condition of facts there is no similarity to the present case.

The appellee has also cited the case of Relfe v. Spear, 6 Mo. App. 129. That was the case of a proceeding by the superintendent of insurance of the state of Missouri against the receivers of five different insurance companies, and the purpose of the application was to enable the superintendent to distribute the proceeds of the securities. In that case the phraseology of the Missouri statute differed from that of New York; the companies had been dissolved; and under the wording of the statute it was held that the distribution should be made under the supervision of the court through its receivers.

The case of Atty. Gen. v. North American L. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 152, arose under an entirely different statute, one which provided for the sale and conversion into money by the superintendent of insurance of the securities deposited with him, and then contained this further provision: "The proceeds of such sale or sales shall be paid to the said receiver on his giving his receipt to said superintendent." This was an express direction of law, not for the turning over to the receiver of the securities held by the state insurance commissioner, but of the proceeds of sale, and under such a mandate the court had no option when the insurance commissioner had made the sale required by the statute, but was bound to direct the turning over of the proceeds. This decision, therefore, cannot be regarded as a precedent for the present case.

In Falkenbach v. Patterson, 43 Ohio St. 359, 1 N. E. 757, the court goes only to the extent of saying that "the superintendent of insurance should act and perform his trust, . . . and, when the trust is fully performed, the remainder of the deposit, if any," should then, and not until then, be paid over to the assignee.

An Ohio statute read: "The securities deposited with the insurance department pursuant to this section shall be held by the superintendent in trust for the benefit and protection of, and as security for, the policy holders of such corporation, their legal representatives and beneficiaries;" [§ 3631-25, Bates's Anno. Stat.] and in State ex rel. Cincinnati Life Assn. v. Matthews, 64 Ohio St. 419, 60 N. E. 605, where a recovery of the securities was sought by the assignee of an insolvent corporation, it was held that the assignee could not recover them without first showing that the company was no longer liable to the policy holders, and that it was the duty of the superintendent of insurance to make the distribution among such policy holders. In all of these various cases, the corporations, the recovery of the securities of which was asked, were insolvent, and as set forth above there is hardly a break in the line of decisions to the effect that receivers and assignees are not entitled to demand or obtain the possession of such securities, and, if this be true with regard to insolvent corporations, with far greater reason must it be true in the case of a solvent corporation.

Much stress was laid in argument upon the complication and increased expense which would ensue from a distribution of the fund arising from the proceeds of sale of the securities in the hands of the state treasurer, if that were required to be done in a separate and independent proceeding. Upon the case as presented in the record, there is no case of distribution before this court, or even evidence that this fund, or any of it, will be required by the receivers for the liquidation of valid claims. From their report they apparently hold assets of the corporation to an amount somewhere between $400,000 and $500,000 not impressed with any trust, and if the company is, as they aver and testify, solvent, it may well be that no part of the $200,000 will be required for the payment of any claims of policy holders. Apparently some such belief was in the mind of the court below, as it passed no decree dissolving the corporation, but in fact dismissed a bill having that ultimate object in view.

The state treasurer is now a party to the present proceeding; by his answer the disposition of the securities or the proceeds arising from them is under the control of the equity court in which these receivers were appointed; and while we do not decide that under a different condition of facts it might not be right and appropriate to direct the turning over of the proceeds of the sale of the securities to the receivers to distribute, or that the state treasurer might not make a distribution of them in the same proceeding, we can find no sufficient warrant in the statute, or in the condition of the company as it now exists, to justify the turning over at this time, to the receivers of a solvent corporation, securities which have been placed in the hands of a trustee for a specific trust purpose, and with beneficiaries scattered in a large number of states. The decrees of July 28, 1911, and March 16, 1912, must therefore be reversed.

Decrees of July 28, 1911, and March 16, 1912, reversed, and cause remanded; the appellees to pay the costs of this appeal.

J. S. LYNCH et al.

v.

WILLIAM MERRILL et al.

and

LITTLE KANAWHA LOG & TIE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 78 S. E. 669.)

Sale — character — how determined.

1. Whether a sale of personal property is complete, or only executory, is to be determined from the intention of the parties as gathered from the contract, the situation of the thing sold, and the circumstances surrounding the sale.

Same — passing title — identification.

2. Where the goods sold are sufficiently designated, so that no question can arise as to the thing intended, it is not absolutely necessary to the passing of title that they should be in a deliverable condition, or that the quality or quantity, when the sale depends on either or both, should be determined. They are mere circumstances indicating intent, but are not conclusive.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wirt County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover possession of certain saw logs. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George W. Johnson and William Beard, for plaintiff in error:

The court erred in instructing the jury that the title to the timber could not pass under the verbal sale to the plaintiff in Headnotes by LYNCH, J.

Note.—The note to Barber v. Andrews 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, as to the sufficiency of selection or designation of goods sold out of a larger lot, sets out, at page 38, many cases involving the sale of logs. In that note, at pages 7 et seq., will also be found 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

error, until it was counted, measured, and branded.

Messrs. L. H. Barnett and Brannon & Stathers for defendants in error.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error obtained by the Little Kanawha Log & Tie Company to a judgment for plaintiffs. The action, originating before a justice, is to determine the right to the possession of thirty-two saw logs, if to be had, and, if not, to recover their value and damages for detention thereof.

The defendant log and tie company claims title to the logs under a contract with Beall dated February 15, 1909, whereby, at an agreed price per cubic foot, Beall sold the logs to it, to be "rafted," or delivered as rafted, at the mouth of Duck run in the Little Kanawha river, the company to furnish, and it did furnish, "chain dogs" and anchor ropes for the purpose. The logs being cut at the date of the contract, Beall proceeded with the work; but the exact date of completion is not shown, though some of the witnesses say the raft was completed in a floatable condition as early as April 20th. If then completed, the logs were rafted at an earlier date.

The plaintiffs trace title to the logs through a sale by an officer under an execution against Beall received at 4 o'clock P. M., April 19th, and levied about May 10th; the sale being made May 21st.

The summons as issued fixed the value of the logs at $240 and damages at $100, the aggregate of which exceeded the amount for which a justice could render judgment. Before appearance of defendants Merrill and Petty, by plea or otherwise, except to object thereto, plaintiffs with leave amended the summons by reducing the damages to $50, thereby bringing the total within the jurisdictional amount. Defendants then entered the general issue of non detinet, and, thereafter, according to the record, moved to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, and, on denial thereof, proceeded to trial, ending in a judgment for plaintiffs.

On appeal to the circuit court, defendants Merrill and Petty disclaiming title to the logs, and averring title thereto in the log a discussion of the influence of the intention of the parties on the question. And see also later cases in this series. Seldomridge v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 337, and McDermott v. Kimball Lumber Mfg. Co. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461.

and the company, the latter, pursuant to an order requiring it to appear, state, and defend its title, if any, thereto, appeared to the action and likewise moved a dismissal thereof. Upon the refusal of the motion, the court, at the instance of the company, continued the case until the next succeeding term, when a trial was had, resulting in a verdict and judgment thereon for plaintiffs.

The defendant company complains of the court's ruling on the motion to dismiss, and cites in support of its contention former decisions of this court. But the cases cited do not and could not discuss the question, because it was not therein involved. They hold, as will appear from examination, that, when there is conflict between the amount claimed or proven and that stated in the summons, the latter, and not the former, determines the right to maintain the action. The case of Hynds v. Fay Bros. & Co. 70 Iowa, 433, 30 N. W. 683, cited, does tend in some degree to support the view urged by the company. But that case does not cite any authority nor do the facts stated therein correspond in all respects with the facts of this case. In so far as it holds that the parties may not waive the irregularity, if any, it does not accord with our views. Under the circumstances of this case, to dismiss would make substance yield to mere technicality, and to sustain the motion after two trials, in both of which the parties joined, would operate to delay, if not deny, speedy termination of the litigation sought by this action.

The trial, however, proceeded upon the wrong theory, as appears from the instructions in bills of exception 8 and 10, and thereby the jury may have been and probably were misled. The first instruction told the jury, in substance, that if anything remained to be done, such as measuring, counting, and branding the logs, title thereto could not vest in the defendant until they were measured, counted, and branded, omitting entirely the intention of the parties as to the time at which title should vest in the purchaser. Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1, 57 Am. Rep. 633; Bank of Huntington v. Napier, 41 W. Va. 481, 23 S. E. 800; Bushkirk Bros. v. Peck, 57 W. Va. 360, 50 S. E. 432; Justice v. Moore, 69 W. Va. 51, 71 S. E. 204, Ann. Cas. 1912 D, 17; Moore v. Patchin, — W. Va. —, 76 S. E. 426. "Whether a sale of personal property is complete or only executory, is to be determined from the intent of the parties as gathered from the contract, the situation of the thing sold, and the circumstances surrounding the sale." "Where the goods sold are sufficiently designated, so that no question can arise as to the thing intended, it is not absolutely necessary . . . that the goods should be in a deliverable condition, or that the quantity or quality, when the price depends upon either or both, should be determined; these are circumstances indicating intent, but are not conclusive." Hood v. Bloch Bros. 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. 910. This instruction, omitting, as it did, this essential element of intention, should not have been given; nor should the one contained in bill of exceptions 10. The facts did not warrant the latter. The logs were hauled and substantially, though perhaps not skilfully, bound together in a floatable condition about the date of the execution under which plaintiffs trace title. They were, as already stated, at first levied on as a "raft," and not as separate logs. If so, they had been hauled, and doubtless rafted, although it may be that some of the logs purchased by defendant in addition to those involved in this action were not hauled at that time. But they were not levied on or sold under the execution, and therefore are not now involved.

Defendant's instructions contained in bills of exception 15 and 16 should have been given, for reasons heretofore stated. They properly propounded the law applicable to the facts of the case.

The court should have permitted the witness Beall to answer the questions by defendant's counsel, shown in bills of exception 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, because plaintiffs' witnesses J. M. Lynch and M. B. Summers testified to the same matter, and no sufficient reason appears for refusing Beall's on the same subject. If a proper inquiry, Beall should with propriety have had an opportunity to admit or deny their statements.

Invalidity of the sale under the execution, because the purchaser was not present at the time of sale, is also relied on by defendant. At the instance of the constable, he offered $100, a definite and fixed sum, and to that extent only was the constable authorized to cry his bid. 2 Freeman, Executions, 2d ed. § 292, says: "The officer making the sale [cannot] act as the agent of a person desirous of bidding. He can neither bid for himself nor for another. We apprehend that this rule must be confined to cases in which the officer, in acting as agent, would be expected to exercise his discretion in making bids, and to purchase the property at the lowest price for which it could be obtained. It ought not to be extended to cases where he is authorized by letter, or otherwise, to offer a specified amount on behalf of an absent bidder." This we think is the true rule.

From what has been said, the conclusion is to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and grant the defendant a new trial.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

HENRY J. MIERKE, Admr., etc., of Minnie Mierke, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

JEFFERSON COUNTY SAVINGS BANK,
Respnt.

(208 N. Y. 347, 101 N. E. 889.)

Pleading — complaint — action for savings bank deposit — excusing non-presentation of pass book.

1. A complaint by an administrator to Note. — Right to withdraw deposit from savings bank without presenting pass book.

While there are statutes in many jurisdictions, and most savings banks have rules or by-laws authorized by statute, providing, in substance, that no deposit shall be withdrawn without the presentation of the depositor's pass book, it has been generally held that such statutes, rules, and by-laws must be reasonably construed, and do not prevent the recovery of a deposit from the bank without the pass book, where it has become impossible for some reason for the depositor or his representative to produce it.

Thus, although a by-law of a savings bank requires the production of a depositor's pass book as a condition to withdrawing his deposit, the administrator of the depositor may recover the amount of the deposit without presenting the book or furnishing a bond of indemnity, upon his furnishing sufficient proof that the book has been destroyed by fire. Hudson v. Roxbury Inst. for Sav. 176 Mass. 522, 57 N. E. 1021.

And where a savings bank depositor lost his pass book and notified the bank thereof three years before his death, and no claim has been made for the deposit except by the depositor and his executor, the latter may recover the amount of the deposit from the bank without presenting the pass book or giving a bond of indemnity, although by-laws of the bank provide that no money whatever shall be drawn out without the depositor presenting his pass book and allowing such sum as is drawn out to be entered therein, and that, in the case of lost books, the bank will decide as to the person to whom payment shall be made. Mills v. Albany Exch. Sav. Bank, 28 Misc. 251, 59 N. Y. Supp. 149.

And the administrator of a deceased savings bank depositor cannot be required to present the pass book of his intestate as a condition precedent to recovering the latter's deposit, where he is unable to produce the book in consequence of its loss or destruction, or the wrongful withholding of its possession from him by the family of the decedent, although it is provided by the charter and by-laws of the bank that no person shall receive any part of his principal or dividends without producing the original book, that such payment may be entered thereon; nor can the administrator be required to tender a bond of indemnity under such circumstances, where no claim to the fund has been interposed by any other person, and the bank has had no notice of legal or equitable claims of any other person. Palmer v. Providence Inst. for Sav. 14 R. I. 68, 51 Am. Rep. 341.

Savings bank — loss of pass book — requiring bond of administrator.

2. A savings bank cannot require a bond of the administrator of a depositor as a condition to paying the deposit to him, in the absence of any by-law requiring it, although the pass book is lost, and both the statute and by-laws require presentation of such book as a condition to the withdrawal of deposit.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Jefferson duke the book in consequence of its loss or destruction, or the wrongful withholding of its possession from him by the family of the decedent, although it is provided by the charter and by-laws of the bank that no person shall receive any part of his principal or dividends without producing the original book, that such payment may be entered thereon; nor can the administrator be required to tender a bond of indemnity under such circumstances, where no claim to the fund has been interposed by any other person, and the bank has had no notice of legal or equitable claims of any other person. Palmer v. Providence Inst. for Sav. 14 R. I. 68, 51 Am. Rep. 341.

Likewise, a savings bank depositor as to whose identity there is no doubt is entitled to recover his money on deposit without the giving of a bond of indemnity, although his book has been lost or stolen, and the by-laws of the bank provide that "no person shall have the right to demand any part of the principal or interest without producing the original deposit book, that such payments may be entered therein," and that, "should any depositor lose his book, he is required to give immediate notice thereof to the institution; and in cases of doubt as to the identity of the depositors or claimants, the board may require such testimony and security as they may deem necessary." Wagner v. Howard Sav. Inst. 52 N. J. L. 225, 19 Atl. 212.

And where there is no question about the identity of a savings bank depositor whose pass book has been lost or stolen, the bank cannot arbitrarily require him to give a bond of indemnity as a condition to paying his deposit, although it is provided by statute that "no payment or check against any such savings account shall be made unless accompanied by and entered in the pass book issued therefor, except for good cause and on assurances satisfactory to the officers of the bank;" and the bank has promulgated a rule, pursuant to statute, that in case of payments either to the depositor personally, or to any other person holding his written order or power of County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover a savings bank deposit. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kellogg & Crabb, for appellant:

A depositor in a savings bank is a creditor of the bank for the amount of the deposit, the deposit becomes the property of the bank, and the relation between the parties is that of debtor and creditor.

People v. Mechanics' & T. Sav. Inst. 92 N. Y. 7; Fowler v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 113 N. Y. 450, 4 L.R.A. 145, 10 Am. St. Rep. 479, 21 N. E. 172; People ex rel. Bridgeport Sav. Bank v. Barker, 154 N. Y. 128, 47 N. E. 973; People ex rel. Heermance v. Dederick, 35 App. Div. 29, 54 N. Y. Supp. 519; Dechen v. Dechen, 59 App. Div. 166,

The defendant has money belonging to the estate of the plaintiff's intestate. It cannot in equity and good conscience retain the same and deprive those to whom the money justly belongs of that which is rightfully theirs.

21 Cyc. 849; Roberts v. Ely, 113 N. Y. 128, 20 N. E. 606; Mason v. Prendergast, 120 N. Y. 536, 24 N. E. 806; Lawatsch v. Cooney, 20 App. Div. 470, 47 N. Y. Supp. 54; Bleecker v. Balje, 138 App. Div. 706, 123 N. Y. Supp. 809; Weston v. Brown, 158 N. Y. 360, 53 N. E. 36; Bradbury's Rules, Pl. 264; Goodman v. Alexander, 165 N. Y. 289, 55 L.R.A. 781, 59 N. E. 145; Worthington v. Worthington, 100 App. Div. 332, 91 N. Y. Supp. 443; Doherty v.

attorney, the pass book must be presented, "provided, however, that payments may be made without the production of the pass book, if the depositor shall prove, to the satisfaction of the executive committee, that his book has been lost, stolen, or destroyed, and shall give to the company a written discharge with satisfactory indemnity against loss for any payment without the production of said book." Bayer v. Commonwealth Trust Co. 144 Mo. App. 676, 129 S. W. 268.

So, in Newman v. Munk, 36 Misc. 639, 74 N. Y. Supp. 467, an action to recover, as damages for the conversion of a savings bank book, the amount shown thereby to be on deposit, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover such amount, but only the actual damages sustained, as he could still maintain an action against the bank for the amount of the deposit.

The absence of his pass book cannot be regarded as destroying a depositor's right to his deposit, although there is a statutory requirement that no savings bank may make any payments except upon production of the pass book; and such requirement is not conclusive in an action to recover a deposit, when the ownership and loss of the original book are undisputed, although it may be available to defeat a demand at the bank. Kenney v. Harlem Sav. Bank, 61 Misc. 144, 114 N. Y. Supp. 749, reversed on other grounds in 65 Misc. 466, 120 N. Y. Supp. 82.

Where a by-law of a savings bank provides that "no person shall receive any part of his principal or interest without producing the original book, that such payments may be entered therein, unless it be proved to the satisfaction of the trustees or the treasurer that such book shall have been lost or destroyed, in which case a legal discharge shall be given," it was held, in Webber v. Cambridgeport Sav. Bank, 186 Mass. 314, 71 N. E. 567, that the administrator of a depositor may recover the amount of the latter's deposit upon furnishing evidence sufficient to satisfy the mind of a reasonable man that the deposit book is lost or destroyed, although the treasurer or trustees may not be satisfied as to that fact, as they are not rendered final arbiters of the question so as to oust the courts of their jurisdiction.

And in Vincent v. Port Huron Sav. Bank, 147 Mich. 437, 111 N. W. 90, an action by the administrator of a depositor to recover the amount of the latter's deposit without either producing the pass book or giving a bond securing the savings bank against loss from payment to him, where it appeared that a state statute provided that no payment against a savings deposit should be made unless accompanied by and entered upon the pass book, "except for good cause, and on assurances satisfactory to the officers of the bank," a judgment in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed by an evenly divided court, on the ground that "good cause" and "satisfactory assurances," under the statute, must be determined not by the officers of the bank, but by judicial triers, and that the evidence warranted the finding that good cause for not producing the pass book was shown, and that the facts furnished the satisfactory assurances necessary to defeat a prosecution for violation of the statute, and to defeat a recovery by any person who might thereafter apply for the money; the other division of the supreme court arguing that the statute was not complied with by the presentation of assurances which were unsatisfactory to the bank, so long as it acted reasonably and in good faith, but that it might require from the administrator either a bond of indemnity or other assurance satisfactory to it, and need not be satisfied with ex parte, prima facie evidence only as to the plaintiff's rights.

Where, however, a savings bank, in pursuance of statutory authority, has adopted a rule or by-law providing that "no person shall have the right to demand any part of his principal or interest without producing the original book, that such payment may be entered therein," and has had the same posted in a conspicuous place in its banking room and a copy pasted in the Shields, 86 Hun, 303, 33 N. Y. Supp. 497; Chapman v. Forbes, 123 N. Y. 532, 26 N. E. 3; Sanders v. Soutter, 126 N. Y. 195, 27 N. E. 263; Marie v. Garrison, 83 N. Y. 14; Sage v. Culver, 147 N. Y. 241, 41 N. E. 513; Abbey v. Wheeler, 170 N. Y. 127, 62 N. E. 1074, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 86.

If the complaint was defective, the defect was cured by the evidence of these facts received on the trial without objections.

31 Cyc. 723; Strawn v. Edward J. Brandt-Dent. Co. 71 App. Div. 234, 75 N. Y. Supp. 698, affirmed in 175 N. Y. 463, 67 N. E. 1090; Crane v. Powell, 139 N. Y. 379, 34 N. E. 911; Frear v. Sweet, 118 N. Y. 454, 23 N. E. 910; Rogers v. New York & T. Land Co. 134 N. Y. 197, 32 N. E. 27.

A pass book is not negotiable so that the front part of each pass book, neither a depositor nor his administrator can recover from the bank without the production of the pass book, or the giving of some evidence of its loss or destruction, or in some way accounting for its nonproduction. Warhus v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 21 N. Y. 543, affirming 5 Duer, 67.

And where it is provided by statute and by rule of a savings bank, duly promulgated pursuant to law, that no deposit or portion thereof or interest thereon shall be paid or withdrawn without the production of the pass book, for a proper entry of the transaction, an assignee of a part of a savings bank deposit standing in the name of a husband and wife, either of whom has the privilege of drawing against it, cannot, without presenting the depositors' pass book, recover such part from the bank under an assignment by the husband alone, together with an order for the money and an affidavit of the husband that the wife has the pass book and refuses to give it to him. Rosenthal v. Dollar Sav. Bank, 61 Misc. 244, 113 N. Y. Supp. 787.

Where it is provided by statute that a savings bank shall not pay any interest or deposit or portion of a deposit unless the pass book be presented and the proper entry made therein, and that the trustees may make by-laws for the payment in case of loss of the pass book, etc., and the by-laws of a savings bank, duly passed and assented to by a depositor, provide that in case of loss of a pass book, on satisfactory proof and adequate indemnity, a duplicate may be issued, and that no person shall have the right to demand or receive any sum as principle or interest without his pass book, that the amount demanded and paid may be entered therein,—unless by-laws are reasonable and valid, and form a part of the contract between the depositor and the bank, and the former cannot recover his deposit from the latter without presenting his original pass book or giving adequate security. Mitchell v. Home Sav. Bank, 38 Hun, 255.

So, where the pass book given to and accepted by a depositor upon his making 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. Samuel Child, for respondent:○

The complaint does not state a cause of action against a savings bank on a deposit account.

a deposit in a savings bank contains a provision that "depositors are alone responsible for the safe-keeping of the book and the proper withdrawal of their money; no withdrawal will be allowed without the book, and the book is the order for the withdrawal,"—the depositor cannot recover the amount of his deposit against the bank upon evidence that his book has been lost or stolen from him, without his indemnifying the bank for its payment to him, although he is unable to furnish such indemnity. Heath v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 46 N. H. 78, 88 Am. Dec. 194.

And where one of the by-laws of a savings bank, to which a depositor agreed in writing to assent, provides that "no persons shall receive any part of their principal or interest without producing the original book, that such payments may be entered thereon," the administrator of the depositor cannot maintain an action against the bank for such deposit without producing the book, or tendering to the bank a bond of indemnity against the production of the book by other persons. Wall v. Provident Inst. for Sav. 3 Allen, 96.

But if the administrator requires the amount of the deposit for the payment of debts of the intestate, he may recover it from the bank without presenting the book, upon his furnishing a sufficient bond to keep the bank harmless from all consequences of the payment to him, although the intestate voluntarily parted with the book to defraud his creditors. Wall v. Provident Inst. for Sav. 6 Allen, 320.

Where a savings bank pass book has been lost or destroyed, and upon demand by the depositor's administrator, who is legally entitled to the deposit, for payment of the amount thereof, the bank refuses payment on the ground that it has a meritorious defense on which it intends to rely, and gives no indication that its refusal is because the book is not presented, this constitutes a waiver by the bank of its right to require the presentation of the pass book. Mitchell v. Home Sav. Bank, supra.

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is a savings bank in which plaintiff's intestate at the time of her death had money on deposit. The plaintiff's husband and administrator, being unable to find the pass book issued to her by the defendant evidencing the deposit, notified the officers of the bank, and requested payment to him of the amount credited to the decedent's account. The defendant's officers refused payment unless plaintiff should give a bond of indemnity against loss. This the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

plaintiff refused to do, and he brought this action to recover the deposit. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant. The learned trial court held, in substance, that the complaint was fatally defective because it did not allege the loss of the pass book, or any facts tending to excuse its nonproduction and presentation, and that the proof did not show any excuse for its nonproduction. The judgment entered upon this decision was affirmed at the appellate division by a divided court.

Before proceeding to discuss the case on the merits, it may be well to dispose of the suggestion that the complaint was insufficient. Counsel for the defendant raised this point by motion to dismiss the complaint at the opening of the trial, and the motion was then denied, but the formal decision later filed by the trial court contains the express finding that the complaint does not state a cause of action. In this ruling we think the court was in error. The complaint alleges the plaintiff's appointment and qualification as administrator, the facts concerning the deposit, his demand for the money represented by it, and the refusal of the bank to pay. This was enough to put the defendant upon its defense. The answer of the defendant, after certain denials and admissions which need not be specified, sets forth the by-laws of the bank, which will be referred to hereafter, and alleges that the plaintiff had never presented the pass book.

The pleading simply raised the usual issue between a depositor and his depository where there is a failure to pay the amount deposited. There are, of course, special statutory and substantive legal rules applicable to savings banks as distinguished from the ordinary business or discount banks, but the relation between savings banks and their depositors is nevertheless that of debtor and creditor. People v. Mechanics' & T. Sav. Inst. 92 N. Y. 7. The defendant was therefore indebted to the plaintiff in the amount of the deposit. His complaint setting forth the facts on which that indebtedness was based was sufficient, and if for any reason the defendant deemed itself entitled to withhold the deposit for its own security, the facts justifying such conduct were properly to be pleaded in its answer. The defendant evidently recognized this as the proper procedure, for it alleged the nonpresentation of the pass book as one of its defenses. It was not necessary for the plaintiff affirmatively to plead the loss of the book; that was a matter of evidence admissible to meet the defense that it had not been presented. The complaint must therefore be regarded as sufficient.

The further question remains to be determined whether the defendant presented any evidence which justified it in withholding from the plaintiff the amount of this deposit. Upon that issue the material facts found by the trial court are undisputed. Wilhelmina Mierke, at the time of her death, on November 29, 1910, had on deposit in the defendant bank the sum of $900. The plaintiff is her husband and administrator. Immediately after her death he searched for the pass book issued by the defendant to her, but was unable to find it, and on the day of her death he went to the bank and informed its officials of his inability to find the book. On January 6, 1911, the plaintiff was appointed administrator, and filed with the bank a copy of the letters appointing him. After that he had several interviews with the officials of the defendant, in which he repeatedly informed them of the loss of the pass book and demanded payment to himself as administrator of the amount of his wife's deposit. The officials of the bank refused payment unless he would give to the bank a bond in double the amount of the deposit indemnifying it against loss. This he refused to do. On the following February 28th, which was nearly two months after his appointment as administrator, he commenced this action.

The banking law (Consol. Laws, chap. 2) contains many provisions for the regulation of savings banks. Section 143 provides that the sums deposited shall be repaid to depositors or their legal representatives in such manner, and "after such previous notice, and under such regulations, as the board of trustees shall prescribe. Such regulations shall be posted in a conspicuous place in the room where the business of the corporation shall be transacted, and shall be printed in the pass books." Section 152, so far as material, provides that no check of a depositor shall be paid "unless the pass book of the depositor be produced. . . . The board of trustees may, by their by-laws, provide for making payments in cases of loss of pass book, or other exceptional cases where the pass book cannot be produced, without loss or serious inconvenience to depositors." In pursuance of these statutory provisions the defendant's board of trustees adopted by-laws which were regularly printed in its pass books and posted in its banking room. Among other provisions, these by-laws provided: "This bank will, as a rule, pay all deposits on demand, yet it reserves the right to require ninety days' notice at its office of intention to withdraw deposits; the intent of this rule being solely to protect the bank and its depositors in time of public excitement and danger." "No money can be withdrawn or deposited except on production of the pass book." "In case a pass book shall be lost immediate notice shall be given to the bank in writing, when payment upon such book will be stopped." The by-law providing for ninety days' notice of intention to withdraw presents no obstacles to the plaintiff's recovery, as the bank never indicated its intention to require any such notice. Nor does the by-law requiring written notice in case of the loss of pass book avail the defendant. The proof here clearly discloses that, while the bank was promptly and repeatedly informed of the loss of the pass book, it never intimated any desire for written notice, but on the contrary based its refusal to pay squarely on the ground that the plaintiff must give a bond of indemnity.

We have therefore to decide whether the failure to produce the pass book under the circumstances disclosed by the record warranted the refusal to pay. The statute and the bank's by-laws provide that the book must be presented. The statute further provides that the bank may adopt by-laws to provide for a case in which the pass book has been lost. The defendant's trustees have adopted no by-law providing for such a case, except that it would require notice in writing. While the plaintiff gave no written notice, the defendant did not complain of that informality, and this requirement was clearly waived. No request was made of the plaintiff for further evidence of the loss of the book, or of the circumstances surrounding its disappearance, and the question whether he has given satisfactory evidence of the circumstances, by affidavit or otherwise, does not arise here, as it did in the case of Warhus v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 21 N. Y. 543, where the plaintiff refused to comply with the defendant's reasonable request for satisfactory evidence of the loss. In the case at bar the refusal to pay is based solely on the ground that the bank was entitled to a bond of indemnity. There is nothing in its by-laws entitling it to insist upon such a condition, and in the absence of such a provision we do not think it was justified in resisting the plaintiff's claim on that ground. Whether a by-law requiring a depositor or his legal representatives to give a bond can be regarded as a reasonable condition is a question we are not now called upon to decide. All that we decide in the present case is that the plaintiff alleged and proved all the facts necessary under the circumstances to make out a good cause of action. Zander v. New York Security & T. Co. 178 N. Y. 208, 102 Am. St. Rep. 492, 70 N. E. 449.

MAYES MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

(157 N. C. 324, 72 S. E. 1087.)

Master — teamster — authority to invite passengers.

1. It is not within the implied authority of a teamster to invite boys to ride upon

Note. — Liability of owner of vehicle for injury to child invited to ride by driver.

This note is limited to cases where a child is injured while riding on a road vehicle such as a wagon or automobile, and does not include cases of injury to a child invited or permitted to ride upon engine, hand car, and the like (see note in 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 804, as to master's liability for injury to child invited into place of danger by employee); or upon elevator (see note to Davis v. Ohio Valley Bkg. & T. Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 402, as to liability of owner of elevator for injury to trespassers or licensees; also Sweeden v. Atkinson Improv. Co. 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 124; McDonough v. Pelham Hod Elevating Co. 111 App. Div. 585, 98 N. Y. Supp. 90). Cases involving liability of master for injury to minor received while aiding servant at latter's request, in case of emergency, have also been excluded, since these cases have been treated in the note to St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Bagwell, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1180, which discusses the liability of the master for injury to an emergency assistant.

It is generally held that where a servant invites or permits a child to ride against the master's orders, and without the master's knowledge, the master is not liable if the child is injured, the act of the servant not being within the scope of his employment or in furtherance of his master's business.

Thus, the master was held not liable for injury to child permitted by the driver to ride upon a wagon contrary to instructions. Scott v. Peabody Coal Co. 153 Ill. App. 103; Schulwitz v. Delta Lumber Co. 126 Mich. 559, 85 N. W. 1075; Mahler v. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

his wagon, and therefore if no express authority has been given him, his master is not liable for the death of a boy invited to ride and killed by the running away of the team.

Same — dangerous instrumentality — mule team.

2. A team of mules and wagon is not such a dangerous instrumentality as to render their owner liable for injury through the running away of the team, to a boy whom the driver without authority invited to ride.

(December 13, 1911.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Mecklenburg County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Stott, 129 Mich. 614, 89 N. W. 340, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 264.

So, the master was held not liable for injury to child invited (Driscoll v. Scanlon, 165 Mass. 348, 52 Am. St. Rep. 523, 43 N. E. 100, or permitted (Foster-Herbert Cut Stone Co. v. Pugh, 115 Tenn. 688, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 804, 112 Am. St. Rep. 881, 91 S. W. 199, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 553), to ride upon a wagon by the driver without authority, even though he apparently had received no instructions in that regard.

But where a driver permitted a boy to ride on a wagon in return for watching the horses, and after telling him to mount the step, drove rapidly over the stones, whereby the boy was jolted off and injured, it was held in Nudelman v. Borden's Condensed Milk Co. 77 Misc. 103, 136 N. Y. Supp. 49, that whatever service the plaintiff had been called upon to render having been completed before he went upon the wagon, he was not therefore, at the time, a fellow servant, but a licensee, and entitled to recover for injuries caused by the negligence of the driver.

In Marquis v. Robidoux, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 19 C. S. 361, as cited in Labatt's Master & Servant, 2d ed. vol. 6, p. 7617, a boy ten years old, after having been ejected, with other boys, from defendant's delivery wagon, secretly re-entered the wagon without the driver's knowledge, and, after having been observed by him, was tacitly permitted to remain because he was unwilling to leave him in the public road far from his father's home. The boy was injured by a collision between the wagon and a railroad train without any negligence on the part of the driver. It was held that the defendant was not liable for this injury, as the driver was not within the scope of his duties in permitting the boy to remain in the wagon.

In Lygo v. Newbold, 9 Exch. 302, 23 L. J. Exch. N. S. 108, 2 C. L. R. 449, 2 Week.

Messrs. Burwell & Cansler, for appellant:

It was the defendant's duty to protect plaintiff from danger by removing him from the wagon, and its failure to do so constitutes actionable negligence.

Messrs. A. G. Mangum and Osborne, Lucas, & Cocke for appellee.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's intestate, a boy ten years old, was killed by the running away of a team of mules belonging to the defendant, Mayes Manufacturing Company, and in charge of one of its servants. The evidence offered by the plaintiff shows that the team was being driven by a negro boy seventeen years old, and was at the time pulling a wagon partially loaded with lumber, which was being moved for the defendant. After the lumber was loaded, the plaintiff's intestate and two other small boys climbed on the wagon. There was also on the wagon with the driver another negro boy, eighteen or nineteen years old. When the wagon was approaching a hill on a street in the village of Mayesworth, and just before starting up the hill, the negro driver made two of the white boys on the wagon get off, but let the Dover boy, plaintiff's intestate, remain on the wagon, and permitted him to drive the mules; and while the boy was driving, the negro boy stood up behind him and whipped the mules, so that they trotted up the hill, and he continued to whip them until they passed over the top of the hill and out of sight of the witness. Another witness for the plaintiff testified that when he saw the mules they were running down the hill on the opposite side; that one of the negro boys had the reins, and the Dover boy was sitting on the wagon in front of him; and that presently the negro boys jumped or fell from the wagon.

This witness then gives the following description of the manner in which the Dover boy was killed: "They ran on about 20 feet, and the lumber got to jogging, and he got on his feet in some way and leaned over, and the lumber carried him over, and as he went over the hind wheel struck him right across the head." There was evidence that the mules had run away several times before this accident, the runaways being attributed by the witnesses to several causes. Once the lumber was "punching" the mules; and in another instance a table which was being placed on the wagon fell on the mules; and one witness said he had seen them run away and did not know the cause.

Augustus Lay, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that he was manager of the defendant's store, and had charge of the teams and farms; that these mules "would run off if a man is not there sufficient to hold them, if lumber jumps up and strikes them, or if a table or box strikes them;" that the boys in the village were in the habit of riding

Rep. 158, the plaintiff contracted with the defendant to carry goods for her in his cart. The defendant sent his servant with the cart, and the plaintiff, by the permission of the servant, but without the defendant's authority, rode in the cart with her goods. On the way the cart broke down, and the plaintiff was thrown out and severely injured. It was held that as the defendant had not contracted to carry the plaintiff, and as she had ridden in the cart without his authority, he was not liable for the personal injury she had sustained. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The above case, however, is not strictly within the scope of this note, as plaintiff was a person of full age.

Neither a coal wagon (Scott v. Peabody Coal Co. 153 Ill. App. 103) nor a stone wagon (Foster-Herbert Cut Stone Co. v. Pugh, 115 Tenn. 688, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 804, 112 Am. St. Rep. 881, 91 S. W. 199, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 553) is so attractive and dangerous to children that the owner must take special precautions to avoid injury to such as attempt to ride upon it.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the court overruled defendant's motion for judgment of nonsuit, and the defendant introduced a number of witnesses whose testimony was directly opposed to that of the plaintiff. At the conclusion of all the evidence, upon an intimation of the court that he would charge the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, the plaintiff submitted to a judgment of nonsuit. The correctness of this ruling is the sole question presented for our determination.

At the very threshold of this case, we are confronted with a state of facts which compels us to sustain the judgment of his honor, Judge Briggs. Construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the evidence establishes the fact his intestate was invited by the defendant's servant to ride on the wagon. It is not alleged, nor does it appear in evidence, that the servant had express authority to invite or permit boys to ride on the defendant's wagons. It was shown that the servant's duties were those of an ordinary driver of a team of mules; and that at the time of the accident he was engaged in the performance of such duties. We must hold upon this state of facts that he had no implied authority to permit boys to ride on his wagon; and that in doing so he acted beyond the scope of his employment. As authority for this conclusion, we have only to repeat well-settled principles in the law of master and servant. "In an action of tort, in the nature of an action on the case, the master is not responsible if the wrong done by the servant is done without his authority, and not for the purpose of executing his orders or doing his work. So that, if the servant, wholly for a purpose of his own, disregarding the object for which he is employed, and not intending by his act to execute it, does an injury to another not within the scope of his employment, the master is not liable." Howe v. Newmarch, 12 Allen, 49; Fleishner v. Durgin, 207 Mass. 435, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 79, 93 N. E. 801, 20 Ann. Cas. 1291. This doctrine, so well expressed by the supreme court of Massachusetts, has found ready acceptance and frequent application by our court. Roberts v. Southern R. Co. 143 N. C. 178, 8 L.R.A. The recent case of Marlowe v. Bland, 154 N. C. 140, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 69 S. E. 752, presents an interesting application of this principle. In that case a farm hand was directed to cut and pile certain cornstalks, and, without being directed to do so, he set fire to the pile, from which sparks were blown by the wind to defendant's woods, causing a fire and doing two or three hundred dollars of damage. Upon these facts, we sustained a judgment of nonsuit, and in the opinion of the court, written by Mr. Justice Hoke, will be found frequent quotations from the very thorough discussions of this question by Mr. Justice Walker in Jackson v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 139 N. C. 347, 70 L.R.A. 738, 51 S. E. 1015, and in Daniel v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 138 N. C. 517, 67 L.R.A. 455, 48 S. E. 810, 1 Ann. Cas. 718. In the latter case, the learned justice says: "It is not intended to assert that a principal cannot be held responsible for the wilful or malicious acts of the agent, when done within the scope of his authority, but that he is not liable for such acts, unless previously and expressly authorized or subsequently ratified, when they are done outside of the course of the agent's employment, and beyond the scope of his authority, as, when the agent steps aside from the duties assigned to him by the principal to gratify some personal animosity, or to give vent to some private feeling of his own (McManus v. Crickett, 1 East, 106); and, as is forcibly stated by Lord Kenyon in the case cited, quoting in part from Lord Holt: 'No master is chargeable with the acts of his servant but when he acts in the execution of the authority given him. Now, when a servant quits sight of the object for which he is employed, and, without having in view his master's orders, pursues that which his own malice suggests, he no longer acts in pursuance of the authority given him, and his master will not be answerable for his acts.'"

In his learned opinion in Stewart v. Cary Lumber Co. 140 N. C. 112, 59 S. E. 568, Mr. Justice Walker quotes this language from his opinion in the Daniel Case, and well says: "What better authority can we invoke in support of our position than the opinions of the court of King's bench as delivered by Lord Holt and Lord Kenyon?"

"The test of liability in all the cases," says Mr. Justice Hoke in Sawyer v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 142 N. C. 1, 115 Am. St. Rep. 716, 54 S. E. 793, 9 Ann. Cas. 440, "depends upon the question whether the injury was committed by the authority of the master, expressly conferred, or fairly implied from the nature of the employment and the duties incident to it."

This doctrine of respondet superior, as it is now established, is a just but a hard rule. The master exercises care in the selection of his servant, and retains in his service only such servants as are prudent and trustworthy, the servant, in the prosecution of the master's business, must of necessity pass beyond his sight and out of his control, and yet the law makes the master liable for the conduct of the servant. The application of this principle, without working the greatest injustice to every employer of a servant, is made possible only by the limitation, established by the courts, that when the servant does an act which is not within the scope of his employment, the master is not liable. "Beyond the scope of his employment, the servant is as much a stranger to the master as any third person, and his act in that case cannot be regarded as the act of the master. The rule as it is now established by the later judicial declarations should be strictly held within its defined limits. It is a rule capable of great abuse and much hardship, and the courts should guard against its extension or misapplication." Holler v. Ross, 68 N. J. L. 324, 59 L.R.A. 943, 96 Am. St. Rep. 546, 53 Atl. 472.

The authorities on this question from other courts are collected and fully discussed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Connor in Stewart v. Cary Lumber Co. 146 N. C. 85, 59 S. E. 545. The principal opinion in that case was not in conflict with the views expressed in the dissenting opinion upon the general principle of the liability of the master for the conduct of his servant when acting beyond the scope of his employment. The conflict arose upon the application of this principle to the wilful and wanton conduct for an engineer in blowing his whistle for the purpose of frightening plaintiff's horses. We said, in the opinion of the court: "This immunity from liability for tort referred to is not generally extended to railroads, whose servants are intrusted with such dangerous instrumentalities, and have thereby such unusual and extensive means of doing mischief." Mr. Justice Walker and Mr. Justice Connor entered vigorous dissents to this exception to the general rule, and maintained that the rule should be applied to railroads as well as to other employers, exempting them from liability for the wanton and malicious acts of their servants when beyond the scope of their employment.

We have a number of cases from other courts which directly sustain the position that the defendant's driver was not acting for his master when he permitted plaintiff's intestate to ride on the wagon. In the leading case of Bowler v. O'Connell, 162 Mass. 319, 27 L.R.A. 173, 44 Am. St. Rep. 359, 38 N. E. 498, the servant of the defendant, a boy thirteen years old, was leading a colt belonging to the defendant from the stables to defendant's yard, and invited the plaintiff, a boy between five and six years of age, to ride, and the plaintiff was kicked by the colt while going forward to accept the invitation. The court, denying defendant's liability, says: "The true test of liability on the part of the defendant is this: Was the invitation given in the course of doing their work, or for the purpose of accomplishing it? Was this act done for the purpose, or as a means of doing what Frank [the servant] was employed to do? If not, then in respect to that act he was not in the course of the defendants' business. An act done by a servant while engaged in his master's work, but not done as a means or for the purpose of performing that work, is not to be deemed the act of the master. And under this rule, in view of the testimony, the defendants were not responsible for the consequences of Frank's invitation to the plaintiff to ride upon the colt." This case was followed in Driscoll v. Scanlon, 165 Mass. 348, 52 Am. St. Rep. 523, 43 N. E. 100, in which it is held: "If a driver of a cart invites an infant to drive with him, either for pleasure or to take his place in driving while he sleeps, and the infant falls from the cart and is run over by it, the act is outside the driver's authority, and his master is not liable to the infant."

"The owner of a wagon in charge of a skilful driver is not liable for the death of a child fatally injured in attempting to alight from the wagon, after having climbed thereon at the invitation of the driver, who was neither expressly or by implication authorized to invite children to get upon a wagon, and whose act in so doing was in no sense within the scope of his employment, or in furtherance of his employer's business." Foster-Herbert Cut Stone Co. v. Pugh, 115 Tenn. 688, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 804, 112 Am. St. Rep. 881, 91 S. W. 199, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 553.

In Kiernan v. New Jersey Ice Co. 74 N. J. L. 175, 63 Atl. 998, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 431, it appeared from the testimony that the plaintiff, a boy of fifteen years, was invited by the defendant's servant, engaged at the time in driving an ice wagon, to take a piece of ice from the wagon, and while he was in the act of doing so he was assaulted by the servant. In denying plaintiff's right to recover the court says: "There is nothing to show that Lahey [the driver] had any express or implied authority from the defendant to permit anyone to take ice gratuitously from its wagon. Therefore, when Lahey gave such permission, he did it on his own responsibility, and not as a servant of the defendant."

The supreme court of Michigan in Schulwitz v. Delta Lumber Co. 126 Mich. 559, 85 N. W. 1075, had occasion to apply this principle to a state of facts very similar to that presented in this case, and held that "a master is not liable for the negligence of his servant in permitting a boy, contrary to the master's orders, to ride upon a wagon provided for the servant's use in hauling lumber; such act not being within the scope of the servant's employment." Mahler v. Scott, 129 Mich. 614, 89 N. W. 340; 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 264; Corrigan v. Hunter, 139 Ky. 315, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 187, 122 S. W. 131, 130 S. W. 798; Sweedon v. Atkinson Improv. Co. 93 Ark. 397, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 124, 125 S. W. 439.

We cannot hold that a team of mules and wagon is a "dangerous instrumentality," and that the defendant should be made liable for the death of plaintiff's intestate, without regard to whether the servant was acting beyond the scope of his employment. Pollock, Torts, 480. But if we should so hold, it would not change our decision, because the character of the mules was not the cause of the death of plaintiff's intestate. The accident was the result of the conduct of the defendant's servant, for which the defendant is not liable. Dougherty v. Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co. 137 Iowa, 257, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 590, 126 Am. St. Rep. 282, 114 N. W. 902.

Same — conflicting state and Federal regulations — state demurrage law.

2. Congress has so taken possession of the subject of the delivery, when called for, of railroad cars to be used in interstate traffic, by the provisions of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. at L. 584, chap. 3591), imposing a specific duty upon railway carriers to furnish cars for such traffic upon reasonable request, and giving remedies for violations of that duty, as to invalidate, when applied to cars demanded for interstate transportation, the provisions of Minn. Laws 1907, chap. 23, requiring railway companies to furnish freight cars on demand, under penalty for each day's delay not due to certain excepted causes.

(January 6, 1913.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Minnesota to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Rock County imposing a statutory penalty upon defendant for its failure to furnish freight cars on demand to be used in interstate traffic. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice White:

A statute passed by the legislature of the state of Minnesota, and known as the Minnesota reciprocal demurrage law, became effective on July 1, 1907. Laws of Minnesota, 1907, chap. 23.

The law, among other things, made it the duty of a railway company subject to its provisions, on demand by a shipper, to furnish cars for transportation of freight, at terminal points on its line of road in Minnesota, within forty-eight hours, and at intermediate points within seventy-two hours, after such demand, Sundays and legal holidays excepted. For each day's delay in furnishing cars when so demanded—except when prevented by strikes, public calamities, accident, or any cause not within the power of the railroad to prevent—the defaulting company was made liable to pay to the shipper $1 per car, together with the damages sustained and a reasonable attorney's fee.

Alleging that, in respect of delays in the deliveries to it of fourteen freight cars, pursuant to eight applications made for such cars between September 19, 1907, and October 22, 1907, the 1st section of the act in question had been violated, the Hardwick Farmers Elevator Company, defendant in error here, commenced this action in a district court of Minnesota to recover from the railway company, plaintiff in error here, penalties aggregating $218 and an attorney's fee of $50, together with the costs and disbursements of the action. As a defense, the railway company set up that the cars in question were demanded for the purpose of interstate traffic, and that the delays complained of were occasioned solely by an unusual and unprecedented congestion of traffic and a consequent scarcity of cars, arising from their use in moving traffic and commerce between the states, and that such delays therefore arose from causes not within the control and power of the company. It was also claimed that if the statute in question embraced interstate commerce, and was applied to the requisitions for cars referred to in the complaint, it would be repugnant to the commerce clause and to the due process and equal protection clauses of the Constitution of the United States. The action was tried to a jury. The trial judge refused to give instructions asked for by the railway company, embodying the constitutional objections made in its answer. A verdict was returned for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, including an attorney's fee; and a judgment entered on the verdict was affirmed by the supreme court of the state. 110 Minn. 25, 124 N. W. 819, 19 Ann. Cas. 1088.

Messrs. McNeil V. Seymour, Edward C. Stringer, and Edward S. Stringer, for plaintiff in error:

The Minnesota reciprocal demurrage law is in violation of the laws of Congress and of the Constitution of the United States, —especially the so-called "commerce clause."

Mason v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 12 Inters. Com. Rep. 61; Richmond Elevator

Co. v. Pere Marquette R. Co. 10 Inters. Com. Rep. 629.

Mr. Chief Justice White, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:

The argument at bar has been primarily concerned with the question of the validity of the Minnesota statute, considered as having been enacted in the exercise of a power assumed to exist to legislate reasonably in the absence of action by Congress on the subject of the delivery when called for, of cars to be used in interstate traffic. Thus, counsel for the defendant in error urges the correctness of the action of the supreme court of Minnesota in sustaining the statute, upon the hypothesis that Congress had not legislated on the subject, and that the act was a reasonable exertion of the power of the state. On the contrary, on behalf of the railroad company it is insisted that even upon the assumption that the state had power to deal with the subject for which the statute provides, in the absence of legislation by Congress, the enactment is nevertheless void, since it but expresses a policy which by penalization, fines, and forfeitures will substitute for a free and unrestrained flow of commerce a service favoring a particular locality and shippers within the confines of one state, to the disadvantage of others. We are not, however, called upon to test the merits of these conflicting contentions, since we are of opinion that by the act of June 29, 1906, known as the Hepburn act (34 Stat. at L. 584, chap. 3591, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1288), amendatory of the act to regulate commerce, Congress has legislated concerning the deliveries of cars in interstate commerce by carriers subject to the act.

In the original act [24 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 104, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1284] to regulate commerce the term "transportation" was declared to embrace all instrumentalities of shipment or carriage. By the Hepburn act it was declared that the term "transportation" (italics ours)—

"shall include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported; and it shall be the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of this act to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and to establish through routes 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The purpose of Congress to specifically impose a duty upon a carrier in respect to the furnishing of cars for interstate traffic is, of course, by these provisions clearly declared. That Congress was specially concerning itself with that subject is further shown by a proviso inserted to supplement § 1 of the original act, imposing the duty under certain circumstances to furnish switch connections for interstate traffic, whereby it is specifically declared that the common carrier making such connections "shall furnish cars for the movement of such traffic to the best of its ability, without discrimination in favor of or against any such shipper." Not only is there then a specific duty imposed to furnish cars for interstate traffic upon reasonable request therefor, but other applicable sections of the act to regulate commerce give remedies for the violation of that duty. Thus, by § 8 it is provided "that in case any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act . . . shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, such common carrier shall be liable to the person or persons injured thereby for the full amount of damages sustained in consequence of any such violation of the provisions of this act, together with a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court in every case of recovery, which attorney's fee shall be taxed and collected as part of the costs in the case." Further, by § 9 an election is given to either make complaint to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to bring, in a designated court, an action for the recovery of damages; and by § 10 it is made a criminal offense for an employee of a corporation carrier to "wilfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done."

As legislation concerning the delivery of cars for the carriage of interstate traffic was clearly a matter of interstate commerce regulation, even if such subject was embraced within that class of powers concerning which the state had a right to exert its authority in the absence of legislation by Congress, it must follow, in consequence of the action of Congress to which we have referred, that the power of the state over the subject-matter ceased to exist from the moment that Congress exerted its paramount and all-embracing authority over the subject. We say this because the elementary and long-settled doctrine is that there can be no divided authority over interstate commerce, and that the regulations of Congress on that subject are supreme. It results, therefore, that in a case where, from the particular nature of certain subjects, the state may exert authority until Congress acts, under the assumption that Congress, by inaction, has tacitly authorized it to do so, action by Congress destroys the possibility of such assumption, since such action, when exerted, covers the whole field, and renders the state impotent to deal with a subject over which it had no inherent, but only permissive, power. Southern R. Co. v. Reid, 222 U. S. 424, 56 L. ed. 257, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Minnesota must therefore be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

A mortgage upon a sugar refinery, the land upon which it stood, "and also all the machinery and effects" therein, does not include sugar upon the premises, where it appears that at the same time the mortgagor also gave another mortgage upon the machinery, particularly describing it, and he was permitted to remain in possession and continue his business. Thurber v. Minturn, 18 N. Y. Week. Rep. 25, reversing 62 How. Pr. 27.

A chattel mortgage on the "fixtures, furniture, and appliances used in and about the carrying on of a first-class retail grocery store," does not cover the horses, harness, and wagons used by the mortgagor for delivering goods sold to customers. Van Patten v. Leonard, 55 Iowa, 520, 8 N. W. 334.

A chattel mortgage upon the stock and fixtures of a country store covers an iron safe, the show cases, platform scales, trucks, copying presses, and chandeliers. McCall v. Walter, 71 Ga. 287.

But a chattel mortgage upon "goods in the store" will not cover an iron safe kept in the store for private use. Curtis v. Phillips, 5 Mich. 112. The court said that while the term "goods," when used in contradistinction to real estate, would doubtless include all kinds of movable personal property, it cannot be supposed to have that extent of meaning in the chattel mortgage; that "the question here is one of intent; and we think it quite clear that when a merchant speaks of the goods in his store, he must generally be understood to have reference only to the merchandise and commodities kept on hand for the purposes of sale, unless there be some peculiar reason, which does not appear in this case, to give the term a broader signification. This certainly is the popular sense of the term in this country, when we speak of a merchant's goods in his store."

Whitting, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of replevin brought in justice court, and seeking to recover the possession of one certain roll-top desk. Plaintiff claims to be the owner under and by virtue of a purchase upon foreclosure of a chattel mortgage, which covered "that certain elevator, together with the scales, bins, machinery, and other appurtenances thereunto belonging, located. . . ."

Defendant claims to be the owner by purchase from the mortgagor, and the evidence reveals the fact that, whether the owner or not, he was, at the time action was brought, holding under possession received by delivery of the property to him by the mortgagor. Judgments in justice court and upon a new trial in circuit court were in favor of the defendant. This appeal is from the latter judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

papers, and money of the establishment, is an "implement" within the meaning of a statute securing title of a mortgagee notwithstanding the retention of possession by the mortgagor "of any manufacturing or mechanical establishment, together with the machinery, engines, or implements used therein." Talcott v. Meigs, 64 Conn. 55, 29 Atl. 131.

A chattel mortgage on "all the fixtures" contained in a storeroom is broad enough to cover show cases, counters, and wall cases. Myers v. Snyder, 96 Iowa, 107, 64 N. W. 771.

A chattel mortgage on the furniture of a jewelry store covers the implements and instruments used in carrying on the business. Brody v. Chittenden, 106 Iowa, 524, 76 N. W. 1009.

The court in the above case quoted with approval from the case of Fore v. Hibbard, 63 Ala. 412, wherein it is said, in construing a mortgage of a drug store, furniture and fixtures: "The articles, utensils [and] implements . . . used in a drug or other store, as the furniture thereof, differ in kinds according to the purposes which they are intended to subserve; yet being put and employed in their several places, as the equipment thereof, for ornament, or to promote comfort, or to facilitate the business therein done, and being kept, or intended to be kept, for those or some or one of those purposes, they pertain to such places respectively, and collectively constitute the 'furniture' thereof."

The appellant has assigned numerous errors based upon the rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence, and upon certain instructions given the jury. Appellant has no right to this property unless he acquired it by the purchase on foreclosure. There is no claim that the desk in question was sold or offered for sale separate from the elevator. There was no evidence received or offered showing that, upon the foreclosure, there was any representation or claim that the mortgage covered the desk, or showing any fact that would estop either the mortgagor or respondent from claiming that title to the desk did not pass under the foreclosure. There was no evidence offered, other than the mortgage itself, that would tend to show in the slightest degree that the parties to the mortgage intended the same to cover the desk. There was, however, evidence received over appellant's objection showing that the parties did not intend the mortgage to cover such desk. The instructions complained of were based upon this evidence that was received over appellant's objection. There was no evidence offered or received which bore upon the question of whether or not the desk was an appurtenance to the elevator, except evidence of the fact that the mortgagor had it to use in its office in the elevator. It therefore follows that, no matter how erroneous the rulings or instructions of the court may have been, they were errors without prejudice, unless, by the use of the words "other appurtenances," and proof that the desk was used in the office of the elevator, it appeared that the desk was covered by the mortgage, as otherwise the court would have been bound to direct a verdict in favor of respondent if one had been requested.

The word "appurtenance" is commonly used in connection with real property, and its meaning, when used in a transfer of a building which chances to be real property, would be no different than when the said term is used in a transfer of a building which chances to be personal property; that is, all other things being the same, whatever would be appurtenant to a building which is real estate would also be appurtenant to the same building if, owing to the fact that such building stood upon land not owned by the owner thereof, it chanced to be personal property. The term kept near the hotel and used in connection with it, although there were four other similar boats which were specially mentioned in the mortgage. Veazie v. Somerby, 5 Allen, 280.

A mortgage of the entire assets of a business does not cover the good will of the business. Santa Fe Electric Co. v. Hitchcock, 9 N. M. 156, 50 Pac. 332.

A chattel mortgage clause in a lease of a certain lot, to secure payment of the rent that "all goods, wares, and merchandise, household furniture, fixtures, or other property which are or shall be placed in or on said premises by them, shall be liable, and this lease shall constitute a lien or mortgage on said property," does not embrace the dwelling house placed upon the lot. Kuschell v. Campau, 49 Mich. 34, 12 N. W. 899.

A mortgage upon the groceries in a country and village grocery store does not embrace shovels, pails, baskets, and the like, though such articles are usually kept in such stores. Fletcher v. Powers, 131 Mass. 333.

In Kern v. Wilson, 73 Iowa, 490, 35 N. W. 594, it was held that "drug stock," as used in a chattel mortgage, includes all articles ordinarily and usually kept therein at the place where the stock was situated, and that what such articles consisted of was a question for the jury to determine.

And it seems that a mortgage upon a stock of clothing and furnishing goods does not include boots and shoes. Clement v. Hartzell, 57 Kan. 482, 46 Pac. 961.

"appurtenance" is commonly confined in law to those purely incorporeal hereditaments that are commonly annexed to lands or to houses, and, strictly speaking, anything corporeal cannot properly become an "appurtenance." The use of the term "appurtenance" as a part of the description in a transfer is usually mere surplusage, as anything which, in the true and strict sense of the word "appurtenance," would be held to be appurtenant to the principal thing sold, would pass under a transfer merely describing the principal thing.

But, as was well said in the case of Frey v. Drahos, 6 Neb. 1, 29 Am. Rep. 353: "It is, however, doubtless true that the word is frequently used in a more enlarged and comprehensive sense, and when it can be gathered from all the attendant circumstances that it was so understood and used by the parties, a corresponding effect should be given to it in the interpretation of a contract." Thus, it has been held that, under the term "appurtenance," corporeal articles of personal property passed under conveyances of land or buildings. But it is not all property situate upon land or within buildings that will pass as an "appurtenance" to such land or building; it must still be a thing which in its nature agrees with the use to which the building is put; in other words, it must agree in its nature with the thing whereunto it is appurtenant. Thus, in the case of a grain elevator, those tools and machinery therein contained and used, which from their nature are proper and convenient to be used in connection with the building in the handling of grain in said elevator, might in a proper case be held to be "appurtenant" to such building; it could not, however, be held to cover an article of personal property having nothing to do with the handling of grain,—the purpose for which the building was constructed. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 520; 3 Cyc. 585; Jones, Chat. Mortg. 5th ed. § 136; Ottumwa Woolen Mill Co. v. Hawley, 44 Iowa, 57, 24 Am. Rep. 720; Frey v. Drahos, 6 Neb. 1, 29 Am. Rep. 355; Riddle v. Littlefield, 53 N. H. 503, 16 Am. Rep. 388. It is therefore clear that the term "appurtenance" did not cover the roll-top desk.

Appellant must recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title. If he procured no title or right of possession by virtue of the purchase on the foreclosure, then, as against the respondent, to whom possession was delivered by the elevator corporation, appellant could have no rights; and this regardless of whether or not the respondent was the owner of the property.

Appellant has urged that, for purposes of foreclosure, the mortgagor allowed the desk to be turned over to the mortgagee along with the elevator, and that this delivery of possession cured any defect in description. There was no evidence to support any such contention. From its nature the elevator was incapable of seizure and removal by the sheriff. He did not remove the desk therefrom. The keys of the elevator were held by respondent for several days after the sale. The fact that the desk was allowed to remain in the building, and was therein at time of sale, did not cause it to pass under the foreclosure any more than would wheat or other grain therein have passed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

HARRISON B. SMITH

v.

LULA D. BOYER, Appt.

(— W. Va. —, 78 S. E. 787.)

Vendor and purchaser — tax title — acquisition by vendee.

A vendee in possession cannot thereafter acquire a tax title to the land and claim thereunder adversely to his vendor.

(June 24, 1913.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kanawha County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. S. Laidley, for appellant:

After a tax title has matured in the hands of a stranger, even a tenant in common may purchase and hold adversely to his former cotenants.

Note. — Right of vendee to acquire tax title adversely to vendor.

A vendee in possession cannot acquire a tax title as against his vendor.

This principle has frequently been held where the tax title was founded on taxes subsequent to the contract. Johnston v. Smith, 70 Ala. 108; Fitzgerald v. Rood, 129 Mich. 345, 88 N. W. 879; Eaton v. Tallmadge, 22 Wis. 526.

Williams, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

Harrison B. Smith, grantor, sues Lulu D. Boyer, grantee, to enforce a vendor's lien reserved in a deed to her for a lot on Brooks street, in the city of Charleston. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant has appealed.

The court sustained plaintiff's exceptions to defendant's answer and struck it out, and this is assigned as error. Plaintiff conveyed to defendant in April, 1904, by deed with covenant of general warranty. The answer avers that M. F. Clarke was the owner of the lot in 1902, and in February, 1903, sold it to M. D. Farley; that Farley sold and conveyed it to Harrison B. Smith in May, 1903; that in that year it was returned delinquent in the name of M. F. Clarke for nonpayment of taxes of 1902, and sold in February, 1904, and purchased by Wm. Shoemaker, who, in April, 1905, obtained a tax deed, and then conveyed the sequent taxes came due before the vendee's possession began or not. Pool v. Ellis, 64 Misc. 555, 1 So. 725.

The same rule applies as to a tax title founded on taxes due at the time of the contract. Baily v. Doolittle, 24 Ill. 577; Cowdry v. Cuthbert, 71 Iowa, 733, 29 N. W. 798; Curran v. Banks, 123 Mich. 594, 82 N. W. 247; SMITH v. BOYER; and Eaton v. Tallmadge, 22 Wis. 526.

Thus, one contracting to pay a certain sum for land and all future taxes may not, as against his vendor, acquire a tax title founded on taxes prior to the contract, as he will be considered as buying it for his vendor. Baily v. Doolittle, 24 Ill. 577; Cowdry v. Cuthbert, 71 Iowa, 733, 29 N. W. 798; see also Simons v. Rood, 129 Mich. 345, 88 N. W. 879. (There seems some doubt whether in the Baily Case the vendee's possession began before buying the tax title.)

Similarly in Eaton v. Tallmadge, 22 Wis. 526, where one sold land with warranty, taking back a mortgage without warranty, and he foreclosed and bought in the property, it was held that he took a tax title bought in by the mortgagor before the foreclosure, founded on taxes due before the original sale and mortgage.

A fortiori a vendee under an executory contract of sale which requires him to pay the taxes cannot acquire a tax title adverse to the vendor. Lamborn v. Dickinson County, 97 U. S. 181, 24 L. ed. 926; Oliver v. Crosswell, 42 Ill. 41 (obiter); Haskell v. Putnam, 42 Me. 244 (here vendee was in possession); Stinson v. Richardson, 48 Iowa, 541 (vendee in possession); Finch v. Noble, 49 Wash. 578, 126 Am. St. Rep. 880, 96 Pac. 3 (vendee in possession).

The same is true of the vendee's tenant. Bertram v. Cook, 32 Mich. 518.

But a verbal executory contract of sale, void under the statute of frauds, does not estop the purchase of a tax title by the vendee. Ball v. Harpham, 140 Mich. 661, 104 N. W. 353, where, however, the decision was for the vendor on other grounds.

In Petty v. Mays, 19 Fla. 652, where the contract was oral, it was said that the person in possession was in either as purchaser or as tenant, and in either case his purchase of the tax title was no more than paying the taxes.

For the general subject of the right of grantee in possession to question right of grantor to collect purchase money see the note to Lafferty v. Evans, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 363.

For injunction against collection of purchase money where the title to land is defective, see the note to Harvey v. Ryan, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 445.

lot to R. S. Spilman, the partner of plaintiff; that it was returned delinquent, in the name of Farley, for the nonpayment of the taxes of 1903, and sold in December, 1904, and purchased by defendant; and that she received a tax deed in June, 1908.

Defendant contends that plaintiff's failure to discharge the taxes assessed on the land in the name of the former owner gave her the right to buy at the tax sale to protect her title, and that by her tax deed she acquired an adverse title which defeats plaintiff's lien. This position is untenable. Defendant took possession under her deed from plaintiff, and in contemplation of law has not been even constructively ousted. Smith's breach of his covenant of warranty in failing to pay off the pre-existing taxes entitled defendant to damages, but it did not give her the right to set up an after-acquired tax title to defeat his suit. She does not seek to recoup damages, as she might have done, but insists that the Shoemaker tax title operates to extinguish both her title and Smith's lien, and that, by the subsequent tax sale and deed, she acquired an adverse title to the lot. After her purchase from Smith, defendant had ten months in which she could have redeemed from Shoemaker. Her answer does not explain why she did not do so. There was no outstanding title, at the time she purchased from Smith, which she was compelled to buy in for her protection. It is a well-settled rule that if one, having the right of redemption, buys at a tax sale, his purchase amounts only to a payment of the taxes. 1 Blackwell, Tax Titles, § 566; Calihan v. Russell, 66 W. Va. 524, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1176, 66 S. E. 695.

"A vendee cannot acquire a title adverse to his vendor by the purchase of the land at a tax sale." Lamborn v. Dickinson County, 97 U. S. 181, 24 L. ed. 926. It is a rule of universal application that neither party to a mortgage can destroy the right of the other by buying the property at a tax sale, if he objects thereto. The relation of the parties to this suit is essentially the same in equity as mortgagor and mortgagee, Mrs. Boyer being regarded as the mortgagor in possession of the land. If there had not been a second tax sale, and Mrs. Boyer, instead of Spilman, had acquired the tax title from Shoemaker, she could recoup damages to the extent of her reasonable expenses in acquiring the title; but she would not be permitted to claim under it adversely to plaintiff. Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. p. 545; Bush v. Marshall, 6 How. 284, 12 L. ed. 440.

The same rule is applicable in this suit as would be applied if Mrs. Boyer had paid the full purchase price, and had brought an action for breach of plaintiff's covenant. It is well settled that, in such case, her recovery would be limited to the amount of her expenses in buying in the adverse title. Leffingwell v. Elliott, 8 Pick. 455, 19 Am. Dec. 343; Roller v. Effinger, 88 Va. 641, 14 S. E. 337; Sanders v. Wagner, 32 N. J. Eq. 506; Cowdry v. Cuthbert, 71 Iowa, 733, 29 N. W. 798. The case last cited is very similar to the present one, and stronger, if any odds, in favor of the vendee, because he had notified his vendor to pay the taxes and he failed to do so. Cuthbert, the vendee, did not buy at the tax sale, but bought from the tax purchaser after he had received his tax deed. In a suit by Cowdry, the vendor, it was held that Cuthbert, the vendee, was entitled to have the amount paid for the tax title treated as a payment on his bond to Cowdry, but that he could not claim adversely to him under the tax title. The same question was decided in Curran v. Banks, 123 Mich. 594, 82 N. W. 247; in Simons v. Rood, 129 Mich. 345, 88 N. W. 879; and in Eaton v. Tallmadge, 22 Wis. 528.

Defendant's obligation as plaintiff's vendee is not affected by her purchase at a subsequent tax sale. The tax title which she acquired, being for taxes assessed in the name of a subsequent owner of the lot, operates to defeat the Shoemaker title.

The contention of defendant's counsel that the Shoemaker tax title extinguished her title, and also the lien of plaintiff, and that by her subsequent tax deed defendant acquired the land discharged of the lien, and is therefore under no obligation to make further payment, is not supported by the law. The lien of a vendor cannot be thus defeated.

The court sustained plaintiff's exceptions to defendant's answer on 21st of May, 1910, and allowed ten days in which to file further answer. On June 6th an order was entered filing further answer. But the final decree, made on June 10, 1910, recites that the order of June 6th was improvidently entered, and set it aside, and brought the cause on to be heard upon bill and exhibits, without further pleading. This action of the court is complained of, but it does not appear why it should be considered as error. The court has control over all interlocutory orders, even after the adjournment of the term at which they were entered, and, until adjournment of the term, has control also of its final orders and decrees. We must assume that the court properly set aside the order. Error must affirmatively appear. Only one answer appears in the record, and its averments constitute no defense to plaintiff's suit. It was not error, therefore, to exclude it.

Defendant did not ask to have the money expended by her in acquiring the tax title credited on plaintiff's lien, and it was not error to decree the full amount claimed by plaintiff.

The decree is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

SIGMON GREEN et al., Appts.,

v.

NEIL GUNSTEN, Respnt.

(— Wis. —, 142 N. W. 261.)

Bills and notes — intoxicated maker — enforcement by bona fide holders.

1. A note signed by a maker when so in-

Note. — Intoxication as defense to bill or note in hands of bona fide holder.

Generally, as to the validity of contracts made with intoxicated persons, see notes to Wright v. Waller, 54 L.R.A. 440, and Miller v. Sterringer, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 596.

As to the rights of a bona fide holder of the promissory note of an insane person, see note to Hosler v. Beard, 35 L.R.A. 161.

As to the liability of one whose signature to commercial paper is secured by trick or fraud, see note to Yakima Valley Bank v. McAllister, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1075.

The question with which this note is concerned necessarily starts with the assumption that the drunkenness of the maker must have so far incapacitated him as to render the note invalid as between the maker and the payee. If, in any given case, it be found that the maker, though somewhat intoxicated, nevertheless was so sufficiently in possession of his faculties as to be able to transact business, it will follow, of course, that his drunkenness is not a defense as against any holder of the note, whether a bona fide indorsee or not; and the question whether such an indorsee stands in a better position than the payee will not arise.

Unfortunately for the clarity of the subject, the case of one who signs a note while so intoxicated as to be more or less incapacitated for business presents a double aspect, according to the degree of incapacity which exists. In the lesser degree of intoxication, he retains his capacity to contract, but is liable to be imposed upon, so that a contract made by him may be voidable by reason of the fraud of the other party. Here his intoxication is simply a circumstance tending to show that he was imposed upon; and as in other cases where a note has been obtained by fraud, it will be valid in the hands of a bona fide holder. But where his intoxication is total, so that the minds of the parties do not meet, their contracts are void, and not merely voidable, and it would seem that a bona fide indorsee of a note obtained under such circumstances will take it with this inherent vice; and this is the holding in GREEN v. GUNSTEN. The difference of opinion disclosed in the decisions on the subject is partly, though not entirely, due to their regarding the contracts of even totally intoxicated persons as merely voidable, and so applying in the latter situation a doctrine which has reference to the former situation.

Same — negligence — effect.

2. One who signs a note when so intoxicated as to be incapable of comprehending the nature of his act is not prevented from setting up his intoxication as a defense to the note, on the ground that he did not act with ordinary care.

will take it with this inherent vice; and this is the holding in GREEN v. GUNSTEN. The difference of opinion disclosed in the decisions on the subject is partly, though not entirely, due to their regarding the contracts of even totally intoxicated persons as merely voidable, and so applying in the latter situation a doctrine which has reference to the former situation.

The decision in GREEN v. GUNSTEN accords with the position taken in Caulkins v. Fry, 35 Conn. 170, in which it was held that when intoxication is relied upon by the maker of a note as a defense in an action by a bona fide holder, he must show that he was utterly deprived of the use of his reason and understanding; and that such a defense was not made out where it appeared that he was capable of writing his name and, so far as appears, in a manner not to excite suspicion, and that his mind was in such a condition that he remembered the next morning that he had signed the note and what it was given for. The court said: "In 1 Parsons on Bills & Notes, 151, it is stated thus: 'Drunkenness is a species of insanity; but the law is not quite clear respecting this disability. Perhaps it stands thus: one cannot defend by proving his drunkenness, unless he can show that the drunkenness was known to the payee and taken advantage of by him; or that it was complete and suspended all use of the mind at the time.' See also 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 231-233, and cases there cited. Such is the law generally. In its application, however, to negotiable paper, an important distinction is to be observed between actions brought by the payee, and actions brought by an indorsee. As against the payee, the maker may avail himself of any defense which shows that the paper was either void or voidable, while as against a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, he can only defend by showing that the paper was void. In the latter case he is limited to those defenses which go to the essence of the contract, and, either by common law or by statute, annul and avoid the contract, or which interfere with

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Portage County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

Statement by Vinje, J.:

Action on a promissory note, dated February, 16, 1911, for $300, payable six months after date, alleged to have been executed and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiffs. The defendant Gunsten answered denying that he signed the note, and averred that his signature to the same was a forgery. He also set up the defense that, if he did sign the note, his signature there-to was procured by connivance and conspiracy between the plaintiffs and his comaker of the note, O. C. Loomis, and other persons acting for and on behalf of O. C. Loomis, by reason of which said O. C. Loomis and others, acting for and on behalf of him, encouraged and induced the defendant Gunsten to drink of intoxicating liquors in such large quantities that he became so intoxicated that he was deprived of his reason and understanding, and that, if he did sign his name to said note, it was done while in such condition, and was not done of his own free will and consent; that he received no consideration whatever for said signature; and that the note was used by his comaker, O. C. Loomis, to secure his obligations to the plaintiffs, incurred prior to the making of the note, and accepted by plaintiffs as security for such obligations.

The jury returned a verdict finding: (1) That the defendant Gunsten, on or about and prevent the indorsee from acquiring a legal title to the paper. Upon the same principle, complete incapacity of the maker, which shows that the paper is void, is a good defense as against a bona fide holder; while partial incapacity, which, in connection with other circumstances, may show that the paper is voidable, but does not render it absolutely void, is only available as against the payee. 1 Parsons, Bills & Notes, 275."

And see also Berkley v. Cannon, 4 Rich. L. 136, an action brought by the payee against the maker of the note, in which it was held that where the maker was at the time of the execution too drunk to know what he was doing, the note was wholly void, and therefore incapable of ratification by his subsequent conduct.

The leading case in support of the view that intoxication of the maker of a note is no defense as against a bona fide holder is State Bank v. McCoy, 69 Pa. 204, 8 Am. Rep. 246, in which it was found by the jury that the defendant received no consideration for the note, and that he was so intoxicated at the time he signed it as to be wholly unconscious of what he was doing. The court, after stating that the total drunkenness of the maker when he executed the note, if known to the payee, rendered it void as to the latter, went on to say: "But if the drunkenness of the maker, when known to the payee and taken advantage of by him, or when so complete as to suspend the use of the reason and understanding, renders the note void in the hands of the payee, the question recurs whether it avoids it in the hands of an indorsee for value without notice of the maker's condition when he gave the note, and of the fraudulent circumstances under which it was obtained? There is no case which so decides. But it is contended that drunkenness is a species of insanity, and therefore a contract made by one when in such a state of drunkenness as not to know what he was doing should, like the contract of an insane person, be regarded as absolutely void. But the contract of an insane man is not under all circumstances an absolute nullity. As was said in La Rue v. Gilkyson, 4 Pa. 375, 45 Am. Dec. 700, an insane man, like an infant, is liable on his executed contract for necessities; and it was more than intimated in Beals v. See, 10 Pa. 56, 49 Am. Dec. 573, that he would be liable for merchandise innocently furnished to his order by a person unapprised of his infirmity. But if, as ruled by Lord Tenterden, Ch. J., at nisi prius, in Sentance v. Poole, 3 Car. & P. 1, the note of an insane person, or of one perfectly imbecile, which he has been induced to sign by fraud and imposition, is void in the hands of an innocent indorsee, it does not follow that a note given by a person in a state of intoxication is void in the hands of a holder for value without notice of the maker's condition when it was given. There is this difference between the cases. Insanity or total imbecility is a permanent state or condition of the mind, disabling one from taking care of himself. Drunkenness is a temporary disability, voluntarily produced. Insanity is a misfortune,—drunkenness is a vice. No man voluntarily does an act necessarily producing madness, in order that he may be insane. But men drink in order that they may get drunk. And when they thus temporarily deprive themselves of the use of their reason, and voluntarily expose themselves to fraud and imposition, the law may wisely refuse to treat them with the same tenderness that it does those unfortunate beings who are deprived of their understanding by some Providential dispensation; and it may properly hold them to a different measure of responsibility for the consequences of their acts. If a man voluntarily deprives himself of the use of his reason by strong drink, why should he not be responsible to an innocent party for the acts which he performs when in that condition? It seems to me that he ought, on the principle that where a loss must be borne by one of two innocent persons, it shall be borne by him who occasioned it. As between the contracting parties, where one is so drunk as not to know what he is doing, the contract

February 16, 1911, did sign and turn over to the defendant Loomis the promissory note sued upon in this action; and (2) that said Gunsten at the time of signing said note was so completely intoxicated that he was temporarily deprived of his reason and understanding. Upon such verdict, and on motion of defendant Gunsten, the court rendered judgment in his favor dismissing the action, with costs. From such judgment the plaintiffs appealed.

Messrs. Fisher, Hanna, & Cashin, for appellants:

The plaintiffs are bona fide holders for value of the note sued on.

Bowman v. Van Kuren, 29 Wis. 219, 9

is doubtless void, especially if the other is appraised of his condition, and, if not wilfully or culpably blind, he must know it. As was said by Parke, B., in the case already quoted: 'A person who takes an obligation from another under such circumstances is guilty of actual fraud.' [Gore v. Gibson, 13 Mees. & W. 626.] But if there is nothing, to give notice of the intoxication, or to put one upon inquiry, as where a contract is made by letter or message sent by post or telegraph, and is executed in good faith by the party receiving the order, if the other party should refuse to perform the contract on the ground that he was totally drunk when he sent the order or entered into the contract, it is clear that, on the principle already stated, the defense ought not to avail. Why, then, should the maker of a note be allowed to set up against an innocent holder the defense of drunkenness? But there is another and controlling reason for holding the maker liable to the indorsee in such case, founded on principles of public policy and the necessities of commerce. The exigencies of trade require that there should be no unnecessary impediments to the ready circulation and currency of negotiable paper, but that it should be left free to pass from hand to hand like bank notes, and perform the functions of money, untrammelled by any equities or defenses between the original parties. If, then, it should be held that the drunkenness of the maker avoids his note in the hands of the indorsee, it is obvious that such a rule would greatly clog or embarrass the circulation of commercial paper, for no man could safely take it without ascertaining the condition of the maker or drawer when it was given, although there might be nothing suspicious in its appearance or unusual in the character of the signature. It is evident that it would be a less evil to exclude the defense of drunkenness, though it might occasionally work individual hardship, than to clog the circulation of commercial paper, to the great inconvenience of the public, by admitting such a defense. If fraud and imposition in obtaining a note will not avoid it in the hands of an innocent indorsee,—because such a rule would render commercial paper less valuable and convenient as a medium of exchange,—why should the drunkenness of the maker? Why should drunkenness be a defense if there has been no fraud or imposition? And if there has, and this is the ground of the defense, why should it not avoid the note in the one case as well as the other?"

The doctrine of State Bank v. McCoy, 69 Pa. 204, 8 Am. Rep. 246, was approved in McSparran v. Neeley, 91 Pa. 18, where, however, the evidence did not make out the existence of a state of absolute incapacity.

A similar conclusion was reached in Smith v. Williamson, 8 Utah, 219, 30 Pac. 753, where it was said: "A person entering into a contract while temporarily deprived of his reason by intoxication may avoid or ratify it when he becomes sober. It is not absolutely void. If the paper is negotiable, it cannot be avoided in the hands of an indorsee in good faith for a valuable consideration; and if such paper is indorsed before it has become due, for a valuable consideration, such defense cannot avail against the assignee, without proving that he had notice of the defense before the indorsement, or notice of facts or circumstances sufficient to induce a reasonable man to inquire of the maker as to the defense. The note in question was negotiable. It may be said that a person who executes a proposed negotiable paper while deprived of reason by insanity may avoid it in the hands of an innocent indorsee, and that the same rule should apply when the person is deprived of reason by intoxication. The consideration upon which the rules stand are dissimilar. Insanity is involuntary, it is a disease, and is a more permanent state, and usually is not the result of the act of the person imposed upon; while drunkenness is voluntary, and is a temporary state, and is regarded as a vice,—the helpless condition of the drunkard is his own fault. It appears from the evidence in the record that the payee assigned the note before it became due, for a valuable consideration, to the appellants, Boyle v. Lybrand, 113 Wis. 79, 88 N. W. 904.

Complete intoxication of the maker of a note is not a defense to the note in the hands of a bona fide holder for value.

and there is no evidence to prove that the latter had notice of the defense urged, or that any fact was within their knowledge sufficient to put them upon inquiry. Other reasons support the rule that negotiable paper, cannot be avoided in the hands of innocent holders, because of intoxication. If the loss must fall upon one of two innocent persons, it should be borne by the one whose fault contributed to it, if the fault of either did. There are also considerations of public policy which contribute to support the rule. It is believed that the exigencies of business and the necessities of commerce demand that negotiable paper shall pass from hand to hand without unnecessary impediment."

The fact that defendant may have been intoxicated when plaintiff discounted certain notes for him in the regular course of business is no defense in an action to recover the amount of the notes, unless the plaintiff had knowledge of that fact. Pittsburg Nat. Bank v. Palmer, 22 Pittsb. L. J. 189.

In Abbeville Trading Co. v. Butler, 3 Ga. App. 138, 59 S. E. 450, where it was held that the fact that one has indorsed an obligation while intoxicated cannot affect the rights of a payee who had no knowledge that the indorser was drunk when he entered into the contract, and who had no hand in causing such intoxication, it was said that drunkenness of the maker would have been unavailable as a defense against a bona fide purchaser, citing as authority therefor the Pennsylvania decisions.

In Miller v. Finley, 26 Mich. 239, 12 Am. Rep. 306, where the evidence was conflicting as to the extent of the defendant's intoxication, but he admitted that he recollected the signing, it was said that while, of his story was true, the note would be voidable as against the payee, it would not be a nullity as to all persons; and that, there being nothing on the face of the paper to cast suspicion upon its character, it could be impeached in the hands of a holder for value only by evidence 46 L.R.A. that he took it under circumstances which rendered him guilty of bad faith.

An inference that the court in Benton v. Sikyta, 84 Neb. 808, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1057, 122 N. W. 61, entertained the view that intoxication would not be a defense as against a bona fide holder, is afforded by the statement that defense that at the time the maker signed the instrument, he was so intoxicated by the procurement of the payee's agent that he did not know or understand the character or consequences of his act, and that he had repudiated the note within a reasonable time after recovering his senses, would be legitimate as between the original parties, or one not a bona fide holder.

In Alloway v. Hutchison, 6 Terr. L. R. 425, an action by the indorsees of a promissory note against its maker in which the defense was set up that the maker was so drunk at the time of signing as not to know what he was doing, although it was held that, in the absence of evidence on the part of the plaintiffs that they were holders in due course, they could not recover, the court states that it was not necessary to decide whether under the findings the notes would be recoverable against the defendant, even assuming that the plaintiffs were innocent holders for value.

It may further be noted in this connection that it was held that a guaranty obtained by fraud from an intoxicated person, who is chargeable with negligence, may be enforced against him by an innocent party who has acted to his prejudice on the faith of the guaranty which was addressed to him. Page v. Krekey, 137 N. Y. 307, 21 L.R.A. 409, 33 Am. St. Rep. 731, 33 N. E. 311. The court said: "There can be no doubt that, as between the parties to this transaction, the instrument was void. It was also invalid in the hands of any person who received it with knowledge or notice of the circumstances under which the defendant's signature was obtained. party to be benefited, who, nevertheless, will not be permitted to reap the benefit of a fraud, though he was himself innocent. The case of Bedell v. Bedell, 37 Hun, 419, is an example of this class of cases. The decisions in these cases rest upon principles obviously just and reasonable. When the fraudulent act is not imputable to the person claiming the benefit of the instrument, upon the principle of agency, he is generally debarred from enforcing it, upon the ground of the fraudulent origin of the paper, and the fact that he has lost nothing upon the faith of it. Without examining all the cases cited by the learned counsel for the defendant, it may be assumed that in other jurisdictions the courts have held that in a case like this the instrument could not be enforced any more than if the signature of the defendant had been forged. That is the principle which is invoked in behalf of defendant to relieve him from all liability, but it has not received the sanction of the courts of this state. While it has been quite uniformly held here that an instrument procured by fraud, trick, or artifice or executed by a party in such a state of intoxication as to be incapable of consenting or contracting, is invalid as between the parties to the transaction, these facts do not always constitute a defense as against an innocent person who is himself free from any fraud or negligence, and who has advanced money or property to another upon the credit afforded by an instrument like this. But even in such a case the person who has signed the paper is not liable upon it unless it is found that he failed to observe proper care and caution, and was chargeable with negligence in attaching his signature. If he actually signed the paper, though procured to do it by fraud, and is chargeable with negligence, he is liable to an innocent party who acted to his prejudice upon the faith of the instrument. Such cases are not governed by the rules applicable to the bona fide holder of negotiable paper procured by fraud, but by the equitable rule that, where one of two innocent parties must suffer, he who has put it in the power of a third person to commit the fraud must sustain the loss. . . . If this instrument had been a negotiable promissory note, the defendant's liability to the plaintiff would depend upon the question of negligence, and there does not appear to be any sound reason for a different ruling in this case."

Vinje, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is admitted that defendant Gunsten was an accommodation maker of the note if it was executed under such circumstances as to constitute him a maker in any sense. Plaintiffs claim they were holders in due course, which claim the defendant Gunsten disputes. The trial court, in the disposition of the case, evidently treated plaintiffs as such holders, and we shall assume that they were. That raises the question whether or not total or complete drunkenness on the part of the accommodation maker of a note at the time of the execution and delivery thereof is a defense as against a holder in due course.

On the grounds of public policy and the necessities of commerce, some courts have held that complete drunkenness on the part of the maker of a note at the time of its execution and delivery is no defense against a holder in due course. State Bank v. McCoy, 69 Pa. 204, 8 Am. Rep. 246; McSparan v. Neeley, 91 Pa. 18; Smith v. Williamson, 8 Utah, 219, 30 Pac. 753. The basis for the rule is thus stated by Joyce, Defenses to Com. Paper, § 69: "The reasons underlying this rule are that, where a man has voluntarily put himself in such a condition, and a loss must fall on one of two innocent persons, it should fall on him who occasioned it. It is also founded on principles of public policy and the necessities of commerce. The circulation and currency of negotiable paper should not be unnecessarily impeded, and, if drunkenness of the maker were a defense to a note in the hands of an indorsee, it would clog and embarrass the circulation of commercial paper, and no man could safely take it without ascertaining the condition of the maker or drawer when it was given, though there be nothing unusual or suspicious about the appearance of the note." That this rule is founded, at least in part, upon substantial grounds of public policy, cannot be denied. Though it should be observed that drunkenness alone, without the fraud or fault of another, does not lead to the signing of notes. In every case, as in the case at bar, the drunken maker has been taken advantage of by a designing payee or third party, and it is not strictly correct to say that the fault is that of the drunken maker alone. Were that so, there would be more reason for applying the rule that, where loss must fall upon one of two innocent persons, it should fall on him who occasioned it. Nor can a holder in due course always rest upon the assumption that the maker of a note is competent to execute it. Insanity of the maker is a good defense against a bona fide holder, for the latter takes it charged with constructive notice of the legal disability of the maker. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 209, 210; Joyce, Defenses to Com. Paper, § 71.

It is no greater hardship to charge a holder in due course with constructive notice of the incapacity of the maker resulting from complete drunkenness than from insanity. It is deemed that a doctrine more in consonance with the spirit of our decisions is stated by Daniel as follows: "If the drunkenness were so complete as to suspend all rational thought, the better opinion is that any instrument signed by the party would be utterly void, even in the hands of a bona fide holder without notice, for, although it may have been the party's own fault that such an aberration of mind was produced, when produced, it suspended for the time being his capacity to consent, which is the first essential of a contract." 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 214; 1 Parsons, Bills & Notes, 161; Gore v. Gibson, 13 Mees. & W. 623, 14 L. J. Exch. N. S. 151, 9 Jur. 140. But the drunkenness must be so complete as to deprive the maker of the use of his faculties. Miller v. Finley, 26 Mich. 249, 12 Am. Rep. 306; Caulkins v. Fry, 35 Conn. 170. Intoxication merely to the extent that he cannot give the attention to it that a reasonably prudent man would be able to give is not sufficient. Wright v. Waller, 127 Ala. 557, 29 So. 57, 54 L.R.A. 440. See authorities cited in note as to degree of intoxication that will avoid a contract. The rule that complete drunkenness is available as a defense in a suit upon a contract has been clearly recognized by our own court. Bursinger v. Bank of Watertown, 67 Wis. 75, 58 Am. Rep. 848, 30 N. W. 290; Burnham v. Burnham, 119 Wis. 509, 100 Am. St. Rep. 895, 97 N. W. 176.

In Bursinger v. Bank of Watertown, supra, the contract under consideration was the assignment of an insurance policy, and the court said: "The evidence tended to show that, by reason of his intoxication, he was incapable of comprehending what he was doing at the time he executed said assignments, and was therefore within the well-established rule of law that a drunkard, when in a complete state of intoxication, so as not to know what he is doing, has no capacity to contract. 1 Benjamin, Sales (Am. ed. Corbin) 42; Gore v. Gibson, 13 Mees. & W. 623, 14 L. J. Exch. N. S. 151, 9 Jur. 140; Cooke v. Clayworth, 18 Ves. Jr. 12, 11 Revised Rep. 137; Story, Contr. 4th ed. §§ 44, 45, and cases cited in notes; Belcher v. Belcher, 10 Yerg. 121; French v. French, 8 Ohio, 214, 31 Am. Dec. 441; Jenners v. Howard, 6 Blackf. 240; Mitchell v. Kingman, 5 Pick. 431; Webster v. Woodford, 3 Day, 90; Seaver v. Phelps, 11 Pick. 304, 22 Am. Dec. 372; Rice v. Peet, 15 Johns. 503."

In Burnham v. Burnham, supra, the rule is stated thus: "A person addicted to the habitual and excessive use of intoxicating liquor is not incompetent to enter into contracts and convey property, unless it appears that actual intoxication dethroned his reason, or that his understanding was so impaired as to render him mentally unsound when the act was performed. Johnson v. Harmon, 94 U. S. 371, 24 L. ed. 271; Van Wyck v. Brasher, 81 N. Y. 260; Reinskopf v. Rogge, 37 Ind. 207."

The reason for the rule is that there can be no valid contract where there is no mind capable of contracting. That drunkenness may be so complete as to render a person utterly incapable of comprehending the nature of his acts, or that he is acting at all is a fact as sad as it is true. Drunkenness," says Tiedeman, "is, in legal contemplation, an aberration of mind similar in its effect upon the reasoning faculties as temporary insanity. Hence, we find that the legal effect of contracts made by one in a state of intoxication is affected in the same way by the intoxication of the contractor as they are by his insanity." Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 57.

If complete drunkenness, by which is meant drunkenness to such an extent as to wholly destroy for the time being the rational faculties of the mind, renders a note absolutely void as between maker and payee, then, under the provisions of our negotiable instrument law, Stat. 1911, it is void in the hands of a holder in due course.

Section 1676—25 provides: "The title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective within the meaning of this act, when he obtains the instrument or any signature thereto, by fraud, duress, or force or fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud, and the title of such person is absolutely void when such instrument or signature was so procured from a person who did not know the nature of the instrument, and could not have obtained such knowledge by the use of ordinary care."

And § 1676—27 reads: "A holder in due course holds the instrument free from any defect of title of prior parties, and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment of the instrument for the full amount thereof against all parties liable thereon, except as provided in §§ 1944 and 1945 of these statutes relating to insurance premiums, and also in cases where the title of the person negotiating such instrument is void under the provision of § 1676—25 of this act."

By the provisions of this law it will be seen that a holder in due course takes no title where the note was absolutely void in its inception, as where there was no maker capable of executing the instrument. This result follows for the obvious reason that no life, or validity can be given by transfer to that which is absolutely void. It is the same as if it had no existence at all. And it is but the expression of the rule embodied in the decisions of this court. Aukland v. Arnold, 131 Wis. 64, and cases cited on page 67, 111 N. W. 212.

Plaintiffs argue that the rule of ordinary care, as applied in negligence cases, obtains under the provisions of § 1676—27 of the negotiable instruments law. It is not necessary to decide the question in this case. The jury found that at the time Gunsten signed the note he was so completely intoxicated that he was temporarily deprived of his reason and understanding. Manifestly, while in such condition, the rule of ordinary care does not apply. He was incapable of exercising any care whatever. Nor can it be held that he should have exercised care not to get drunk, for, as before observed, the signing of notes is not the usual or probable result of drunkenness. It is otherwise as to a personal injury. A man may well reasonably anticipate that if he gets drunk and becomes unable to care for himself he may, without the fault of another, sustain bodily harm or even death itself. But a drunken man, if left alone and not taken advantage of by others, is not, as a mere result of the drunkenness, likely to sign notes or execute any other contracts. The law does not favor drunkenness; nor does it place in the hands of a drunkard any shield against his conscious or rational acts. It simply says that when, through drunkenness or any other means, a man is temporarily or permanently wholly incapacitated from exercising his rational faculties, then he shall not be liable upon what purports to be a contract entered into while in such state, because a mind bereft of reason or conscious rational action is incapable of consenting or contracting. In speaking of the early English doctrine holding that a man should not be allowed to stultify himself by alleging his own lunacy or imbecility, Daniel says: "Such a doctrine sounds more like the gibberish of a lunatic than like the decree of a humane and enlightened lawyer. The maxim of the civil law, Furius nullum negotium agere potest, qui non intelligit quid agit, expresses the sense of modern jurisprudence on the subject." 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 209. The same maxim applies equally well to a person in a state of complete intoxication as to an act or result that cannot be said to be reasonably anticipated from mere drunkenness.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

VIRGIA V. BARTON, Plff. in Certiorari,
v.

GEORGE E. SOUTHWICK.

(258 Ill. 515, 101 N. E. 928.)

Judgment — justice of the peace — physician's fee — bar to action for malpractice.

A judgment by a justice of the peace for a physician's fee is no bar to a subsequent action against him for malpractice in rendering the services for which the recovery was had, if the justice had no jurisdiction of an action for malpractice, and no defense was presented before him.

(Cooke, J., dissents.)

Note. — Recovery by physician as bar to action for malpractice.

This note supplements the earlier note on the same question, appended to Jordahl v. Berry, 45 L.R.A. 541. It is stated in that note that the New York cases hold generally that a recovery by a physician is a bar to the patient's action for malpractice, being regarded as in the nature of an estoppel and governed by the principles of res judicata; and that the New York cases also base their conclusion upon the ground that the contract between the physician and patient was entire, and that performance thereof was necessary in order to enable the physician to recover, and that, by not defending, the patient admitted the performance thereof on the physician's part. The note states that, in most of the New York cases mentioned, the patient, as defendant in the action for services, appeared and answered in the first instance, although he subsequently withdrew his defense, and that in one case he confessed judgment. From the cases cited in that note the writer deduces the rule that there is a distinction between the cases in which the judgment recovered by the physician is one upon the merits upon a trial, and those in which the judgment has been rendered by default on the patient's part, and states that generally speaking a judgment of the former kind is a bar, while that of the latter kind is not.

CERTIORARI to the Appellate Court, Third District, to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sangamon County in plaintiff's favor in an action for malpractice. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. St. J. Wines for plaintiff in certiorari.

Messrs. Graham & Graham and Stevens & Herndon, for defendant in certiorari:

In a suit by a physician for fees, unless the services are reasonably careful and skillful, he cannot recover, but it is not necessary that he be successful.

Yunker v. Marshall, 65 Ill. App. 667; Patten v. Wiggin, 51 Me. 594, 81 Am. Dec. 593; Bellinger v. Craigie, 31 Barb. 534; Goble v. Dillon, 86 Ind. 327, 44 Am. Rep. 308; Alder v. Buckley, 1 Swan, 69; Langolf v. Pfromer, 2 Phila. 17; Ely v. Wilbur, 49 N. J. L. 685, 60 Am. Rep. 668, 10 Atl. 358, 441.

A judgment is conclusive of every fact which was offered, or might properly have been offered, as a defense to the suit on which the judgment was entered.

Gross v. People, 193 Ill. 260, 86 Am. St. Rep. 322, 61 N. E. 1012; Brack v. Bond, 211 Ill. 290, 103 Am. St. Rep. 200, 71 N. E. 995; Rice v. Travis, 216 Ill. 260, 74 N. E. 801.

There appears to have been few cases decided upon this question since the preparation of the note mentioned. The Tennessee supreme court in Sale v. Eichberg, 105 Tenn. 333, 52 L.R.A. 894, 59 S. W. 1020, especially commending the note in 45 L.R.A., disapproved in a general way the New York decisions and reached a contrary conclusion, though the facts of the case were such that possibly a like conclusion thereunder might be justified even in New York. The case holds that a judgment in favor of a physician for services, confessed by the defendant as a condition imposed by the chancellor to granting an injunction to prevent the prosecution of an action to recover compensation therefor pending an action against a physician for malpractice, will not, upon reversal of the injunction order, operate as an estoppel against the action for malpractice. The controlling idea of the court seemed to be that the judgment was confessed for the express purpose of preventing an estoppel and that therefore it would be unjust to permit it so to operate thereafter.

The rule of the New York cases was recognized in Elebach v. Weed, 29 Misc. 754, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1136, involving an action to recover for plaintiff's services as a physician; and also in Martin v. Prentice, 133 App. Div. 741, 118 N. Y. Supp. 215, denying the right under the New York statute to consolidate an action for services with an action for malpractice.

A judgment in favor of a physician for compensation for services rendered on hearing where defendant appeared, is a bar to the prosecution of an action for malpractice based on the services for which judgment for compensation is given.

Per Curiam:

The plaintiff in error, Virgia V. Barton, brought her action on the case in the circuit court of Sangamon county against Dr. George E. Southwick, the defendant in error, charging him with malpractice, and recovered a judgment for $2,300. The appellate court reversed the judgment without remanding the cause, on the ground that the action was barred by a judgment before a justice of the peace in favor of defendant in error, Dr. Southwick, in an action brought by him against plaintiff in error and her husband for the services rendered plaintiff in error. The merits of the case were not considered by the appellate court. The case is brought to this court for review by writ of certiorari.

After this suit had been commenced in the circuit court and the declaration had been filed herein, defendant in error sued plaintiff in error and her husband, jointly, before a justice of the peace, to recover for his services, and recovered judgment therefor, and the only question argued and presented for our determination is whether the judgment thus secured before the justice of the peace is a bar to a recovery in this action.

It will not be necessary to make an extended statement of the facts. In substance the declaration charged, and the theory upon which the plaintiff in error seeks to recover is, that defendant was negligent and guilty of malpractice, in that having been called as a physician to attend and prescribe for her while she was suffering from some disorder of the generative organs, which had resulted in what is commonly known as "flooding," he improperly and wrongfully diagnosed her case as one of pregnancy, informed her she was about to have a miscarriage, and proceeded, by the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

use of various instruments, to attempt to remove the fetus supposed to be present; that plaintiff in error was not pregnant, and defendant in error was so careless and negligent in the use of such instruments as to lacerate the uterus, thereby compelling plaintiff in error to submit to a major surgical operation and suffer the removal of her uterus. The defense in the trial court on the facts was that defendant in error employed proper treatment to stop the flooding, that he did not diagnose the case as one of pregnancy, and that he did not insert any instrument into the uterus or attempt by the use of instruments to remove a fetus.

On the trial the following stipulation was entered into and admitted in evidence: "It is stipulated between the parties that the defendant in this suit now on trial, Dr. George Southwick, brought suit in December, 1910, before Justice of the Peace Knotts, at Chatham, Illinois, to recover compensation for services, including the visits, on which it is claimed in the case on trial that the defendant herein was guilty of negligence; that Virgia Barton was a defendant in that suit brought by Dr. Southwick, and is the same Virgia Barton who is the plaintiff in this case; that counsel appeared on the hearing in the trial of the case before the said justice of the peace representing the defendants; that the defendant in this case and plaintiff in that case, Dr. Southwick, testified on that trial to the rendition of the services upon which this action of negligence is based; that counsel for defendants in that case inquired of Dr. Southwick on that trial concerning the duration of his visits, what instruments he used, and what use he made of them, and that judgment for compensation for the plaintiff for said services was given against the defendants, Wesley Barton and Virgia Barton, as claimed by the plaintiff in that suit; and that said suit by Dr. Southwick was commenced before the justice of the peace after precept and declaration had been filed in the suit on trial."

Guy Wesley Barton, the husband of plaintiff in error, was a witness in her behalf on the trial of the case, and in his direct examination testified that defendant in error had sued him for his services. His cross-examination on this subject is abstracted as follows: "Southwick's suit for fees was brought against wife and myself. I was in Chatham, present at the trial, and Mr. Wines was there for us. He asked Southwick, on the trial, what instruments he used and how he used them. Mr. Wines told the squire I didn't deny I owed the doctor the bill."

The New York courts have held that a judgment against a patient, before a justice of the peace, in favor of a physician for his services, is a bar to the prosecution of a suit for malpractice against the physician by the patient, even though no defense of malpractice or any attempt to set off or recoup damages on that account was made at the trial. This was held in Bellinger v. Craigue, 31 Barb. 534, and Gates v. Preston, 41 N. Y. 113, and has been followed by the courts of that state in later cases. The courts of some other states have followed the New York cases, but the majority of other courts have only partially followed the New York courts. Bigelow on Estoppel, Van Fleet on Former Adjudication, and Black on Judgments repudiate the New York rule, while Herman on Estoppel supports it. A number of both lines of authorities will be found in the decisions cited and reviewed by the supreme court of Tennessee in Sale v. Eichberg, 105 Tenn. 333, 52 L.R.A. 894, 59 S. W. 1020. Most, if not all, the reported cases to which our attention has been called follow the New York decisions to the extent of holding that a judgment before a justice of the peace is a bar to the prosecution of a malpractice suit only when the defendant in the suit before the justice of the peace appears at the trial and interposes the defense of malpractice.

This court held in Howell v. Goodrich, 69 Ill. 556, that a judgment in favor of a doctor before a justice of the peace, where the defendant appeared and interposed the defense of malpractice; was a bar to the prosecution of a suit against the doctor for malpractice; and it would seem from the fact that a justice of the peace in this state has no jurisdiction to entertain an action for malpractice, a party having pending or contemplating bringing such a suit in a court having jurisdiction to try and determine it could not be compelled to defend the suit by the physician before the justice of the peace, or be barred from prosecuting his suit for malpractice. The inconvenience, if not injustice, or requiring the party to defend against a judgment in the justice's court was referred to in Ressequie v. Byers, 52 Wis. 650, 38 Am. Rep. 775, 9 N. W. 779, where the court said: "If the plaintiff were compelled to make his defense in the justice's court that the professional services were of no value and that he had been injured by the defendant's negligence, then it would follow that he must either split up his demand, so that there might be two suits, instead of one, upon it, or content himself with merely defeating the claim for services, or limit his damages to $200,—the extent of the jurisdiction of the justice. We are not inclined to adopt a rule which would lead to any such inconvenient consequences."

Defendant in error contends that there was a defense made before the justice of the peace in the suit brought by him to recover for his services. We do not think the stipulation and testimony relied upon support this contention. Plaintiff in error did not appear at the trial, but her husband, who was sued jointly with her, was present and was accompanied by counsel. Defendant in error, as shown by the stipulation, testified in support of his claim, and counsel who was present with the husband of plaintiff in error inquired of defendant in error what instruments he used and what use he made of them. The husband of plaintiff in error testified on the trial of this case that he, with counsel, was present before the justice of the peace; that counsel asked defendant in error the questions stated in the stipulation, and counsel said to the justice of the peace plaintiff in error's husband did not deny owing the doctor the bill. Clearly this does not show that any defense was interposed or any attempt made to prevent a judgment being rendered. The question might well have been, and to all appearances was, asked by counsel to acquire information that might be of advantage to him in the prosecution of the malpractice suit. The mere presence of the husband of plaintiff in error and counsel before the justice of the peace, without any attempt to interpose any defense whatever, was not a bar to the prosecution of the malpractice suit by plaintiff in error, and Howell v. Goodrich, supra, is not applicable.

Inasmuch as the Appellate Court did not consider the merits of the case, the judgment of that court will be reversed, and the cause remanded to it, with directions to consider the case on its merits.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

FRANCIS W. ACKERMAN, Appt.,

v.

LAWRENCE FICHTER, Exr., etc., of Elizabeth Ackerman, Deceased, et al.

(— Ind. —, 101 N. E. 493.)

Trust — competency of trustees — lack of incorporation.

1. Trustees of a charitable trust are not rendered incapable of taking because they do not represent an incorporated body.

Same — exclusion of jurisdiction of court — effect.

2. That a testator places property under the control of trustees, free from the jurisdiction of the probate court, does not invalidate the trust if the public at large has no interest in it and it does not violate public policy.

Charity — trust for tuition — validity.

3. A devise to trustees of a fund the income of which shall be applied to payment of tuition in a parish school of an unincorporated religious denomination is valid.

Will — provision contrary to statute — effect.

4. A will is not invalidated because of provisions that the trustees of the fund created for benevolent purposes need not report to the court, contrary to provisions of the statute, although the provision as to report must give way to the statute.

Charity — bequest for masses — validity.

5. A bequest of a fund to be used for masses for the repose of all poor souls is a valid charitable trust under a Constitution forbidding interference with the rights of conscience.

Same — power to enforce.

6. Courts may enforce a trust devoting a definite sum to be expended annually for masses for the repose of all poor souls.

Note. — Who may enforce trust for masses.

There is a considerable difference of opinion as to whether a bequest for masses is good. See notes in 25 L.R.A. 360, and 40 L.R.A. 717, on validity of bequest for masses; also Re Kavanaugh, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 470. And see also notes in 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 96, and 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1005, as to enforcement of general bequest for masses.

"One class of cases," says the court in Sherman v. Baker, 20 R. I. 446, 40 L.R.A. 717, 40 Atl. 11, "holds that they are good as charitable trusts, being for religious services. Another class holds that they are private trusts which are void because there is no living beneficiary to enforce the trust. A third class holds that they are good as outright gifts for a specified legal object."

Where the bequest is considered as an absolute gift, or as one conditioned upon the saying of masses (Re Zimmerman, 22 Misc. 411, 40 N. Y. Supp. 395), or where it is regarded as creating a private trust which is void for want of a living beneficiary (as in Festorazzi v. St. Joseph's Catholic Church, 104 Ala. 327, 25 L.R.A. 360, 53 Am. St. Rep. 48, 18 So. 394; McHugh v. McCole, 97 Wis. 166, 40 L.R.A. 724, 65 Am. St. Rep. 106, 72 N. W. 631, and Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312, 2 Am. St. Rep. 420, 16 N. E. 305) the question under consideration of course cannot arise.

Research has failed to disclose the exist-

Same — beneficiaries to enforce — competency.

7. Since a trust for masses for the repose of all poor souls is for the benefit of both living and dead, living persons have an interest in its enforcement both for themselves and as kindred of the dead, so that the trust will not fail for lack of beneficiaries competent to enforce or invoke its enforcement.

The executor cannot do it, for he succeeds only to the property rights of the testator. His powers and functions do not, and cannot extend to the well being of the soul of his testator. As said by appellant's counsel, 'If the church should receive this bequest and apply it to paying its debts, repairing its building, supporting its priests, and paying the expenses of their ceremonies, the purpose of the bequest would be clearly violated. But what living person is authorized to call the trustee to an account for the misuse of the fund?'"

8 Cyc. 1082, notes.

It is not within the power of individuals or corporations to create judicial tribunals to settle controversies.

Bauer v. Samson Lodge, K. P. 102 Ind. 269, 1 N. E. 571.

The will in the case at bar provides not only for a sale without notice, but without petition, order of court, bond, appraisement, without report or confirmation. This is certainly without due process of law.

Messrs. Tremain & Turner, Osborn & Harding, and Bennett & Davidson, for appellees:

Charitable trusts are not within the rule person to execute the trust; and when he accepts the money he becomes responsible to the court for the proper discharge of his duties as trustee."

In Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312, 2 Am. St. Rep. 420, 16 N. E. 305, where the testator gave his residuary estate to his executors "to be applied by them for the purpose of having prayers offered in a Roman Catholic Church, to be by them selected, for the repose of my soul and the souls of my family, and also the souls of all others who may be in Purgatory," the court said: "There is no beneficiary in existence or to come into existence who is interested in or can demand the execution of the trust. No defined or ascertainable living person has, or ever can have, any temporal interest in its performance; nor is any incorporate church designated so as to entitle it to claim any portion of the fund."

In Gilman v. McArdle, 65 How. Pr. 330, 12 Abb. N. C. 414, in discussing the validity of a trust to have masses said for the repose of the souls of the creator of the trust and her husband, it was said: "In the case at bar the beneficiaries are both dead and beyond the reach of human law. Their souls are intended as the beneficiaries, and the money is to be expended for masses for the repose of their souls. But the soul of one who has departed this life is incapable of taking an interest in the property left behind, nor is it in any sense subject to the jurisdiction of any legal tribunal. A court of equity protects the rights of the living. It cannot extend its jurisdiction to beings which cannot be apprehended within the boundaries of the realm."

The foregoing case was carried to the court of appeals, which, after remarking that the conclusion of the court below, that a valid trust was not established as to the surplus to be applied to masses, for the want of a beneficiary who could enforce it, admits of much discussion, declined to decide the question; basing its decision that the holder of the fund was entitled to retain it on the ground that the transaction amounted to a contract to pay a sum of money to the defendant on his agreement to expend an equivalent sum in procuring the solemnization of masses; that this contract was valid; and that the representatives of the wife had no right of action except in case of a breach of the contract by the defendant. Whether the representatives of the husband had any right of action in any event, the court found unnecessary to determine. 99 N. Y. 451, 52 Am. Rep. 41, 2 N. E. 464.

But in Coleman v. O'Leary, 114 Ky. 388, 70 S. W. 1068, the court, in sustaining the provision of a will directing the executor to expend the sum of $1,000 for masses for the repose of the souls of testator and his mother and aunts, said that they did not see any reason why the application of the fund to the designated purpose might not be enforced by the courts upon the application of the heir.

Myers, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, the adopted son of Elizabeth Ackerman, deceased, instituted this action by next friend against the rector, Fichter, executor, and the parish council of St. Mary's Catholic Church of the city of Greensburgh, Indiana, trustees, under the will of Elizabeth Ackerman, by a complaint in two paragraphs. The first paragraph alleged the undue execution of the will and asked that it be declared null and void. It was held sufficient on demurrer, as to which ruling no question is presented here. The second paragraph, which was an amended one, sets out appellant's relation to the decedent, the admission of the will to probate, the will itself, the objections thereto, and asks that it be construed and be declared null and void and of no effect. Joint and several demurrers were sustained to this paragraph, and the rulings thereon are assigned as error on appeal.

The will provides:

In Item 1, for the payment of all just debts, and that only so much of the testatrix' real estate, after exhausting the personal estate, as is necessary, shall be sold by the executor without order of court, to pay debts.

"Item 2. I give, devise, and bequeath to the trustees hereinafter designated, all other property of every kind and description owned by me at my death, after paying my debts as directed in Item 1, in trust, for the benefit, maintenance, and support of the Parochial School of Saint Mary's Roman Catholic Church at said city of Greensburgh, and I direct that two thirds of the rents, profits, and income of said bequest shall be applied to the payment of tuition in said school; that one third be used for masses every year, for the repose of all poor souls, and the principal of said bequest shall always be kept separate and apart for the purposes herein expressed.

"Item 3. I hereby appoint and designate Reverend Lawrence Fichter, rector, and [four persons, naming them] parish councilors of said Saint Mary's Catholic Church of said city of Greensburgh, and their successors in office in said church as such rector and parish councilors, respectively trustees, to receive, hold, and manage in trust the property devised and bequeathed in item 2 above, for the benefit, support, and maintenance of said school. Said trustees shall receive, hold, and control said property in trust for the purposes specified above, and may sell said property, and if any part thereof shall be real estate, they shall have full power to sell the same without notice, at public or private sale, as they deem best, and may sell and convey the same without any appraisalment, or bond or authority or order of any court or report or approval of said sale; and said trustees shall invest all money, or proceeds of property devised herein, in bonds of the United States of any state therein, of any county, city, or town in the state of Indiana, or in first mortgage on real estate in the state of Indiana; and said trustees shall manage said funds for the best interest thereof, that it may yield the best income consistent with a safe investment thereof. When any one of the persons named above as trustee shall die, or cease to hold the official position in said Saint Mary's Church now held by such person as aforesaid, then such person shall cease to be a trustee herein, or act as trustee herein, and he shall be succeeded as trustee hereinafter, by the person who shall be chosen or elected by the proper church authority to fill the official place in Saint Mary's Church vacated as aforesaid; and the person so chosen, or elected, shall have the same powers and duties as trustee herein, as each of the persons named above as trustee. It being my intention and desire that the same persons shall be and act as trustees hereunder, as shall manage the business affairs of said Saint Mary's Church. If at any time there shall be a failure of trustees under this will, and it shall be the duty of any court to appoint such trustees, then I request and direct that the court having jurisdiction of this trust, shall appoint as such trustees the rector and parish councilors of said Saint Mary's Catholic Church of Greensburgh. The trustees hereunder shall not be required to give any bond for the performance of their duties as such trustees, nor shall they be requested to report to any court, but they shall transact no business, except by three-fourths vote of all trustees aforesaid, and shall annually make report of said trust, and any funds or property thereof in their hands as such trustees, to the congregation of said Saint Mary's Church (Roman Catholic), provided, that at any time upon the petition of ten persons, who are members of said Saint Mary's Roman Catholic Church and heads of families therein, said trustees may be required to report to the court having jurisdiction thereof, fully and specifically under oath, the condition of said trust, and if said report be found correct and approved by the court, such petitioners shall be liable for all costs. Trustees appointed or acting hereunder shall not receive any compensation for their services as such trustees.

"Item 4. If any time the Roman Catholic Church shall cease to maintain a parish school at said church, at said city of Greensburgh, then in that case said funds shall be held in trust for, and managed as hereinbefore directed by the trustees above designated, but said request shall be held in trust for, and the interest or income thereof shall be applied by said trustees to, the general support and maintenance of said Saint Mary's Roman Catholic Church.

"Item 5. When Saint Mary's Roman Catholic Church of Greensburgh shall cease to exist as a congregation or organization of the Roman Catholic Church of Greensburgh, Indiana, I direct that the property given, devised, and bequeathed as aforesaid, and all the income, rents, and profits thereof then held by said trustees under this will, shall be paid, transferred, and delivered to the bishop of the Diocese Indianapolis, of the Roman Catholic Church, or if the city of Greensburgh be not a part of that diocese, to the bishop of the Dioceses of the Roman Catholic Church of which the city of Greensburgh shall be a part, for the support of the Roman Catholic Church."

The questions raised by the complaint are: "That said will is illegal, against public policy, and in violation of the statutes of the state of Indiana, both civil and criminal, in this, to wit: That the terms of said will violate the Revised Statutes of the state of Indiana of 1908, from § 4031 to § 4040, inclusive. That the same is in direct violation of § 3173 of said statutes affixing a penalty for such violation. That said will, if enforced, would and will abrogate and abolish the jurisdiction of the circuit court over decedent's estates. That said will is against public policy, for the reason that the Catholic Church and the school therein named neither have any corporate existence, neither can they contract nor be contracted with, sue or be sued, and neither could be held accountable to any court for violation of any laws of the state of Indiana: and there is no beneficiary living, who is named in said will, having a legal capacity to enforce the execution of the trust. That said parochial school named in said will is not a free school, and does not share in public school funds, but said school is supported by tuition fees paid by its patrons, and is maintained in opposition to the policy of the public school system of the state of Indiana, and the pupils of such parochial schools are not permitted to attend the public schools of Indiana."

An attempt is made to interject the question of due process of law; but it has no place here, as the right of testatrix to dispose of her property to the exclusion even of her son cannot be denied.

The real question is whether the will is void as being in violation of law, and against public policy, and as being indefinite and uncertain, both as to beneficiaries and as to trustees, and whether there is a beneficiary capable of enforcing the trust.

It is contended that, since the trustees are not representatives of an incorporated body, they are unable to take. It is not necessary that they be so; if they are in being, and ascertainable, the trust will not fail because of lack of corporate existence. In this case they are individuals, definitely fixed by name, and also as the rector and parish councilors, and they are capable of holding as trustees, and are vested with title, and succession provided for, and can be held to account for their acts as trustees by the constituted authorities, with respect to property matters. Ramsey v. Hicks, 174 Ind. 428, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 665, 91 N. E. 344, 92 N. E. 164; Hatfield v. De Long, 156 Ind. 207, 209, 51 L.R.A. 751, 83 Am. St. Rep. 194, 59 N. E. 483; Smith v. Pedigo, 145 Ind. 361, 19 L.R.A. 433, 32 L.R.A. 838, 33 N. E. 777, 44 N. E. 363; Gaff v. Greer, 88 Ind. 122, 45 Am. Rep. 449. They have the title of the res, the corpus, and its control, and therefore have powers coupled with an interest. Cooley v. Kelley, — Ind. App. —, 96 N. E. 638; Hadley v. Hadley, 147 Ind. 423, 46 N. E. 823; Rowe v. Beckett, 30 Ind. 154, 95 Am. Dec. 676.

It is also contended that the probate courts of this state are ousted of jurisdiction over the trust and the decedent's estate. This is true to a certain extent, but it is not uncommon, and so long as the public at large has no interest in the tuition question, and it is not in violation of public policy, disposition and control may be directed by the donor of the trust.

It is also contended that the devise is void because it provides that sale of real estate without petition, order, appraisement, bond, or other statutory requirements be made by the trustees. There is no question as to this procedure, and it may be so done. Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, § 2877.

An attempt is made to invoke the aid of §§ 3173 and 3174, regarding annual report of trustees of trusts for benevolent purposes, and that, as the will specifically provides that no report be made to the court, it is void, and under § 3174 criminal in its effect. Trustees ready, willing to, and capable of taking, and to execute powers, and to select objects of the trust, and thus make them certain, and apply the funds in aid of the objects so selected, are allowable. Rush County v. Dinwiddie, 139 Ind. 140, 37 N. E. 795.

If the trust is one falling within the provisions of §§ 3173 and 3174, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, as "benevolent purposes," then the provisions of the will would have to give way to the statute, but that would not affect the validity of the will, so far as its provisions refer to reports by the trustees. *Jones v. The fact that the beneficiary is a parish school of a certain unincorporated religious denomination, for tuition purposes, is immaterial in view of the fact that trustees capable of taking and holding, and designating the expenditures, are designated with provision for succession, and the specific object of the charity named, is sufficient, although the beneficiaries are uncertain in number and identity, for that is the essential feature of a charitable use, or public charity, as distinguished from a private trust. Re Schouler, 134 Mass. 426; Jackson v. Grace, 3 L.R.A. 145, and notes (112 N. Y. 299, 19 N. E. 839); Perry, Trusts, § 687. Some of the devises which have been upheld are as follows: To county commissioners of a certain county "for the use of the orphan poor, and for other destitute persons of said county." Lagrange County v. Rogers, 55 Ind. 297. To named persons as trustees to be applied "to poor families, widows, and orphans, etc., of Vanderburgh county." Erskine v. Whitehead, 84 Ind. 357. To a designated board of commissioners "to establish a home for the benefit of worthy persons who have no home, and orphan boys." Rush County v. Dinwiddie, supra. "To the education of colored children in the state of Indiana." Ex parte Lindley, 32 Ind. 367. To trustees "for the sole relief and benefit of poor persons, etc." De Bruler v. Ferguson, 54 Ind. 549. To "boards of commissioners for colored children of said (Owen) county." Craig v. Secrist, 54 Ind. 419. "To the Beaver Creek Church (unincorporated) for poor children for their tuition." Dye v. Beaver Creek Church, 48 S. C. 444, 59 Am. St. Rep. 724, 26 S. E. 717. To the "vestry of St. Mary's Church" to support a parish school. Hanson v. Little Sisters of Poor, 79 Md. 434, 32 L.R.A. 293, 32 Atl. 1052. To trustees "for a poor school for the benefit of poor children of Zanesville." McIntire v. Zanesville, 17 Ohio St. 352. See also Wood v. Fourth Baptist Church, 28 R. I. 594, 61 Atl. 279; Re Stickney (Congregational Church Bldg. Soc. v. Everitt) 85 Md. 79, 35 L.R.A. 693, 60 Am. Teachout*, 24 Ohio St. 525; Biscoe v. Thweatt, 74 Ark. 545, 86 S. W. 432, 4 Ann. Cas. 1136. It will thus be perceived that in numerous cases in this and other states devises similar to the one in question as to the tuition fund have been upheld.

The question is more difficult as to the provision for masses. The language is "that one third [of rents, profits, and income] be used for masses every year for the repose of all poor souls." The trustees are the same as in case of the tuition fund, but it is specifically provided that the funds shall be kept separate. The objects of the testatrix' solicitude are uncertain, but it is of the essence of a charitable use or charitable trust, as distinguished from a private trust, that the beneficiaries are indefinite, and uncertain, as to persons or number, or in the definition of Lord Camden in Jones v. Williams, 2 Amb. 652, and adopted by Chancellor Kent in Coggeshall v. Pelton, 7 Johns. Ch. 294, 11 Am. A "mass" is an act of public worship, in celebration of the Eucharist as observed in the Roman Catholic Church, and formerly observed in the Church of England, and yet observed in some Anglican churches. It is common, and public to all, as a religious ceremony, and is therefore a religious or pious use, and is a public charity, as distinguished from a private charity, which it might be if restricted to masses for the souls of designated persons. Gilmore v. Lee, 237 Ill. 402, 127 Am. St. Rep. 330, 86 N. E. 568; Hoeffer v. Clogan, 171 Ill. 462, 40 L.R.A. 730, 63 Am. St. Rep. 241, 49 N. Brophy*, 59 Kan. 1, 40 L.R.A. 721, 51 Pac. 883; Rhymer's Appeal, 93 Pa. 142, 39 Am. Rep. 736; Sherman v. Baker, 20 R. I. 446, 40 L.R.A. 717, 40 Atl. 11; Seda v. Huble, 75 Iowa, 429, 9 Am. St. Rep. 495, 39 N. W. 685; Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312, 2 Am. St. Rep. 420, 16 N. E. 305; 1 Beach, Trusts & Trustees, §§ 345, 348.

The matter presenting the most difficulty in the mind of the court is whether courts may enforce the trust, and also whether there is any beneficiary competent to enforce or invoke its enforcement. It will be seen that the annual income is directed to be annually disbursed; the beneficiaries are all poor souls, not the souls of the poor, but, as we understand it, all souls are regarded as poor souls, objects or subjects of meditation in their behalf, and, if so, all come within the classification, indefinite both as to persons and numbers, and this brings the devise within the doctrine of pious or charitable uses, or a public charity, if otherwise sustainable. The question of there being no beneficiary to require enforcement of the trust was before the court in Haines v. Allen, 78 Ind. 100, 41 Am. Rep. 555, in which it was held that where trustees capable of taking the legal estate were originally appointed, so that a valid use was raised in the first instance, a court of equity will supply any defect arising from disability or refusal of the trustee to act, and also that an otherwise indefinite devise is sufficiently ascertained if the trustees are empowered to devote the fund in such manner as they deem just and the purpose is not unlawful or against public policy. Under the holding in that case it appears that this will is specific as to the amount (the entire income), the time of the expenditure (each year), and the definite purpose as a charitable use, and public charity. Just how it shall be expended is not material, so long as the duty is imposed on the trustees of exercising their judgment in its expenditure for masses.

Whether the language used refers to the souls of those who have passed from this life, or includes those who are living, is alike immaterial. We understand that it is one of the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church that masses may be and are celebrated for the living; that they are also celebrated for the benefit of those souls which are in the intermediate state of Purgatory, as a doctrine of that faith. It is therefore a public and general religious service, and those who are living, and the living kindred of those dead to this life, have a direct interest in its observance, and can enforce the execution of the trust. We know that the material elements of bread and wine, and the attendant music, cost someone something, presumably the church; or its congregation or members; hence the devise in effect is a devise to the use and benefit of the public service of the church, a beneficial pious use, and a public charity, and this, we gather from the instrument, was the intention of the testatrix.

The Constitution expressly secures the natural right of worship according to conscience, and forbids any law controlling the free exercise and enjoyment of religious opinions, or interference with the rights of conscience. It necessarily follows that if, as a matter of conscience, the celebration of masses is either religious worship, or the exercise of religious opinions,—and to many they are both,—then the right to devote the property to their support is a necessary incident of that right, as sacred as conscience itself, and as necessarily the enjoyment of religious opinions, and in such aid as their donor may choose to extend in furtherance of them, irrespective of what those opinions are, so long as not in violation of law or against public policy; for the courts cannot know any distinctions or standards of religious opinion or of conscience, and either control or define either; that must rest with the individual and his Creator.

The judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

FRANK GEE, Admr., etc., of James Gee, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

CITY OF HOPKINSVILLE.

Municipal corporation — maintenance of ford — liability for death.

1. A municipal corporation which undertakes to construct a ford instead of a bridge across a stream flowing through its limits, which at low water is safe for vehicles and pedestrians, is not liable for the death of one who undertakes to cross when the river is swollen to such an extent as to make the crossing unsafe.

Note. — Liability for loss of life or property at ford.

Generally as to liability of municipal corporation for defects or obstructions in streets, see note to Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 513; and as to liability of townships for defects in highways, see note to James v. Wellston Twp. 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1219.

As to contributory negligence as affecting liability of municipal corporations for defects and obstructions in streets, see note to Lerner v. Philadelphia, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 614.

See also, as bearing closely upon the questions involved in GEE v. HOPKINSVILLE, note to Giaconi v. Astoria, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1150, on municipal liability for defective plan of street construction, as distinguished from other defects.

It should be noted that in the case of GEE v. HOPKINSVILLE the plaintiff did not know of the condition of the river at the ford, or of the heavy rainfall, and also that while it seems to be assumed that it was the duty of the municipality to make the ford reasonably safe, the holding indicates that the court regarded this duty performed if the ford was reasonably safe at the ordinary stage of the water.

A more equitable rule, as against those who have no knowledge of the conditions, and are not guilty of negligence, and who have a right to presume that, in the absence of indications to the contrary, the highway is safe for travel, seems to be laid down in the case of Hopkins v. Rush River, 70 Wis. 10, 34 N. W. 909, 35 N. W. 939, that it is the duty of a town to make provision for the flow of water caused by ordinary rainfalls or storms which are usually liable to occur; although it was held that it was not the duty of a town to keep a ford safe for an unusual or extraordinary rise of the water, although such a rise might be reasonably anticipated occasionally to occur; that while unusual and extraordinary rainfalls and freshets might reasonably be anticipated at long intervals and at uncertain times, the test of the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — absence of light — effect on liability.

2. Even though a municipal corporation has undertaken to light its streets, and has failed to place a light at the ford across a stream, it is not liable for the death of a traveler drowned in the dark because of the swollen condition of the water, if the ford was safe for travel under ordinary circumstances.

(June 5, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Christian County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover compensation for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to town's liability was not whether it had provided for these.

It was also held in Hopkins v. Rush River, supra, that an instruction was error which gave prominence to the idea that one had a right to presume that the authorities had properly kept the road, as applied to the plaintiff in that case, who was familiar with the ford crossing and the character of the stream, and could see its width for many rods before reaching it, and could have turned back after ascertaining its condition, the water being 8 rods in width and from 3 to 4 feet deep, and running with sufficient force to carry horses and carriage down the stream.

Upon the ground that a city bound by its charter to keep the streets in repair is liable for an injury through neglect to do so, it was held in the case of Erie v. Schwingle, 22 Pa. 384, 60 Am. Dec. 87, where a bridge across a street had been washed away and a road cut down to the creek (whether by the authority of the city did not appear), that the city was liable for an injury sustained by one in attempting to cross the creek, although he might safely have reached his destination by traveling over parallel streets. This case is distinguishable from GEE v. HOPKINSVILLE, since the injury here appears to have been caused by a defective condition of the road in its ordinary state. In regard to the contention that the plaintiff might have safely traveled another street, the court said that if officers of the city permitted the street to be used without warning the public of its condition, they could not charge the plaintiff with inexcusable negligence in doing what they themselves took no measures to prevent; that they invited him into the street by not closing it, by allowing it to be used without objection, and by putting certain repairs upon it which made it not safe, but passable with skilful driving and good luck. It was also said that except in cases where the suit is against the public officer in his individual character, and not against the corporation which he represents, it made no difference whether the neglect was wilful or otherwise.

Prinz, 127 Ky. 470, 105 S. W. 948; Maydwell v. Louis-

It was also held in Erie v. Schwingle, supra, that the city was not absolved from liability by reason of the fact that its charter forbade taxation for special purposes greater than a certain per cent, which had been laid and expended, where it was also provided that a larger tax might be laid with the consent of a majority of the inhabitants of the city.

In Lowrey v. Delphi, 55 Ind. 250, under a statute providing that the council should have exclusive power over streets, highways, and bridges within the city, it was held that a city would be liable for injuries sustained by one in attempting, without knowledge of defects and without fault on his part, to cross an apparent ford through a canal, if the city had, as alleged, negligently failed to erect another bridge in place of the one which had fallen, and carelessly left the apparent ford open and unguarded, without notice to strangers that it was dangerous, and that the tracks were made by persons in the immediate neighborhood, who merely drove into the canal, but did not attempt to cross it.

By a majority of the court it was laid down in Hyde v. Jamaica, 27 Vt. 444, that the urgency or importance of the business does not affect the question whether one is guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross a swollen stream by means of a ford, and that therefore the fact that the intestate was a physician, and upon his way to see a patient, was not to be considered in determining whether or not he exercised ordinary care. The court said that the true inquiry was whether, as a man of ordinary prudence, after making suitable observation and examination, he had good reason to believe that with due care he could pass in safety; and 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

if he had, he was justified in making the attempt, whether he had any special business, or was merely on an excursion of pleasure; that if he had not good reason to believe he could go over in safety, but, from the urgency of his business, was led to try it, when otherwise he ought not and would not have done so, he took the risk upon himself.

In the case of Hyde v. Jamaica, supra, there being no witnesses of the manner in which the deceased lost his life in attempting to cross a ford, it was said by one of the judges that, it being granted that the intestate was not in fault in attempting to pass the stream, this was not enough; that he must have driven with due care and prudence while in the stream; that there was no evidence of what took place after he entered the stream, or of the manner in which the accident happened, and that the exercise of ordinary care was not to be presumed, but must be proved as an affirmative fact, and the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff.

In the Hyde Case, supra, there seems to have been a division of opinion upon the question of the liability of the town for the insufficiency of a ford on private land near a bridge which had fallen, where the ford had been cleared by the highway surveyor, and used for general travel for several weeks, but where there had been no dedication of the land for purposes of a highway, nor other evidence of acceptance by the town as a highway.

In Welsh v. Argyle, 89 Wis. 649, 62 N. W. 517, it was held that one who voluntarily turned aside from a highway which was safe, though inconvenient for travel, because of a thin covering of water and ice, into a well-marked passage leadville, 116 Ky. 885, 63 L.R.A. 655, 105 Am. St. Rep. 245, 76 S. W. 1091.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There runs through the city of Hopkinstown a stream of water called the West fork of Little river, that, during heavy rainfalls, becomes a swift, high, and dangerous current, although in ordinary conditions it is passable on foot. Several of the streets of the city, including Second street, cross this river. On two of these streets the city has built bridges, and many years ago it macadamized Second street on each side of the river to the center of it, thereby making it, when the river was low, a safe highway for vehicles as well as pedestrians. In March, 1910, James Gee, who lived in Hopkinstown, went out into the country in his buggy early one morning, and returned to the city on the same night after dark. During the day there was a heavy rainfall that made the river dangerous to cross at Second street, and when Gee, who did not know of the heavy rainfall, or of the condition of the river, attempted, on his return, to cross it at Second street, he was caught in the current and drowned. Soon afterwards his administrator brought this suit against the city to recover damages for his death, charging that it was due to the negligence of the city in failing to have a bridge across the river at Second street, and in failing to have the street so lighted near the river as that travelers in the night might be able to discover, before getting into it, whether it was passable or not. On the trial of the case, after evidence for the plaintiff had been introduced showing that there was no bridge at Second street, and that the street lights did not furnish sufficient light to disclose the condition the river was in, and when the case for the plaintiff had been closed, the court directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

Leaving out of view for the moment the question of lights, we may say at the outset that three propositions relating to the duty of municipal corporations in reference to streets are well settled. One is that a ing for some distance through a creek, and used for watering purposes, could not recover damages from the town for loss of his team by drowning.

Under a statute rendering a township liable for damages by reason of a defective highway, it was held in Quincy Twp. v. Sheehan, 48 Kan. 620, 29 Pac. 1084, that the township was not liable for damages caused by the neglect of a road overseer to comply with another statute making it his duty to erect and maintain water marks at fords that in high water became impassable. The court said that the neglect of the overseer to perform this duty might create a liability against him for consequent injuries, but that it was not intended to impute such negligence to the township, nor impose a liability upon it for failure of the overseer to erect water marks.

In Day v. Crossman, 4 Thomp. & C. 122, it was held that one familiar with a roadway, who, in the dark, attempted to ford a stream swollen by heavy rains, could not recover from the highway commissioners, who had made a temporary passage through the stream while the bridge was being repaired, for the loss of his team by drowning, the passage being safe in ordinary weather. The action was brought for alleged negligence in not keeping the bridge in repair, and the court said: "The plaintiff's injury was not proximate or consequent upon the neglect of defendants to repair the bridge. It was the immediate result of his own negligence in attempting, in a dark night, to ford the stream, rapidly swollen by a sudden and severe storm, where it was otherwise ordinarily safe to drive, and where he had passed safely a few hours before, and knew intimately the ground and situation of the highway, the bridge, and the creek at that place. His injury did not result from the omission of the defendants to repair the bridge in question, in such a sense and with such intimacy of connection with the cause of neglect alleged as to furnish the basis for a cause of action."

In Branan v. May, 17 Ga. 136, it was held that one who sent his servant ahead to ascertain the depth of the water in a mill race, and was informed that it was only "ankle deep," was not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the same, and therefore that the defendant, who had unlawfully constructed the mill race across a public road, was liable for the resulting damages.

In several cases the question has arisen as to liability for injuries sustained by driving through water which temporarily submerged a causeway or highway near to, but not crossing, a stream. It should be noted that some of them are analogous to the above cases upon the question of contributory negligence of one in attempting to pass through the water. The following are cases of this class: Smith v. Walker Twp. 117 Mich. 14, 75 N. W. 141, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 500 (where it was held there was contributory negligence in forcing a team through water which reached to the horses' knees and was becoming deeper as they advanced, and which was covered with a coating of ice 2 or 3 inches thick); Merrill v. North Yarmouth, 78 Me. 200, 57 Am. Rep. 794, 3 Atl. 575 (holding that it was negligence for one familiar with the road to attempt to cross a stream 30 to 40 rods wide and in places not less than 3 feet deep, having a current of 5 miles an hour, and carrying large cakes of ice); Schrunk v. St. Joseph, 120 Wis. 223, city is under a duty to exercise ordinary care to keep its streets in reasonably safe condition for public travel. Another is that this duty does not arise except as to streets that the city has undertaken to improve; and yet another is that the manner or method adopted for the improvement of streets that the city undertakes to improve is left to the discretion of the governing authorities of the city. To state these propositions differently, the city may leave its streets, or any of them, in the condition in which they were when first established and set apart for public use, although they may have then been entirely unimproved; but, if it undertakes to improve them, it must exercise ordinary care to put and keep them in reasonably safe condition for public travel, having, however, a discretion as to the character and quality of the repairs or improvements that it will make, subject to the limitation that, when completed, the streets will be reasonably safe for public travel. Clay City v. Roberts, 124 Ky. 594, 99 S. W. 651; Moore v. Harrodsburg, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 384, 105 S. W. 926; Harney v. Lexington, 130 Ky. 251, 113 S. W. 115; Arnold v. Stanford, 113 Ky. 852, 69 S. W. 726; Campbell v. Vanceburg, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1340, 101 S. W. 343; Maysville v. Brooks, 145 Ky. 526, 140 S. W. 665.

Applying, with some little elaboration, these principles to the case we have, we think it clear that the city was under no legal duty to construct a bridge across this river at Second street, and therefore its failure to do so could not be made the basis of an action for negligence. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 728; Leslie County v. Wooten, 115 Ky.

851, 75 S. W. 208. The city, in the exercise of the discretion vested in it, decided, as it had the right to do, not to erect a bridge as a part of Second street, but to macadamize the street on each side of and across the bed of the river, and there is no claim that there were any defects or unsafe places in this improvement as it was made. The death of plaintiff's intestate was not caused by defects in the condition of the street as it was constructed, but by causes attributable to other agencies over which the city had no control, and to conditions that the city did not have any part in creating.

It is, of course, true that if the street had crossed the river on a sufficient bridge, the accident that brought about the death of Gee would not have occurred; but as the city had provided such a way as, in its judgment, was reasonably safe, and the accident was not due to any defect in this way, or in the manner of its construction, the city cannot be made liable on the ground that it should have erected a bridge. A city is only guilty of actionable negligence when defects or unsafe places in a street that it constructs are the proximate cause of the injury complained of. If the street it constructs is reasonably safe, it is not to be made liable for the failure to adopt other methods of construction, or for the failure to do something that it might or might not do, in its discretion. If, however, the city had erected a bridge across this river as a part of Second street, when the law would have imposed upon the city the duty of exercising ordinary care to maintain this bridge in reasonably safe condition for pub-

97 N. W. 946, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 468 (holding there was contributory negligence as matter of law for one familiar with the condition to pass along a submerged highway built on a curved and narrow dirt fill, where there was nothing to suggest the location of the traveled track, and the water at the sides was 8 feet deep); Farnum v. Concord, 2 N. H. 392 (holding that one familiar with the condition of a submerged highway assumed the risk in attempting to pass along the same, and there could be no recovery from a town where the injury occurred by the horse being led off the traveled road); Jung v. Stevens Point, 74 Wis. 547, 43 N. W. 513 (holding that the question of contributory negligence was properly submitted to the jury, where the evidence showed that the line of a submerged road near a river bank was indicated only by a fence along the land side, that a team had just passed over the way in safety, and that the water was not moving rapidly); Harris v. Clinton Twp. 64 Mich. 447, 8 Am. St. Rep. 842, 31 N. W. 425 (holding that the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury where a party with knowledge of the general character and condition of the road had passed safely over it earlier in the day, but upon his return found the water had risen considerably, and the road was built on an embankment, and was crooked and narrow, with no guides or barriers).

Fox v. Glastenbury, 29 Conn. 204, and Thompson v. Bridgewater, 7 Pick. 188, were cases where injuries were sustained in attempting to cross submerged causeways, the former case holding that there could be no recovery, on account of contributory negligence, where it appeared that there was a strong current of water flowing over a causeway, that there were no means of calculating the depth of the water nor the location of the road, and especially where the party might have remained in a position of safety after attempting to make the crossing and finding it dangerous; and the latter case holding that a traveler was not bound to calculate at a distance the effect of containing his route over the submerged road, and was not guilty of negligence in this regard; at least, unless there was gross negligence.

lie travel, but it assumed no liability for its failure to erect one.

Coming now to the question of lights, the same principles apply as do in the construction of streets. A city is under no duty to light its streets; it may, if it chooses to do so, leave them unlighted, and cannot be made liable in damages to a traveler who is injured solely because of its failure to light them.

There is, however, some apparent conflict in the authorities as to the duty and corresponding liability of the city where it undertakes to light its streets, but does not light them sufficiently to give notice to travelers of conditions that would not be unsafe or dangerous in the daytime, but that might be dangerous at night. We think, however, that this apparent conflict is due to the fact that the cases holding the city to the duty of furnishing adequate lights arose when the injury complained of was caused by some defect or unsafe place in the street that could have been avoided if the street had been properly lighted, rather than the failure to furnish sufficient lights when the streets as constructed were in reasonably safe condition for public travel.

Of course, if there are defects or unsafe places in a street, the city is under a duty to exercise ordinary care to warn the traveling public, by lights or other reasonably sufficient means in the nighttime, of these defects or unsafe places, and if it fails to do this, will be liable to any person injured by reason of such failure. Grider v. Jefferson Realty Co. — Ky. — , 116 S. W. 691; Georgetown v. Groff, 136 Ky. 662, 124 S. W. 888.

But where there are no defects or unsafe places in the streets, and they are in a reasonably safe condition for public travel, the city has a broad discretion as to the number and character of lights that it will establish, and cannot be made liable in damages for the failure to furnish such number and quality of lights as would better illuminate the streets than those provided. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1010; Daytona v. Edson, 46 Fla. 463, 34 So. 954, 4 Ann. Cas. 1000; White v. New Bern, 146 N. C. 447, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1166, 125 Am. St. Rep. 476, 59 S. E. 992.

But if we should assume that a city was under a duty to maintain a greater number of lights than it had provided, and such number as would well light its streets, we are quite sure that the city is not required to do more in this respect than furnish such lights as may be necessary to light reasonably well the character of streets that it has constructed; and it is not required to furnish such a number of lights as might be required to make safe that character of 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

street that it was under no duty to construct or maintain. In other words, when the city has provided sufficient lights to make the streets that it has constructed reasonably safe for public travel, this, in any state of case, is its full measure of duty in respect to lights. If this view is correct, it follows that, as the lights furnished were sufficient for the character of street that was constructed, the plaintiff failed to make out a case on account of inadequate lights, as there is no claim that the lights were not sufficient to afford reasonable protection for the character of street that the city had constructed at the place where appellant's intestate lost his life.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

PETER ZEBROWSKI, Plff. in Err.,
v.

WARNER SUGAR REFINING COMPANY.

(83 N. J. L. 558, 83 Atl. 957.)

Master — rules — necessity.

1. No duty to make rules is imposed upon the employer for the safety of his employees in the conduct of his business, where the business is neither complex nor extrahazardous, nor where the dangers incident to it

Headnotes by VOORHEES, J.

Note. — Duty of master to make rules where work is of simple character.

As to duties of master and servant with regard to rules promulgated for the safe conduct of a business, see exhaustive note to Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 43 L.R.A. 305.

It is well recognized that masters promulgate rules for a twofold purpose, that is, for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the various instrumentalities which are brought into use, and for the purpose of lessening the risks which the servants will have to incur; but the law is not interested in the rules promulgated by the master except in so far as such rules are deemed necessary for the protection of the employees.

It is a general rule recognized by all authorities, that whenever the character of the master's work is complex and dangerous, it is the master's duty to promulgate rules to govern the conduct of the work, so as to protect the servants from injury. See Labatt, Mast. & S. 2d ed. § 1114. See also 26 Cyc. § 1157.

The obligation of the master to promulgate rules, however, is subject to some general exceptions. One exception is where danger is not reasonably to be anticipated.

are obvious, or of common knowledge, and are understood by the servants.

Same — custom — negligence.

2. Whether a particular rule should be enacted should not be left to the jury arbitrarily to find, but there should be proof that the practice of promulgating such rules in similar manufactories under similar conditions is general. In the absence of proof that it is the general usage of other employers engaged in similar lines of business, to adopt rules claimed to be necessary, and that they would be practicable and useful, a master will not be charged with negligence for failure to make them.

Same — known risk — assumption.

3. Where the danger is one that a servant should have reasonably anticipated as a result of the practices customarily carried on and participated in by himself, and their dangerous character one that he must have appreciated, whether such danger arose from a lack of rules or a defect in the system, it was a risk known to him, which he assumed.

(June 19, 1912.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligent failure to adopt rules and a safe system of operating an elevator. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

See note to Ahern v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 89.

Another well-recognized exception to the master's duty to promulgate rules is where the work is of a simple character, and it is not shown that it is customary for masters engaged in similar kinds of work to promulgate rules governing similar situations, nor that the safety of the servant would be advanced by such rules.

The above note deals with the duty to promulgate rules where the danger, though great, was not reasonably to have been anticipated, as for instance, where a sudden emergency arises. The present note is concerned only with cases which treat of the duty of the master to promulgate rules where the work is not complex or extrahazardous, and where the dangers surrounding the same are not great.

The rule that the master is not required to promulgate rules where the work is of a simple character has been enunciated and followed in the following cases, where the work was of the character indicated:

Olsen v. North Pacific Lumber Co. 40 C. C. A. 427, 100 Fed. 384 (employee engaged in carrying lumber from saw, injured by carriage starting in usual manner); Larsen v. O'Rourke Engineering Constr. Co. 102 C. C. A. 51, 178 Fed. 541 (fellow servant negligently started engine); Punkow 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. George D. Hendrickson and Merritt Lane for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Marshall Van Winkle and Richard F. Jones, for defendant in error:

Plaintiff, by virtue of his long use of the elevator, was familiar with its use and operation, and with the presence or absence of safe-guards, while the conditions as to the light, whether natural or artificial at the time of the accident, were, of course, perfectly obvious to him.

Vellekoup v. D. Fullerton & Co. 79 N. J. L. 16, 74 Atl. 793.

Plaintiff was negligent in going upon the elevator with a hand truck without first having gone upon the elevator and prevented it from being moved by means of the third or center rope before taking the hand truck upon the elevator.

Smith v. Van Sciver, 58 N. J. L. 190, 33 Atl. 390.

Even had plaintiff, at the time of the accident, been directed to use the elevator, and, at the time, known nothing as to its operation, there could be no recovery against the defendant.

Wiackis v. Standard Oil Co. 79 N. J. L. 554, 76 Atl. 1075; Mika v. Passaic Print Works, 76 N. J. L. 561, 70 Atl. 327.

The trial resulted in a judgment of nonsuit, and the propriety of the court's action

Rep. 496 (unloading logs from flat car); Parmaleau v. International Paper Co. 75 N. H. 69, 71 Atl. 31 (no rules required for moving cars by hand); Morgan v. Hudson River Ore & Iron Co. 133 N. Y. 666, 31 N. E. 234 (employee crawled under car to remove ore which had fallen on track while car was being loaded); Wagner v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. 76 App. Div. 552, 78 N. Y. Supp. 696 (no rules required for anchoring derrick cars); Deebach v. Robert Gair Co. 143 App. Div. 489, 127 N. Y. Supp. 984 (no rules required respecting the closing of trapdoors); Palmieri v.

in ordering it forms the basis of the argument of the plaintiff in error.

The plaintiff, about thirty years of age, a Pole, speaking and understanding English imperfectly, having been in this country but three years, had been employed by the defendant in its sugar refinery to wash bags, for about ten months before the happening of the accident which resulted in the injuries for which the suit was brought, and during which time he had been accustomed to perform the same kind of service as that which he was doing on the day of the accident. His foreman and fellow workmen were Polish. On April 3, 1910, the plaintiff was working on the fourth floor of the defendant's building, picking bags, when the foreman ordered him to go to the eighth floor for a truck and bring it down on the elevator. He went up by the stairway, found the truck, took it to the elevator, which was in a position even with the floor, with the guard gate up, as it should be, and stepped into the car, drawing the truck after him, when the elevator began to move upward, the gate pinching his hands, and he, holding to the arms of the truck, was forced forward with his head down, while his feet went up, his head going through the opening in the safety gate. He was pulled up to the ninth floor, between the wall and the car, causing severe and painful injuries, and mutilating him seriously and permanently.

The declaration avers that the elevator was a dangerous agency, and that it was the duty of the master to warn and instruct the servant, and, further, that the master failed to adopt rules and a safe system of operation. It was a Reidy Standard elevator, put in motion, stopped, and controlled by means of three ropes, one to move it up, another to move it down, and a third or center rope, called a "check rope," which would stop its movement. A further use of the third rope was to hold the elevator in any desired position by twisting the third rope around a catch or shoulder within the car. The plaintiff's insistence is that there was no proper scheme of operation or code of rules promulgated for the guidance of the employees in the operation of the elevator, and that, as elevators are dangerous machines, it was the duty of the defendant to have one man detailed specially to run the car.

The point is further made that there was an entire absence of system governing its use. It will not be denied that an employer may conduct his business in his own way, although another method might be less hazardous. No duty to make rules arises where the business is neither complex nor extrahazardous, nor where the dangers incident to it are obvious, or of common knowledge, and are understood by the servants, and where the practice pursued by the employees renders rules unnecessary. The question has usually arisen and been decided in railroad cases, where the business is admittedly dangerous and complicated, and

S. Pearson & Son, 128 App. Div. 231, 112 N. Y. Supp. 684 (no rules required for moving steam crane); Forey v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 12 N. Y. S. R. 198 (unloading gravel from cars); Johnson v. Portland Stone Co. 40 Or. 438, 67 Pac. 1013, 68 Pac. 425 (drilling out tamping from hole loaded for blast); Wagner v. Portland, 40 Or. 389, 60 Pac. 985, 67 Pac. 300 (taking down electric wires); Blust v. Pacific Teleph. Co. 48 Or. 34, 84 Pac. 847, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 192 (putting up telephone cable); Galvin v. Brown & McCabe, 53 Or. 598, 101 Pac. 671 (unloading slings for putting lumber onto vessel); Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Echols, 87 Tex. 339, 27 S. W. 60, 28 S. W. 517 (piling ties on railroad); Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Graham, 96 Va. 430, 31 S. E. 604 (replacing brake rod on car); Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 336, 64 Am. St. Rep. 785, 28 S. E. 334 (unloading and moving cars by hand); Jackson v. Wheeling Terminal R. Co. 65 W. Va. 415, 64 S. E. 450 (company operating small terminal road not bound to promulgate rules governing running of train); Pern v. Wussow, 144 Wis. 489, 120 N. W. 622 (small gang shoveling dirt onto wagon).

There is no duty to make rules where the work is not complex, and there is no evidence that it is customary in similar cases.

L.R.A.(N.S.) establishments to have rules governing similar situations. Olsen v. North Pacific Lumber Co. 40 C. C. A. 427, 100 Fed. 384.

In Moore Lime Co. v. Richardson, 95 Va. 336, 64 Am. St. Rep. 785, 28 S. E. 334, the court said: "The evidence tends to show that the defendant had not adopted and published rules regulating the manner in which the cars were to be moved. The cars were left on the railroad siding to be loaded, and had to be moved a short distance, as we have seen, on a slight down grade, to the point where they were to be loaded. They were not moved by steam, but by the strength of the gang of hands. The work was neither complex nor difficult. It is not shown that there was anything in the nature of the work which made it necessary for the defendant to enact rules. Its failure to do so was not proof of negligence, unless it appeared from the nature of the work in which the servants were engaged (and it does not) that the master, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have foreseen and anticipated the necessity for such rules."

It should be noted that in a number of the cases cited above the master's work, as a whole, was what could be called complex and extrahazardous, but the particular operations in which the servant was engaged were simple.

W. M. G.

therefore rules are considered necessary in order to afford reasonable protection against the dangers arising to employees to and from each other in the performance of their several and respective reciprocal duties. In Voss v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 59, 41 Atl. 224, the supreme court said: "The general averment [in the declaration] of the failure to exercise reasonable care to make and establish or enforce rules and regulations furnishes no basis of liability against the master. No authorities have been cited to sustain such a proposition, and it cannot be founded upon any sound reasoning. . . . The master is not bound to make any such rule, but is entitled to have his liability to his servant for the dangers of the work determined by the application of the general principles of law regulating and governing the relation of master and servant, to each particular cause or case of injury as it arises, and to the system or manner in which his business is operated or conducted." The principle requiring a code of rules has never been applied except when the nature of the business requires it. The rule is thus stated in 26 Cyc. 1157, where the authorities are collected: "Where a master is engaged in a complex or dangerous business, he must adopt and promulgate such rules and regulations for the conduct of his business and the government of his servants in the discharge of their duties as will afford reasonable protection to them. But no duty to adopt rules is imposed upon the master where the business is neither complex nor extrahazardous, where the dangers incident to the work are obvious, or of common knowledge and fully understood by the servants, or where the practice actually in force renders a rule unnecessary; nor is the master bound to make rules as to how his servants shall conduct themselves outside the scope of their employment, nor as to how business shall be carried on, or any act done which is not carried on or done with his knowledge and permission."

There was no proof in this case that the business was of the complicated character which the law obligates the employer to guard by a scheme of laws. The only evidence on the point was that between 150 and 200 men were employed, and that an elevator must be regarded as dangerous. It is not perceived how, from the mere count of the employees, an inference of a dangerous and complicated business is raised; nor from the presence in a manufacturing plant of a single dangerous agency, a similar situation can be predicated. The plaintiff in error does not stop here, but contends that the specific duty cast upon the master, under these circumstances, was to employ a man specially to operate the elevator.

The plaintiff produced a witness, a builder of elevators, and who had been in the business of installing them in large factories, who testified that "the general custom in large factories is to have one man to run the elevators; that is, in large factories where they have a good many men." The following answer given by him: "The custom is to have one man operate it [elevator] and give the instructions, so far as I can, when I put them up. Have been called on this week to give the instructions,"—was properly stricken out, because it related solely to his own business, and not to customary usage. He also gave further testimony in effect that he did not know that there was any special danger in running an elevator of this kind to the initiated,—to the man who knows how to handle it,—that it was not a complicated operation, but simple, and that a man of ordinary intelligence would learn how to run and operate it in a day or two. The foregoing is the only evidence in the case bearing upon the question of how others ran similar elevators, and it falls short of showing a general usage. It did not necessarily concern a rule of operation to guard against dangers. He had developed the fact that it prevailed in large factories where many men are employed. It was not at all predicated upon the safety of the operation of the appliance, but as well might refer to economy of operation, for rules are intended for economic efficiency, as well as for lessening the risks of servants. Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 737, 26 N. E. 609.

Whether a particular rule should be enacted should not be left to the jury arbitrarily to find, but there should be proof that the practice of promulgating such rules in similar manufactories under similar conditions is general. In the absence of proof that it is the general usage of other employers engaged in similar lines of business, to adopt rules claimed to be necessary, and that they would be practicable and useful, a master will not be charged with negligence for failure to make them. See 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 101 et seq. What standard was proved by way of system to which it was incumbent upon the defendant to conform? It cannot be asserted that in a case like this each jury may say what they deem to be a proper rule, and thus arbitrarily direct the conduct of each manufacturing plant under regulations not general but special, in their application. Such a practice was denied with regard to the construction of railway station platforms, in Feil v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 77 N. J. L. 502, 72 Atl. 362; and to the angle at which barriers to protect travelers on a highway should be placed to warn them of repairs being made, in Halm v. Hudson County, 78 N. J. L. 712, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 946, 76 Atl. 1014; and as to the height of a car step, in Kingsley v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 81 N. J. L. 536, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 338, 80 Atl. 327. Juries may decide whether the ordinary standard has been attained, but they may not impose a standard of their own.

In Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 493, 12 L.R.A. 454, 26 N. E. 1101, cited by the plaintiff, it was proven that the rule which it was alleged should have been made existed on all other railroad companies. In Abel v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 128 N. Y. 662, 28 N. E. 663, an exception was taken to a charge which proceeded as follows: "I think rules might have been suggested not adopted by any company. You have a right to consider whether some rule which occurs to you, even though no company has adopted it, would have been a better rule and given better protection, and such a one as ought to have been adopted and maintained." Upon review, the court of appeals said: "If the charge is to be construed as leaving it to the jury to determine, irrespective of the evidence, what rules ought to have been adopted for the safety of the repairmen, and to find the one way or the other on the question of the defendant's negligence in conformity with a conclusion so reached, the charge was undoubtedly erroneous." So, in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Carruthers, 56 Kan. 309, 43 Pac. 230, the court held that, in the absence of any testimony as to possibility or usefulness of a code of rules, a jury is not justifiable in finding the company negligent in failing to promulgate such system. In Berrigan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 131 N. Y. 582, 30 N. E. 57, the rule is thus stated: "There is no proof in the case that rules for such a case had ever been promulgated by any other railroad company, or that it was reasonable or practicable to provide against the occurrence of such an accident by a rule. The learned trial judge submitted to the jury the question whether the defendant was at fault in omitting to make and publish such a rule. This opened to the jury a wide field for speculation and conjecture. In the absence of some proof on the part of the plaintiff that such a rule was in operation by other roads, or of persons possessing peculiar skill and experience in the management and operation of railroads to the effect that such a rule was necessary or practicable under the circumstances, or unless the necessity and propriety of making and promulgating such a rule was so obvious as to make the question one of common experience and knowledge, the court is not warranted in submitting such a question to the jury." See also Morgan v. Hudson River Ore & Iron Co. 133 N. Y. 666, 31 N. E. 234, where the court said: "The recovery was based entirely on the absence of rules. It was not suggested at the trial, nor is it on this appeal, what particular rule the defendant could have adopted that would have been likely to prevent the accident. No evidence was given that any rule is in use in business of a similar character by other corporations of the same class carrying on like operations, nor was there any evidence by experts or other witnesses to show that any rule was necessary or practicable in such cases. It was left to the jury to say whether or not it was a case for rules, and, if so, what particular rule should have been adopted. We know nothing with respect to the views entertained by the jury on these questions, except so far as they are indicated by their verdict for the plaintiff. It is not probable that they concluded that any definite rule should have been promulgated, but were content to hold that, as the plaintiff was injured, the defendant ought in some way to have prevented it, or in case it did not, respond to him in damages. Almost every conceivable injury that a servant received in the course of his employment may in this way be submitted to a jury, and with the same result. . . . Even if it could be shown, after the accident occurred, that it might have been prevented by adopting and enforcing some suitable rule, that would constitute no proper test of liability. The failure to adopt rules is not proof of negligence, unless it appears, from the nature of the business in which the servant is engaged, that the master, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have foreseen and anticipated the necessity of such precautions."

The plaintiff has failed to bring himself within the principle claimed, because he has not established by proof that the business was complex and extrahazardous, and that the special regulation insisted upon was by general custom adopted by employers in like lines of manufacture. But it is not perceived how, if such proof had in fact been made, it would have been possible for the plaintiff to recover in this case. The plaintiff had acquired knowledge of running the elevator. The accident happened because another employee, on another floor, wishing to make use of it, reached into the car and pulled the rope, causing the elevator to start upward. He admitted that the unannounced starting of the car, by other workmen, was a frequent occurrence, and that he was not only familiar with it, but had so started it himself. He, furthermore, knew that this was customary. He testified that, if anybody wanted it, they took it; that "anybody could take the elevator, and go up to the second or fourth floor or any floor and get off, and then soon another could come after, and that is all. I saw how the others did, then I put my work on the elevator and pulled it up. Yes, often happened when we was on the elevator and working on it and somebody from below started the elevator. I would come with my work down with the elevator and suddenly someone else wanted it." Whether the plaintiff knew of the risk that the elevator might be started by an employee in another floor, when he first entered the employment, is not material, for he had acquired that knowledge during his term of service, and had learned that it was customary for an employee wishing to make use of this agency, to reach in over the gate, pull the rope, and draw the elevator to the floor where he was, and that the one who first did it required the control of it. He had done that himself, and so he knew from his observation and practice, acquired during his service, of the danger, yet he continued in his employment without protest, and he must therefore be held thereby to have assumed this obvious risk. Johnson v. Devoe Snuff Co. 62 N. J. L. 417., 41 Atl. 936.

It is urged that the doctrine of obvious risk is inapplicable, because it is subject to the qualification that the master must take proper care to guard the servant from unnecessary hazards,—citing Abel v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 128 N. Y. 662, 28 N. E. 663; Pakusewski v. Ringwood Co. 81 N. J. L. 552, 79 Atl. 319; and Zellers v. Delany, 80 N. J. L. 452, 78 Atl. 212. The rule is correctly stated in the last case thus: "The known absence of safeguards or precautions cannot prevent a recovery, where the danger that renders them necessary is unknown to the injured servant." The danger that the elevator was subject to movement by a fellow servant in another floor was one that he should have reasonably anticipated as a result of the practices customarily carried on and participated in by himself, and its dangerous character one that he must have appreciated. If the danger arose from a lack of rules or a defect in the system, it was a risk known to him, which he assumed.

The judgment under review will be affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

EXILDA M. STEVENSON

v.

JOHN NELSON AKARMAN, Err., etc., of Annoria Akarman Pall, Deceased, Plff. in Err.

(83 N. J. L. 458, 85 Atl. 166.)

Husband and wife — personal services of wife — right to recover compensation.

A married woman living in the home of her husband cannot maintain an action upon an implied contract by a lodger to pay for personal services rendered by her as nurse in his illness, since, in the absence of express contract, the right of action is in her husband.

(November 18, 1912.)

Note. — Right of married woman to maintain action for board or lodging of, or services rendered to, a third person living in the home.

As is apparent from the title, this note does not purport to cover the general question as to the right of a married woman to recover for services rendered by her, but is confined to services rendered to persons living in the home.

Cases where the board was furnished or the services were rendered at a time when the husband had abandoned or deserted the wife are beyond the scope of the note. The question under annotation presupposes, of course, a liability on the part of the third person, and relates solely to whether the liability is to be enforced by the husband or the wife, or by them jointly.

General rule.

The general rule is that where husband and wife live together, and he provides for the household, and bears the expense of those maintained and lodged therein, and the wife devotes her time and labor to household duties cooking for and attending upon persons living in the family, the sums owed for board and lodging and services are due to the husband, and not to the wife, and that in the absence of an agreement on his part relinquishing his right thereto, the right to receive and recover such sums is in him, and the wife has no legal claim therefor. Flynn v. Gardner, 3 Ill. App. 253; Parker v. Parker, 52 Ill. App. 333; Brown v. Walker, 81 Ill. App. 396; Davis v. Davis, 85 Ind. 167; Lyle v. Gray, 47 Iowa, 153; *McClintic v. ERROR to the Monmouth Circuit of the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover compensation for personal services alleged to have been rendered to defendant's testatrix. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bourgeois & Coulomb, for plaintiff in error:

A wife is not entitled to join with her husband or to sue in her own name alone for the care, attendance upon, or nursing of a sick boarder of her husband in his household.

Garretson v. Appleton, 58 N. J. L. 386, 37 Atl. 150; Peterson v. Christianson, 68 N. J. L. 392, 56 Atl. 288; Oakley v. Emmons, 73 N. J. L. 206, 62 Atl. 996; Sensfelder v. Stokes, 69 N. J. L. 86, 54 Atl. 517.

Mr. Ruliff V. Lawrence for defendant in error.

Gummere, Ch. J. delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by Mrs. Stevenson against the executor of Mrs. Annoria Pall, deceased, to recover for services rendered to her as a nurse during the last seventeen months of her life. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, and the present writ of error is sued out by Mrs. Pall's executor to review the judgment entered thereon.

The proofs on the part of the plaintiff showed that she is a married woman, and Carpenter v. Weller, 15 Hun, 134; Kinert v. Kapp, 50 Pa. Super. Ct. 222.

And although the wife may make the contract for boarding a stranger, and may receive the moneys for the board, it will be presumed that in so doing she acts merely as agent for her husband; these facts do not prove that the compensation for the board is the separate property of the wife, so as to entitle her to maintain an action for the same. Flynn v. Gardner, 3 Ill. App. 253.

The law will not imply an agreement upon the part of the husband that the wife shall receive the compensation. McClintic v. McClintic, 111 Iowa, 615, 82 N. W. 1017.

And this rule holds even though the compensation is promised to the husband and wife jointly; the wife cannot maintain an action for it in her own name, unless the husband sells or assigns his interest in the claim to his wife, previous to the bringing of the suit. Howe v. Hyde, 88 Mich. 91, 50 N. W. 102.

In Kinert v. Kapp, 50 Pa. Super. Ct. 222, it was said that the wife has no right to bring suit in her own name for moneys due for board, unless the boarder promises to pay her.

Thus, a married woman cannot maintain an action for board furnished another while her husband is temporarily absent in search of employment; in such case he has not lost his right of action for such board. Young v. Ward, 24 Ont. App. Rep. 147.

But where a married woman contracts with a guardian to maintain his wards, boards them, washes for them, and cares for them, although the earnings may belong to her husband, if he absconds and she is authorized by court to sue for, collect, and reduce to possession all his outstanding accounts, she may recover in her own name from the guardian out of the estate of the wards for such services. Rooker v. Rooker, 60 Ind. 550.

As a corollary to the general rule stated above, the right to recover for the services of the wife rendered to others, not in any 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

separate business, nor on her separate account, is in the husband, and not in the wife. Reynolds v. Robinson, 64 N. Y. 589; Porter v. Dunn, 131 N. Y. 314, 30 N. E. 122; Birkbeck v. Ackroyd, 11 Hun, 365; Re Mallory, 13 Misc. 595, 35 N. Y. Supp. 155; Farrell v. Harrison, 14 Misc. 462, 35 N. Y. Supp. 1029.

Especially should he be allowed to recover for her services where she makes no claim therefor. Porter v. Dunn, 131 N. Y. 314, 30 N. E. 122.

And this rule is not changed because the arrangements for the boarding were made by the wife in the husband's presence, and the promise was to pay the wife, or the husband and wife jointly. Re Mallory, 13 Misc. 595, 35 N. Y. Supp. 155.

And where a third person is boarded in a home, and in a suit by the wife for the value of the board and for her services, her claim for board is disallowed on the ground that presumptively it was furnished by the husband, and that there was no satisfactory evidence that the claim therefor belonged to her, judgment of such disallowance is no bar to the maintenance of an action by the husband for the value of the board; he was not a party to the former action, and, moreover, the former judgment was consistent with his claim in the succeeding action. Stamp v. Franklin, 144 N. Y. 607, 39 N. E. 634.

Likewise, where a husband makes arrangements to have another person cared for in the home, he may recover the value both of his own services and of the services of his wife, where she renders her services as his assistant, and not with a view to a charge by her in her own name; this is but another corollary to the general rule that she is not entitled to recover in her own right for such services. Switzer v. Kee, 146 Ill. 577, 35 N. E. 160; Tipton County v. Brown, 4 Ind. App. 288, 30 N. E. 925; Hensley v. Tuttle, 17 Ind. App. 253, 46 N. E. 594; Miller v. Dickinson County, 68 Iowa, 102, 26 N. W. 31; Harrington v. Gies, 45 Mich. 374, 8 N. W. 87.

And since payment to the husband in any case will be a bar to a recovery by that during the period covered by the services which are the basis of her claim she resided with her husband at their home in the village of Frenau; that Mrs. Pall came to live with them as a boarder in March, 1909, and remained there until her death in July, 1910, paying her board each week; that during all of that period Mrs. Pall was suffering with sciatic rheumatism, and required considerable care and attention, which were given to her by the plaintiff, who also acted as nurse for the invalid when occasion required; and that those services were rendered to her by the plaintiff without any promise on the part of Mrs. Pall to make any compensation therefor. At the close of the plaintiff's case there was a motion to nonsuit, upon the ground that the proofs disclosed no right of action on the part of the plaintiff against the executor of the decedent. The motion was refused, and in this we think there was error.

Services rendered by a wife in the home the wife, it is immaterial whether she has assigned her claim to her husband or not. Miller v. Dickinson County, 68 Iowa, 102, 26 N. W. 31.

The husband's right to recover for the wife's services is especially clear where she makes no claim for herself, but by appearing for him in the case ratifies his contract for the services of them both. Harrington v. Gies, 45 Mich. 374, 8 N. W. 87.

But under a statute providing that any married woman may perform any labor or services on her sole and separate account, and may sue as if sole in regard to such labor or services, a married woman may recover in her own name the value of her services in the home. Allen v. Eldridge, 1 Colo. 287; Hogg v. Lobb, 7 Houst. (Del.) 399, 32 Atl. 631 (services as a nurse, rendered to a regular boarder, the court considering such services to be outside the usual duties of the wife); Arnold v. Rifner, 16 Ind. App. 442, 45 N. E. 618; Fowle v. Tidd, 15 Gray, 94; Lillard v. Wilson, 178 Mo. 145, 77 S. W. 74; Burley v. Barnhard, 9 N. Y. S. R. 587.

The action should be brought in her name alone, and not jointly with her husband. Lillard v. Wilson, 178 Mo. 145, 77 S. W. 74.

And under a statute providing that property of every kind owned, acquired, or earned by a woman before or during her marriage, shall belong to her, and not to her husband, a married woman may maintain an action in her own name for services in nursing and caring for a boarder in the home, although the contract for board was made by the husband. Lewis's Estate, 156 Pa. 337, 27 Atl. 35.

And under a statute providing that every married woman shall hold to her own use, free from control of her husband, all property at any time earned, and may sue in her own name upon any contract by her made, where the husband refuses to make the contract for her services, but allows her to make her own contract, she should not join her husband as plaintiff in an action upon such contract, but should sue alone. Cooper v. Alger, 51 N. H. 172; Lillard v. Wilson, 178 Mo. 145, 77 S. W. 74.

A married woman who is engaged in the business of keeping a boarding house, and with whom the contract for boarding is made, may maintain an action in her own name to recover the value of the board furnished. Cavanaugh v. Corckran, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 655; Nunn v. Beauchamp, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 93.

And her husband is not a necessary party. Nunn v. Beauchamp, supra.

But under a statute allowing a married woman to contract as if unmarried, but not affecting the common-law right of a husband to the earnings and services of his wife when not received or rendered expressly upon her sole and separate account, where the wife renders services such as nursing to a stranger under a contract made by the husband, the action on such contract for the value of the services is properly brought in the name of the husband alone. Holcomb v. Harris, 166 N. Y. 257, 59 N. E. 820.

Where a married woman keeps a boarding house and makes contracts for board, it has been held that the husband is owner of the demand or cause of action upon such contracts, and is entitled to the recovery, and husband and wife cannot sue together thereon. Dunderdale v. Grymes, 16 How. Pr. 195.

—where husband agrees that wife may have compensation.

There is, however, a well-recognized exception to the general rule stated above in cases where the husband consents that his wife shall take boarders or lodgers, or perform personal services to strangers residing in the home, and agrees with her that she shall receive the compensation therefor. In such cases the wife may maintain an action in her own name for such compensation. Vincent v. Ireland, 2 Penn. (Del.) 580, 49 Atl. 172; Eichberg v. Bandman, 74 Ga. 834; Parker v. Parker, 52 Ill. App. 333; Lindsey v. Lindsey, 116 Iowa, 480, 89 N. W. 1096; Mason v. Dunbar, 43 Mich. 407, 38 Am. Rep. 201, 5 N. W. 432; Riley v. Mitchell, 36 Minn. 3, 29 N. W. 588; Strayer v. Leonard, 13 Mont. 435, 34 Pac. 880; Stevens v. Cunningham, 181 N. Y. 454, 74 N. E. 434; Carver v. Wagner, 51 App. Div. 47, 64 N. Y. Supp. 747; Briggs v. Devoe, 89 App. Div. 115, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1063; Perry v. Blumenthal, 119 App. Div. 663, 104 N. Y. Supp. 127; Stokes v. Pease, 79 Hun, 304, 29 N. Y. Supp. 430; Sands v. Sparling, 82 Hun, 401, 31 N. Y. Supp. 251; Lashaw v. Croissant, 88 Hun, 206, 34 N. Y. Supp. 667.

And where the husband so consents, and of her husband to a lodger residing with them, even though they consist largely of the personal attendance of the wife, and include the nursing of the lodger when sick, are within the range of her domestic duties, and, without an express contract or promise made by the lodger to the wife, the latter cannot maintain an action against him, or, in the case of his death, his executor, for the recovery of compensation for such services. The implied contract which the law raises in such a case is that the person to whom such services are rendered will make reasonable compensation therefor to the husband, and not to the wife. Garretson v. Appleton, 58 N. J. L. 386, 37 Atl. 150; Peterson v. Christianson, 68 N. J. L. 392, 56 Atl. 288; Oakley v. Emmons, 73 N. J. L. 206, 62 Atl. 996.

There having been nothing in the proofs offered on the part of the defendant to vary the situation as exhibited by the testimony in the plaintiff's case, the judgment under review must be reversed.

the wife recovers for care and nursing and preparing the food, but waives her cause of action for the value of the uncooked food furnished, the husband cannot subsequently recover for the latter. Bowers v. Smith, 28 N. Y. S. R. 346, 8 N. Y. Supp. 226.

No distinction can be drawn between the services of a wife, performed in and about the house, and those performed elsewhere, as a foundation for a claim to recover for her own benefit. If the husband can consent to her giving her time and attention to the management of any regular business away from her home, and if this makes the business her own, there seems to be no conclusive reason why he may not consent to her making her services in the household available in the accumulation of independent means on her own behalf. He relinquishes his right to her services in the one case no more than in the other, and perhaps in the last case the ordinary course of marital relation is least disturbed. Mason v. Dunbar, 43 Mich. 407, 38 Am. Rep. 201, 5 N. W. 432.

Under such circumstances, the married woman is engaged in the prosecution of a separate calling and the person served incurs no liability to the husband, and the latter is vested with no cause of action. Stevens v. Cunningham, 181 N. Y. 454, 74 N. E. 434; Carver v. Wagner, 51 App. Div. 47, 64 N. Y. Supp. 747.

Although, under the statute giving the wife a right to contract as if unmarried, the husband is still entitled to the services of his wife, he may forego his right to her earnings. Carver v. Wagner, supra.

So, a married woman may recover from her husband's estate the value of board furnished to a stranger in the home, where the husband consented to that arrangement, and gave her notes as evidence of her claim. Re Kinmer, 14 N. Y. S. R. 618.

And in a suit by a married woman for the value of board and washing furnished to a third person, the testimony of the husband in his wife's behalf amounts to a virtual assignment of any claim he may have in the right of action, and the wife may recover in her own name. Ennis v. Nusbaum, — Kan. —, 133 Pac. 537.

And where the boarder understands and declares that his liability is to the wife, and not to the husband, and the husband is shown to have consented to that arrangement, the representatives of such boarder should not be allowed to urge that payment to the wife for board and personal services should be refused upon the ground that the marital right of the husband will thereby be infringed. That is a personal right, to be exercised by him alone, so far as they are concerned. Parker v. Parker, 52 Ill. App. 333.

But in Woodbeck v. Havens, 42 Barb. 66, it was held that at common law, a married woman cannot maintain an action in her own name for services rendered to a stranger in the home, although the agreement was made with her and with the knowledge of her husband, and without any objection on his part. Her earnings belong to him, the promise to pay her amounts in law to a promise to pay him, and his assent amounts simply to an assent that she may labor on his account, and receive the money for him as his agent. Nor is there any relation of trust between husband and wife; they are in law but one person as regards such a claim.

In Mason v. Dunbar, 43 Mich. 407, 38 Am. Rep. 201, 5 N. W. 432, where a father was cared for by his son and the son's wife, all residing together as members of one family, upon the father's farm, it was said that the presumption was against any contract relation, and that no presumption could arise that claims were to be made by either against another for services; and under such conditions it was said not to be enough to show that the husband had given his wife her services, but that the father must also understand that contract relations existed between himself and his son's wife, and that she expected compensation, and the father must expressly or impliedly assent thereto. The court remarked that great wrong would sometimes be done if each might present claims and recover thereon where the father supposed, and had a right to suppose, that he was dealing with his son alone.

But in Riley v. Mitchell, 36 Minn. 3, 29 N. W. 588, it was expressly declared to be immaterial that the third person nursed in the home did not know of the understanding between husband and wife that she should receive the compensation.

—joinder of husband and wife.

In some cases, the right of the wife to join the husband in a suit for the value of personal services rendered to a third person in the home is based upon the ground that she is the meritorious cause of action.

Thus where the promise of compensation for the care of a stranger in a home is made to the wife, and she performs the services, she is the meritorious cause of action, and may join the husband as plaintiff in a suit based thereon. Baird v. Fletcher, 50 Vt. 603.

And where husband and wife render services to another jointly, they may properly join as plaintiffs in an action for the recovery of compensation therefor. Jordan v. Hubbard, 26 Ala. 433; Candy v. Smith, 6 Mackey, 303; Brinton v. Thomas, 138 Mo. App. 64, 119 S. W. 1016; Lambert v. Hodgdon, — Mo. App. —, 154 S. W. 450.

But in Candy v. Smith, 6 Mackey, 303, it was said that a married woman who owns the premises where the family lives must sue alone for the value of lodgings therein upon a promise made to her; the husband cannot join her as plaintiff in such an action. H. C. Sh.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

v.

DENVER & RIO GRANDE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— N. M. —, 131 Pac. 980.)

Carriers — regulation of rates.

1. The legislative branch of the government has the right to regulate rates and Headnotes by ROBERTS, Ch. J.

Note. — Power to require carrier to keep agent at station.

This note includes only cases dealing with the question of the power to compel the maintenance of an agent at points where trains stop, and does not include cases involving the establishment or re-establishment of a station.

As to power to compel the establishment of a station or the stopping of trains at a station, where none previously existed, see note to Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 821.

As to whether a railroad company can be required to establish or maintain a station that will not pay expenses, see Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Nebraska State R. Commission, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 444.

As to the power of a state to compel a railroad company to install and maintain a telegraph operator at one of its stations, see the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. State, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393, and note appended thereto.

Although the power of a state to re- 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

compel the performance of other duties on the part of the public service corporations; but such rates so established, or required made, must be reasonable, both to the carrier or public service corporation and to the public.

Same — duties of legislature and court.

2. While the fixing of rates, or the determination of the facilities to be afforded, in the first instance, is a legislative question, the determination of the reasonableness and lawfulness of the rate or other requirement is a judicial function.

Same — constitutional law — review of order of commission.

3. Sections 7 and 8 of article 11 of the state Constitution construed.

(a) Held, that said sections provide for a review by the supreme court of the reasonableness and lawfulness of an order made by the state corporation commission, upon the evidence adduced before the commission; that such sections do not deny due process, because on such review additional evidence is not allowed, and because the court must act on the evidence already taken; the court not being bound by the findings of the commission, and the party affected having the right, on the original hearing, to introduce evidence as to all material points.

(b) Held, further, that where the cause is removed to the supreme court by the commission, upon failure to comply with the order within the time limited, by the public service corporation, additional evidence cannot be introduced.

(c) Where, however, the cause is removed by one of the parties, and a showing is made that new evidence has been discovered, which the party, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could not have presented at the original hearing, the cause quire a carrier under proper circumstances to maintain an agent at a station would seem on principle to be beyond dispute, the question as to what are reasonable and proper circumstances under which the carrier can be compelled to perform this duty seems seldom to have arisen. Indeed, in the case of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. State, 74 Neb. 77, 103 N. W. 1087, which dealt with this question, the court said that counsel for the respective parties agreed that no similar case could be found in the books; but it was said that the principles by which the case was to be decided were not difficult of discovery, and had not failed of announcement in the courts.

The rule by which the court should be guided in determining whether a railroad company should be compelled to appoint and maintain a station agent, as laid down in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. State, supra, is that the court should interfere only in exceptional cases in which it clearly appears that there has been an abuse of discretion by the railroad company, amounting in effect to the denial of a public right or the repudiation of a public obligation may be remanded to the commission for the taking of such further evidence.

(d) Where the cause is removed to the supreme court by one of the parties within the time limited, the court may, of its own motion, remand the same to the commission for the taking of further evidence.

(e) The supreme court under the constitutional provisions, upon the evidence, determines the reasonableness and lawfulness of the order made by the commission; if it finds such order to be reasonable and lawful, it enforces it; if, on the other hand, it finds such order to be unreasonable or unlawful, it refuses to enforce the same.

(f) The direction in § 7 that the supreme court shall "decide such cases on their merits" means that the court shall decide such cases on a consideration of their substance and the legal right involved, in opposition to a decision based upon mere defects of procedure or the technicalities thereof; that the court shall do justice irrespective of informal, technical, or dilatory objections.

(g) The court decides, upon the merits, the question of the reasonableness and lawfulness of the order made by the commission, and whether the defendant shall be compelled to comply therewith.

(h) The defendant in such cases, under the Constitution, is not entitled to a trial by jury, and a denial of such right does not violate either the Federal or state Constitution.

(i) The railroad company, by its general appearance before the commission without objection, waived all irregularities preceding such hearing.

which the company has assumed. It was accordingly held in that case that there had been no such abuse of discretion as to warrant the interference of the court to compel the maintenance of a station agent at a point where the conditions appear as follows: A village consisting of eight buildings, and having a population of forty persons, was situated between two other towns on the same railroad 6 and 7 miles distant respectively, and 5 miles distant from a town on another line, all of which were places of considerable size and business; within a radius of 4 miles of the station in question, there were only twenty-nine families; little passenger business and inconsiderable freight business was done, except for the shipment at certain seasons of the year of live stock and hay in carload lots, for which provision was already made for ordering cars.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. State, 24 Okla. 331, 103 Pac. 613, where the state corporation commission had made an order requiring the defendant to maintain an agent at a station and establish a depot instead of a mere waiting room, it was held that the presumption of the reasonableness of the order was not overcome by evidence as follows: A town of 750 people, the population of which was increased by an adjoining settlement to approximately 1,000, having six mercantile establishments, was situated between two regular stations on the same line of railroad 2½ and 3 miles distant respectively; little business was done at the point in question, but the exact amount did not appear, except that the freight and passenger earnings combined exceeded $300 per month; six passenger trains stopped daily at said station, but baggage could not be checked and only prepaid freight was delivered; the expense of repairing and improving the building for a depot would be approximately $500, but the expense of employing an agent was not shown.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain a railroad company from withdrawing a station agent, in order to protect one whose deed to the railroad company of the land upon which the station is situated contains a provision requiring the maintenance thereof, the grantor on grounds of public policy being remitted to an action for damages. Fritts v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 75 N. J. Eq. 384, 73 Atl. 92. The court said that public policy required that railroad companies be free properly to serve the public, which they could not do if the courts enforced private contracts concerning the number of trains and places of stopping, such enforcement tending to hamper them in the running of their roads; and, by inference at least applied the same reasoning to the maintenance of a station agent. It was also stated, although the point was not directly decided, that the matter should have been submitted in the first instance to the railroad commission.

The case of Fritts v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. supra, following an early decision in a suit to restrain the discontinuance of a station, is apparently authority also for the proposition that injunction is not the proper remedy to protect the rights of the public in regard to the maintenance of a station agent; but that the proper remedy is mandamus to compel the performance of the duty that the railroad company owes to the public to maintain an agent.

In Winnipeg Jobbers & Shippers' Assn. v. Canadian P. R. Co. 8 Can. R. Cas. 151, an action before the board of railroad commissioners for Canada, a general order was made that at stations where the total freight and passenger earnings amounted to $15,000 per year, railroad companies should appoint and maintain permanent agents, and at points where the business consisted principally of shipping grain, and the shipments amounted to at least 50,000 bushels, agents should be appointed and maintained during the grain shipping season. It was said that the question was as to what amount of traffic warranted the appointment of a permanent agent, and that the Minnesota law in this respect was a reasonable one, which required the appointment of a permanent agent where the total freight and passenger earnings amounted to $15,000. R. E. H.

Public service commission — review of order — findings.

4. While it is proper for the commission to make findings of fact, such findings have no force or effect in the supreme court, as this court is required to pass upon the merits of the case without indulging in any presumptions, and the court forms its own independent judgment as to each requirement of the order, upon the evidence.

Mandamus — discretionary duty.

5. Mandamus does not lie to compel the performance of a duty calling for the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the person at whose hands the performance is required; therefore the order made by the commission should be definite and certain.

Carrier — maintenance of adequate facilities — questions involved.

6. Under the Constitution the commission is authorized "to require railway companies to maintain adequate depots, stock pens, station buildings, agents, and facilities for the accommodation of passengers and for receiving and delivering freight and express," and such as may be reasonable and just. Held, that, in determining what are "adequate facilities," the court must take into consideration the volume of business, the revenue derived by the railroad therefrom, the number of people to be accommodated, the present facilities, and all the facts and circumstances, considering on the one hand the rights of the stockholders of the railroad, and on the other the rights of the public.

Same — enforcement of duties.

7. A railroad company is chartered for the purpose of transporting freight and passengers, and so long as it continues to exercise its rights under such charter, and does not elect to surrender up its franchise, the performance of the duty for which it was called into existence and given its being may be enforced, even though such performance may entail a pecuniary loss.

Same — station facilities — provision.

8. While it is the absolute duty of a railroad company to transport freight and passengers, it is not its prime duty to provide depots, waiting rooms, station agents, telephone and telegraph facilities.

Same — expense — consideration of.

9. When a railroad company is called upon to perform an absolute duty, the question of expense is not to be considered; but when the duty sought to be enforced is only an incident to the main duty, the question of expense is to be taken into consideration in connection with the public necessities.

Public service commission — establishment of railroad stations.

The Constitution does not confer upon the corporation commission the right to arbitrarily establish a station or to require a station agent, regardless of the expense entailed upon the company, or the benefit to be derived by the public.

Carrier — station facilities — adequacy.

11. The facilities afforded at any station to the general public must, in a measure, be commensurate with the patronage and receipts from that portion of the public to whom the service is rendered.

Same — telegraph service — necessity.

12. It is not reasonable to require the installation of telegraph service for the purpose of bulletining trains, where the cost of such service is out of proportion to the revenue derived from that portion of the traveling public benefited thereby.

(April 3, 1913.)

REMOVAL by the state corporation commission for the opinion of the Supreme Court of a proceeding in which defendant had failed to comply with its order with respect to the maintenance of adequate facilities at a certain station along the line of its road. Order not enforced.

Statement by Roberts, Ch. J.:

On the 7th day of May, 1912, certain residents of Tres Piedras, a small town in Taos county, New Mexico, about one-half mile distant from a station on the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, bearing the same name, petitioned the railroad commission to require said railroad company "to maintain adequate station facilities for the accommodation of passengers and for receiving and delivering freight and express at its station of Tres Piedras," and further asked that said railroad company be required to maintain an agent at said station through whom the patrons of said railroad "may transact business with such railway company."

Upon the filing of such petition of complaint, the commission had more or less correspondence with the officials of such railroad company in an endeavor to secure the facilities requested "by mediation," as required by § 2 of chap. 78, S. L. 1912; but failing to come to an agreement therefor, on July 30, 1912, a notice of hearing was served upon the railroad company, together with a copy of the order of the commission requiring such hearing, which order was as follows:

Informal complaint having been presented to this commission by and on behalf of parties residing at and in the vicinity of Tres Piedras, a station on the line of railway operated by the said the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company within the state of New Mexico, to the effect that said company had failed to maintain at said station adequate facilities for the accommodation of passengers and for receiving and delivering freight and express, and that said company was not maintaining an agent as said station, to the great detriment of the complainants; the commission having made a personal examination into the matter, and it appearing to this commission that conditions are such as to require a more thorough investigation; it is hereby ordered that a hearing on the matter set out in said complaint be held at the office of the state corporation commission at Santa Fé, New Mexico, commencing at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M., on the 30th day of July, 1912, at which time and place the said complainants will be heard in support of the allegations of their complaint, and the said railway company will be heard in rebuttal thereto. The parties in interest will be notified accordingly. Done at the office of the state corporation commission at Santa Fé, New Mexico, on the 15th day of July, 1912.

Hugh H. Williams, Chairman.

Attest: George W. Armijo, Clerk.

Upon the date fixed, the cause was heard upon the evidence of Edwin B. Seward, for the complainants, and W. D. Shea, for the railroad company. From the evidence adduced it appears that Tres Piedras was established as a station on the Denver & Rio Grande Railway in 1880, and had been continuously maintained until December, 1910, with waiting room, freight room, and the usual station accommodations, including an agent, who was also a telegraph operator, and who, in conjunction with some arrangement by the railroad with the Western Union Telegraph Company, received and transmitted commercial messages. In December, 1910, the railroad company withdrew the agent from said station, and thereafter maintained no facilities for passengers at said place, but did stop its trains there and take on and let off passengers. Freight was received and delivered at said station, but, having no agent, freight charges were required to be paid in advance upon all incoming freight. When freight reached Tres Piedras, it was unloaded by the train crew and placed inside the freight room, the key to which was kept by the wife of the section foreman, who resided in the station, and who, upon application, delivered the key to persons receiving freight, who would then unlock the door and select their freight. It appears that no serious loss to any person had occurred by reason of such arrangements, but that it was more or less inconvenient to prepay the charges upon freight ordered, and also to personally superintend the loading of freight when it was shipped out.

general store run by Mr. Seward, the witness who testified, and a harness shop. It is also headquarters for the Forest Reserve, where, all told, forty people are employed; but many of these employees are not permanently located in the town. Outside the members of the Forest Reserve, there are perhaps twenty-five residents within the town, and within a radius of 10 miles there are probably 150 people, not all of whom, however, are served by this station, as Servilleta, a station 10 miles from Tres Piedras, is also within the radius. Mr. Seward says that, all told, there are forty families who would receive freight at this station, should they have goods shipped in.

For the twelve months ending December 31, 1911, the earnings on passengers and freight, both inbound and outbound, were:

Freight forwarded	$1,075 81
Freight received	1,850 66
Passengers	581 23
Total	$3,507 70

Of this amount, $868.26 was earned during the month of July by the shipment of several carload lots of wool by wool growers. No evidence was introduced tending to show the earnings and operating expenses of the road in New Mexico.

Mr. Seward did not testify that he had ever been a passenger upon the road, but he did testify to inconveniences suffered by people who sought passage, in that there was no shelter at the station in inclement weather, and no means of ascertaining the time of the arrival and departure of trains, except by using the telephone in his store and calling up Servilleta, 10 miles away. No contention was made, or supported by the evidence, that the installation of a telephone or telegraph service was necessary for the proper operation of the road, in order to secure the safety of employees and passengers, or to facilitate the service. The principal complaint of Mr. Seward in that regard seemed to be that there was no commercial telegraph station maintained at that place.

Upon the evidence taken, the commission made the following statement of facts, viz.: "The evidence adduced at the above hearing on behalf of the complainants shows the following: That station agent and adequate station facilities had been maintained at Tres Piedras for a period of thirty years prior to December, 1910. That there are some three or four outlying communities in addition to the town of Tres Piedras, which draw their supplies from the town of Tres Piedras. That Tres Piedras is a distributing point to those outlying communities in the United States mail matters. That the freight receipts by the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company at Tres Piedras for freight received and forwarded amounted to between $3,000 and $4,000 in the year 1911. That there are considerable wool shipments from the station of Tres Piedras in the wool season of July each year. That the station building of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company is kept closed to passengers, and that persons desiring to take a train at Tres Piedras must wait on the platform in inclement weather for the arrival of trains. That there is no means of communication from the railroad station for purposes of obtaining information as to the movements of trains, or whether or not they are running on time. That the freight received at Tres Piedras is unloaded at owner's risk, and it frequently happens that others than the consignee get this freight, on account of no representative of the railroad company being present to check out said freight. The evidence further shows that Mr. E. B. Seward pays a major portion of the receipts on account of freight shipments at this station, he being a general merchant in the town of Tres Piedras. The claim of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company by its Mr. E. N. Clark, in his letter of June 7, 1912, to the commission, and testimony of their witness W. D. Shea, that the business of the station did not justify its being kept open, that the station was not self-sustaining, that it would have to be operated at a monthly loss to the company, if an agent were maintained,—is not borne out by the facts as shown in this cause."

And upon the facts so found the commission made the following order: "This commission holds railroad interests are not the only interests to be served at this station, owing to the fact that this railroad is a public service corporation and the interests of the public are coextensive with those of the defendant company, and the public is entitled to a reasonable degree of service in return for the patronage afforded. In view of these various facts as shown by the record in this cause, it is hereby ordered by the commission that the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company open its station building at the town of Tres Piedras for the purpose of affording accommodations to the traveling public who may desire to take a train at Tres Piedras or alight therefrom, and provide suitable seats, fuel, and water for the comfort of said passengers. It is further ordered by the commission that the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company maintain a representative at this station, whose duty it shall be to receive freight and properly store same in freight station to protect same from pillage and the elements, and to properly check out such freight to the rightful owners when called for. It is further ordered by the commission that some adequate means of communication be maintained at this station for the purpose of obtaining information as to the running of trains. Whether this be by telephone or telegraph is left to the discretion of the company. This order shall be effective on and after the 15th day of September, A. D. 1912. Done at the office of the state corporation commission in the city of Santa Fe, New Mexico, on this 22d day of August, A. D. 1912."

Defendant neglected to comply with the order, and the commission removed the cause to this court, in compliance with the provisions of § 7 of article 11 of the Constitution of New Mexico.

Mr. Frank W. Clancy, Attorney General, for complainants:

The commission is much more than a mere administrative body.

Roberts, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Before reviewing the order of the state corporation commission, for the purpose of determining the reasonableness and lawfulness of the same, it will be necessary for us to consider and dispose of numerous constitutional questions raised by defendant, and questions of practice and procedure interposed by both parties. We believe that many of these questions will best be solved by a general résumé of the provisions of the Constitution under which they arise, and a statement of our views in regard thereto, supported by such authorities as we have been able to find, bearing upon the questions involved.

The corporation commission of New Mexico was created by § 1 of article 11 of the Constitution of the state, and by § 7 of said article it is provided: "The commission shall have power and be charged with the duty of fixing, determining, supervising, regulating, and controlling all charges and rates of railway, express, telegraph, telephone, sleeping car, and other transportation and transmission companies and common carriers within the state; to require railway companies to provide and maintain adequate depots, stock pens, station buildings, agents, and facilities for the accommodation of passengers and for receiving and delivering freight and express; and to provide and maintain necessary crossings, culverts, and sidings upon and alongside of their roadbeds, whenever, in the judgment of the commission, the public interest demand, and as may be reasonable and just. The commission shall also have power and be charged with the duty to make and enforce reasonable and just rules requiring the supplying of cars and equipment for the use of shippers and passengers, and to require all intrastate railways, transportation companies, or common carriers to provide such reasonable safety appliances in connection with all equipment as may be necessary and proper for the safety of its employees and the public, and as are now or may be required by the Federal laws, rules, and regulations governing interstate commerce. The commission shall have power to change or alter such rates, to change, alter, or amend its orders, rules, regulations, or determinations, and to enforce the same in manner prescribed herein; provided, that, in the matter of fixing rates of telephone and telegraph companies, due consideration shall be given to the earnings, investment, and expenditure as a whole within the state. The commission shall have power to subpoena witnesses and enforce their attendance before the commission, through any district court or the supreme court of the state, and through such court to punish for contempt; and it shall have power, upon a hearing, to determine and decide any question given to it herein, and in case of failure or refusal of any person, company, or corporation to comply with any order within the time limit therein, unless an order of removal shall have been taken from such order by the company or corporation to the supreme court of this state, it shall immediately become the duty of the commission to remove such order, with the evidence adduced upon the hearing, with the documents in the case, to the supreme court of this state. Any company, corporation, or common carrier which does not comply with the order of the commission within the time limited therefor, may file with the commission a petition to remove such cause to the supreme court, and in the event of such removal by the company, corporation, or common carrier, or other party to such hearing, the supreme court may upon application, in its discretion or of its own motion, require or authorize additional evidence to be taken in such cause; but in the event of removal by the commission, upon failure of the company, corporation, or common carrier, no additional evidence shall be allowed. The supreme court, for the consideration of such causes arising hereunder, shall be in session at all times, and shall give precedence to such causes. Any party to such hearing before the commission shall have the same right to remove the order entered therein to the supreme court of the state, as given under the provisions hereof to the company or corporation against which such order is directed. In addition to the other powers vested in the supreme court by this Constitution and 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the laws of the state, the said court shall have the power and it shall be its duty to decide such cases on their merits, and carry into effect its judgments, orders, and decrees made in such cases, by fine, forfeiture, mandamus, injunction, and contempt, or other appropriate proceedings."

Section 8 is as follows: "The commission shall determine no question, nor issue any order in relation to the matters specified in the preceding section, until after a public hearing held upon ten days' notice to the parties concerned, except in case of default after such notice."

Other sections of the article will not be incorporated in this opinion, as they have no bearing upon the issues involved, but it is perhaps pertinent to add that § 12 makes the provision of the article applicable to all corporations doing business in New Mexico and subject to state supervision.

The provisions of our Constitution are peculiar to New Mexico. So far as we have been able to ascertain, no other state, either by statute or constitutional provision, has the same method of procedure. All similar commissions, whether the creatures of statute or constitutional provisions, are designed to control and regulate public service corporations; to secure the safety of employees; the protection of the traveling public; and to compel such corporations to discharge their duty to the public. The matter of such regulation is primarily a legislative function, but experience has demonstrated the inability of the various legislative assemblies to cope with the problem, charged as they are with so many other diversified duties, and their sessions usually of limited duration.

While the right of the legislature of a state to regulate rates and compel the performance of other duties on the part of public service corporations has always been recognized by the courts, the rule that such rates, so established, must be reasonable, both to the carrier or public service corporation and to the public, is equally well settled. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 402, 702.

While the fixing of the rates, or the determination of the facilities to be afforded, in the first instance, is a legislative question, the determination of the reasonableness and lawfulness of the rate or other requirement is a judicial function. This being true, it was early recognized that legislative assemblies could not give to such questions the required time to investigate and determine in advance the reasonableness and justness of the proposed rate or other requirement, necessitating, as such a question would, long and protracted hearings and intricate knowledge of such matters. For this reason, we apprehend, the plan was devised, now in vogue in practically all the states, and adopted by the national government, of creating commissions supposed to be made up of especially trained men, and the delegation to such bodies of administrative and legislative powers. Such bodies are given great latitude and power in investigating all questions, and upon them is conferred the duty of fixing rates and requiring proper facilities for the public accommodation.

The final action of the commission, or rate-making body, was, in many instances, attended by long and protracted litigation, through various courts, before the reasonableness and lawfulness of the rate was finally established. The public service companies, not infrequently, would render no assistance whatever to the rate-making body when the matter was under investigation, so that body could arrive at a just rate, and, after the rate was established, would go into the courts and there disclose facts that would clearly demonstrate the unreasonableness of the rate, and compel its cancellation and revocation. By this method the almost impossible task of securing justice for the public was clearly discernible. To overcome this difficulty, plans were devised by which the public service corporation was required to present all its evidence before the commission in advance of the fixing of the rate or other requirement, so that the commission would have the benefit of such knowledge as it might impart, and thereby be enabled to arrive at a just conclusion, if possible. From the action of the commission in fixing the rate or other determination, an appeal or review in the courts was provided, for the determination of the reasonableness and lawfulness of the order made, but upon the evidence taken in advance before the commission. If the court found the action of the commission unlawful or unreasonable, it was set aside. That such procedure does not violate the Constitution of the United States, and is authorized, was held by the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Washington ex rel. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Fairchild, 224 U. S. 510, 56 L. ed. 863, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535, where the court had under consideration the Washington statute (Session Laws 1905, chap. 81, as amended March 16, 1907, chap. 226). The method provided by the statute of Washington was for a hearing before the commission, upon notice in advance to the company, as to the proposed order which the commission was asked or was proposing to make, at which hearing the company had the right to appear by counsel, cross-examine the witnesses produced by the complainants or commission, and to introduce such evidence as it desired. After such investigation the commission made such order as it saw proper, and, if the company affected thereby deemed it contrary to law, it applied to the superior court of the proper county for a writ of review, for the purpose of having its reasonableness and lawfulness inquired into and determined. In the superior court, the cause was heard without the intervention of a jury, on the evidence and exhibits introduced before the commission and certified to by it. Upon such hearing the superior court entered an order either affirming or setting aside the order of the commission under review, and remanding the cause back to the commission for further action. If such order was affirmed, the right of appeal to the supreme court was given.

In the case of Washington ex rel. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Fairchild, supra, it was contended that the Washington statute failed to furnish an adequate hearing or opportunity for judicial review, especially in prohibiting the submission to the court of competent evidence as to the unreasonableness of the order; and, further, that there was no evidence of a public necessity, and that the order was void as taking property without due process of law. Speaking of the objection that the statute failed to furnish an adequate hearing or opportunity for judicial review, the court says:

"So that, where the taking is under an administrative regulation, the defendant must not be denied the right to show that, as a matter of law, the order was so arbitrary, unjust, or unreasonable as to amount to a deprivation of property in violation of the 14th Amendment. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 462, 702; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Tompkins, 176 U. S. 167, 173, 44 L. ed. 417, 420, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336.

"2. This was recognized by the supreme court of the state, which held that this constitutional right was not denied, but that the statute furnished, first, an adequate opportunity to be heard before the commission, and then provided for a judicial review by authorizing the company to test the validity of the order in the superior court. Both of these rulings are assigned as error by the Oregon Company. It complains that the statute did not afford it the means of making a defense before the commission, and yet required it to attack the reasonableness of the order on such evidence as it might have been able to produce before the administrative body. If this were true, the defendant's position would be correct, for the hearing which must precede the taking of property is not a mere form. The carrier must have the right to secure and present evidence material to the issue under investigation. It must be given the opportunity by proof and argument to controvert the claim asserted against it before a tribunal bound not only to listen, but to give legal effect to what has been established. But, as construed by the state court, all these rights were amply secured by the statute which declared that the commission, 'after a full hearing,' might require track connection. On such investigation, the company could have objected to the sufficiency of the complaint and obtained an order requiring it to be made more specific as to the exact location of the proposed tracks. The defendant was given the benefit of compulsory process to secure and present evidence in its behalf. There was a provision to require the attendance of witnesses, the production of documents, and for the taking of testimony by deposition. It also had the right to cross-examine witnesses produced on the part of the commission and the privilege of offering evidence on every matter material to the investigation.

"3, The defendant insists, however, that, no matter how complete the right to be heard before the commission, the statute, having denied all other opportunity for testing the validity of the order in the state courts, furnished an utterly inadequate judicial review, because, as the carrier could not anticipate what decision would be made, it was unjust to require it to produce evidence to show in advance the unreasonableness of an order, the terms of which were not known. From this it argues that the statute was unconstitutional in so far as it prevented the court from receiving competent and noncumulative testimony tending to prove that there was no public necessity for making the track connection, and that the order was void.

"This position would be true if the defendant had not been put on notice as to what order was asked for, and then given ample opportunity to show that it would be unjust or unreasonable to grant it. In this case, and under the statute, it was given such notice. The complaint alleged that some of the towns were important shipping points, and that at all of them there was a public necessity that the roads should be connected. The defendant denied each of these allegations. The hearing, both on the law and the facts, was necessarily limited to that issue. There could have been no valid order which was broader than that claim. The defendant was charged with notice that if the allegations of the complaint as to necessity were established, the order could then be lawfully granted, unless there was also proof that the cost, in comparison with the receipts, or other fact, made it unjust to require the connections to be made. The carrier was therefore given the right both to meet the charge of public necessity, and also to establish any fact which would make it unjust to pass the order for which the complainant prayed. The act further provided that, after the administrative body had acted, the carrier should have the right to test the lawfulness and reasonableness of the regulation in the superior court, where every error in rejecting or excluding evidence, or otherwise, could be corrected. On that trial the court was not bound by the finding of fact, but, like the commission, it was obliged to weigh and consider the testimony and to give full effect to what was established by the evidence, since it acted judicially, 'under an imperative obligation, with a sense of official responsibility for impartial and right decision, which is imputed to the discharge of official duties.' Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321, 334, 29 L. ed. 414, 417, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57.

"4. Having been given full opportunity to be heard on the issues made by the complaint and answer, and as to the reasonableness of the proposed order, and having adopted the statutory method of review, this company cannot complain. It has the right to offer all competent testimony before the commission, which, in view of the form of proceedings authorized by the statute, acted in this respect somewhat like a master in chancery who has been required to take testimony and report his findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court would test its correctness by the evidence submitted to the master. Nor would there be any impairment of the right to a judicial review, because additional testimony could not be submitted to the chancellor. . . .

"5. If, then, the defendant had notice and was given the right to show that the order asked for, if granted, would be unreasonable, it has not in this case been deprived of the right to a hearing."

The Constitutional Convention of New Mexico, when it adopted article 11 of the Constitution, and provided for the somewhat novel procedure after the hearing and determination by the commission, for the judicial review of the action of the commission, were attempting to expedite the judicial inquiry into the reasonableness and lawfulness of the order made by the commission; provide a method of procedure that would be inexpensive and simple, and that would preserve the rights of the people on the one hand, and of the owners of the public service corporations on the other.

To this end, notice to the company to be affected by a proposed order was to be given, and a hearing required thereon, at which the company and the complainant may produce all their evidence bearing upon the issues and the justness of the proposed order, cross-examine witnesses, etc. It was the evident intent of the framers of the instrument that all the known evidence should be produced before the commission in the first instance. After the commission has made its final order, the public service company has twenty days within which to voluntarily comply with the order. If it does so comply, and the order is satisfactory to the complaining party, no further proceedings are required. Should it fail to comply, unless an order of removal is taken from such determination by the commission, by the company affected, the commission must remove such cause, together with all the evidence adduced upon the hearing, with the documents, etc., to the supreme court. It is also provided that, when the case is removed to this court by the commission, "no additional evidence shall be allowed." If the case has been removed here by the defendant, the "supreme court may upon application, in its discretion or of its own motion, require or authorize additional evidence to be taken in such cause." We must confess that this provision of the Constitution has required a great deal of consideration to enable us to arrive at what we believe to have been the purpose and intent of the framers of the instrument in this regard. It has been suggested that the proper solution is that, in the event of a failure on the part of the company affected to remove the cause, it is our duty to affirm the order of the commission and carry into effect its determination; that the court, in such event, is not required to look into the question of the reasonableness or lawfulness of the order. We do not, however, believe that such was the intent, but rather that the court should, in either event, from the evidence adduced, determine such questions and mete out justice to the company and to the public. That being true, the only purpose or design, in giving to the company the right to remove the cause, was that such party could make a showing to the court that new evidence had been discovered or new facts developed which would have a material bearing upon the matter, and thus give to the court the power to remand the cause to the commission for the taking of such further testimony; or, to give to the court, where the cause was removed by the company, and it found the evidence not altogether satisfactory in some respect, or upon some point, power to remand the cause and require the taking of additional testimony. In brief, then, the difference between the two methods, as we understand it, is that, where the cause is removed by the commission, this court must determine the lawfulness and reasonableness of the order upon the evidence adduced, even though it may appear to the court that other facts might be produced which might show the order to be unreasonable. Where the cause is removed by the company, it gives to the court more latitude, and enables it to require additional testimony before arriving at an ultimate determination of the question. We believe it was the intention to, in all cases, accord to both parties a judicial hearing upon the merits.

Upon the hearing in this court it was argued by the attorney general that this court had the right to form its own independent judgment in the matter; that it was not confined to a consideration of the reasonableness and lawfulness of the order made by the commission, with the power to either enforce such order by its judgment, or refuse to enforce it. That the court could, for instance, in a rate case, where the commission had fixed the rate at 2 cents a mile for carrying passengers, either raise or lower the rate by its judgment. That such power was conferred by the language, "The said court shall have the power and it shall be its duty to decide such cases on their merits, and carry into effect its judgments, orders, and decrees made in such cases, by fine, forfeiture, mandamus," etc. Now, if the contention is sound, then the provision just quoted invests this court with legislative power to fix rates. There is no doubt but that the people of the state, by constitutional provision, could confer such power upon the judges of the supreme court. If they saw fit, they might combine all the power of government in one department; but such action would not be in accord with the settled policy of the states of the Union, where it has been the studied purpose to, so far as possible, keep separate the three great departments, and we should not so construe the provision as conferring legislative power upon this body, unless compelled to do so by clear and unmistakable language.

Let us consider the results that would follow such a construction. Section 156 of article 12 of the Constitution of Virginia is in many respects similar to the provisions of our Constitution, for the regulation of public service corporations, but specifically provides, however, for an appeal to the supreme court, and that "whenever the court, upon appeal, shall reverse an order of the commission affecting the rates, charges, or the classification of traffic of any transportation or transmission company, it shall at the same time substitute therefor such order as, in its opinion, the commission should have made at the time of entering the order appealed from." This language, it will be observed, is free from doubt, and specifically confers the claimed powers upon the court. This provision of the Virginia Constitution was before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Prentiss v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. 211 U. S. 210, 53 L. ed. 150, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 87, on appeal from the circuit court of the United States, where a bill in equity was filed to enjoin the enforcement of a rate established by the Virginia commission. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, held that the power exercised by the court in fixing a rate, under this Constitution, was legislative, and not judicial. He says, "The establishment of a rate is the making of a rule for the future, and therefore is an act legislative, not judicial, in kind," and "Proceedings legislative in nature are not proceedings in a court within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 720, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 581, no matter what may be the general or dominant character of the body in which they may take place. . . . That question depends, not upon the character of the body, but upon the character of the proceedings." And, "the decision upon them cannot be res judicata when a suit is brought. Now, if this be the correct rule, and it appears to be firmly settled in the United States, and certainly appeals to reason, were we to adopt the construction suggested, it would make of this court, in these cases, a mere legislative body. Its decisions would not be res judicata, and parties affected by the orders would be enabled to go into the courts and secure a judicial determination of the reasonableness and lawfulness of the ultimate rate fixed, or facility required to be furnished, by this court. Instead of a speedy determination, untimely delay and expense would be incurred. We do not believe that the case last cited had been called to the attention of the able attorney general prior to the argument, or the consequences considered in the light of the rule there announced.

What does the language used, "decide such cases on their merits," mean? The word "decide" means to form a definite opinion; to determine; to deliberate. The direction to decide such cases "on their merits" simply means that the court shall decide them on a consideration of their substance and the legal rights involved, in opposition to a decision based upon mere defects of procedure or the technicalities thereof. It means the court shall do justice irrespective of informal, technical, or dilatory objections or contentions. See cases cited in 5 Words & Phrases, pp. 4493 et seq., and also Mulhern v. Union P. R. Co. 2 Wyo. 465, and Seely v. State, 11 Ohio, 501.

But what is the court to decide on the merits? It is the question of the reasonableness and lawfulness of the order made by the commission, and whether the defendant shall be compelled to comply with such order. It is true the Constitution does not prescribe the question which the court is to decide, but we apprehend no other question could be involved. If the court finds the order reasonable and lawful, it enters a judgment to that effect and proceeds to enforce the same. If it finds it unlawful and unreasonable, it refuses to enforce it, and in such event the state corporation commission may proceed to form a new order, if necessary or proper, under proper rules to be prescribed by the commission.

The attorney for the railway company applied to the court for permission to introduce before this court additional evidence, for the claimed purpose of showing that the order entered by the commission was unconstitutional, unreasonable, unjust, and confiscatory, and in violation of § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and, because, under the provisions of our Constitution, said company was precluded from introducing said evidence, the argument was made that § 7 of article 11 was unconstitutional and in violation of said § 1 of article 14. This contention, however, is answered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Washington ex rel. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Fairchild, 224 U. S. 510, 56 L. ed. 863, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535, and need not be further considered. We might add, however, that in no case does the Constitution contemplate the taking of additional evidence in the supreme court; but, as has been said, in a proper case the cause will be referred back to the commission, for such purpose.

Having considered the provisions of our Constitution involved in this proceeding, we will notice such objections contained in the motion to dismiss, filed by the railway company, as have not already been disposed of by what has been heretofore said.

The company insists that it is entitled to a jury trial of the issues involved, because, by § 12 of article 11 of the Constitution of this state, it is provided that the right of trial by jury, as it heretofore existed, shall be secured to all and remain inviolate, and, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the provision of the Federal Constitution that, "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved," was in force in the territory. That the provision was in force cannot be disputed. But it is likewise true that the state could abolish trial by jury, if it so elected. In considering the conflicting provisions of a Constitution or a statute, the great object to be kept in view is the legislative intent. Viewing the instrument as a whole, we do not believe there is any conflict. It was evidently the purpose to retain the right to a trial by jury, as it theretofore existed in the territory of New Mexico, except in special proceedings, for which express provision was made in the same instrument. The later express provision carved an exception out of the previous general provision, and, of course, would be held to control. Were the two provisions irreconcilably repugnant, the last in order of time and local position would be preferred. Quick v. White Twp. 7 Ind. 570.

Objection is made because of the failure of the commission to serve upon the railway company copies of the petitions or complaints upon which the action was based; but the company is not in position to take advantage of such failure, were it vital, in that no objection was interposed before the commission because of such failure. It will not be conducive to orderly procedure to permit a company against whom proceedings are instituted, to sit quietly by in the commission and permit the hearing to be closed, and raise objections in this court which, if interposed before the commission, could be cured, and delay and expense avoided. Both parties to a proceeding are presumed to be familiar with the files in the case, and to know the record. The company, by its general appearance without objection before the commission, waived all irregularity preceding such hearing.

It is next claimed that the record discloses the commission did not, prior to the making of the order for the hearing, endeavor by mediation to effect a settlement of the grievances complained of, as required by § 2, chap. 78, S. L. 1912. No objection to such failure was interposed before the commission, and therefore it is not availing here. We might add, however, that the record does show that numerous letters passed between the commission and the company in an effort to bring about such settlement.

It is insisted that the cause should be dismissed, because it appears upon the face of the record herein that no certified copy of the order of the state corporation commission made herein was served on the railway company, as required by § 4, chap. 78, S. L. 1912. The record contains the certificate of Edwin F. Coard, assistant clerk of the commission, wherein he certifies "that I served a copy of the within order upon the within named the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company by delivering a true copy thereof to," followed by a statement of the person served, etc., which is not questioned. It is true, the proof of service does not specifically show that a certified copy was delivered, but it does recite that a true copy of the same was served. This certainly was sufficient to convey notice to the company of the order and its terms and provisions, and was all the company could ask. This court is enjoined by the Constitution in these matters to disregard technicalities, and this objection is, we think, a trivial technicality, and without merit.

Passing now to the consideration of the question raised by the railway company upon the merits of the case, we find objections interposed to certain specific findings of fact made by the commission; the assertion being made that such findings are not supported by the evidence. While it is proper for the commission to make findings of fact, still such findings can have no force or effect in this court. Our Constitution does not require this court to consider or give any effect to such findings, but enjoins that this court shall "decide such cases on their merits." It does not even, as is usually the case, make the order of the commission prima facie just and reasonable, but, on the other hand, requires this court to pass upon the merits of the case without indulging in any presumptions. This being true, it is our duty to take the order made by the commission and test its reasonableness and lawfulness by the evidence adduced upon the hearing. This court forms its own independent judgment as to each requirement of the order, upon the evidence; therefore the findings made by the commission may not be justified by the evidence, yet, if the evidence sustains the reasonableness and lawfulness of the order made, it would be our duty to uphold and enforce it. It will not therefore be necessary for us to consider the objections interposed to the findings of fact; but we will pass to a consideration of the order made, and ascertain whether it is just, reasonable, and correct, and supported by the evidence.

The order made was divided into three separate requirements or provisions, and we will discuss them in their order. The first is as follows: "It is hereby ordered by the commission that the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company open its station building at the town of Tres Piedras for the purpose of affording accommodations to the traveling public who may desire to take a train at Tres Piedras or alight therefrom, and provide suitable seats, fuel, and water for the comfort of said passengers."

The evidence discloses that the company has maintained a comfortable station building at Tres Piedras for the past thirty years; that it is ample to accommodate the traveling public in the matter of waiting rooms, etc.; but that the company keeps the building closed, and that during inclement weather no shelter is provided; that the section foreman and his wife reside in a portion of the station, and it appears that the railroad company with but little expense could fulfil these requirements. It is true there is but little passenger traffic originating there; but, still, a requirement that the company should maintain a waiting room and properly heat and light the same is but a humane provision, and we think fully warranted by the facts. Complaint, however, is made as to the form of the order; the company claiming that it is so vague and indefinite that it does not inform the company as to just what is required. The contention is urged that, by the use of the word "accommodations" in the clause, "open its station at the town of Tres Piedras for the purpose of affording accommodations to the traveling public," it might mean that the company was to install an agent to sell tickets, check baggage, and run a bureau of information. As we read the order, however, we do not so understand the language used, nor do we think that it is obscure or uncertain. It simply directs the company to open the building "for the accommodation of the traveling public;" to open it, so that the public using the road may have shelter. It does not direct the furnishing of accommodations, but the opening of the building, so that the accommodations will exist, viz., a place to await the train, sheltered from the cold or inclement weather.

More trouble exists in the remaining part of the order, "and provide suitable seats, fuel, and water for the comfort of the passengers." The order made by the commission, if found to be reasonable and lawful, is to be enforced by this court by "fine, forfeiture, mandamus, injunction, and contempt, or other appropriate proceedings." Now, suppose we found this portion of the order to be in compliance with the law, and proceeded to enforce it. The company, claiming a compliance with the order, should show that it had provided two seats, and had provided a ton of coal or a load of wood, but no stove; could this court punish by fine, forfeiture, or contempt for a failure to comply with the order? Who is to determine what number of seats are sufficient or the kind of seats? Who is to say whether the seats are suitable? While the order directs the furnishing of fuel, it does not require the waiting room to be heated. The court can only enforce an order which is reasonably definite and certain. The company may exercise its best judgment, and yet be met with a new complaint and be subjected to the burden of another investigation with reference to the same situation. The public may secure an order for certain accommodations, which will be absolutely fruitless, because of their inability to secure its enforcement. This precedent, if established, would ultimately prove unduly burdensome upon the court, the commission, the railroads, and the people. In the interest of justice there should be an end to litigation. Mandamus does not lie to compel the performance of a duty calling for the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the person at whose hands the performance is required. Spelling, Inj. & Extra. Rem. § 1384.

As said by the court in the case of Ross v. Butler, 57 Hun, 110, 10 N. Y. Supp. 444: "The appellant has not been directed to do any specific thing, and, if a commitment were issued upon such an order, it would be impossible for the sheriff to determine when the appellant had conformed to its requirements. It is absolutely clear that a party cannot be adjudged to be in contempt without definitely stating what he shall do in order to purge himself of the contempt." In order to be valid, binding, and enforceable, the order must be reasonably definite and certain in its terms and requirements. Burlington & C. R. Co. v. People, 20 Colo. App. 181, 77 Pac. 1026. See also 31 Cyc. 51, where it is said: "The orders of the railroad commission must be definite and specific as to what is required to be done by the railroad company." State ex rel. La Follette v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 16 S. D. 517, 94 N. W. 406.

We think the order in the present case should have specified the number and kinds of seats, and, instead of requiring the furnishing of fuel, should have required the station to be comfortably heated during certain hours previous to the arrival of trains.

A more serious question, going to the merits of the order, is presented by the second requirement, viz.: "It is further ordered by the commission that the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company maintain a representative at this station, whose duty it shall be to receive freight and properly store the same in freight station to protect same from pillage and the elements, and to properly check out such freight to the rightful owners when called for."

The evidence in the record—and, of course, we must determine the reasonableness and lawfulness of the order solely upon such evidence—shows that when this station was established, and for many years, it continued to be the shipping point for Taos, the county seat of Taos county, and the community surrounding it. While this condition existed, the station was very remunerative, and an agent and the usual station facilities were maintained. A few years before the railroad decided to discontinue the agent and telegraph station, a new wagon road was built from Taos to Servilleta, which was much shorter and easier of travel. The railroad company then established a station at the latter point, and by far the major portion of the traffic that had hitherto found an outlet through Tres Piedras went by Servilleta. Business at Tres Piedras fell off to such a point that the company decided that it was not warranted in continuing to keep an agent at that place, and accordingly removed the agent, and since December, 1910, said station has been operated as a "prepay" station. The railroad has continued to stop its trains at that place for both freight and passengers. The business of the station for the year 1911, as shown by the evidence, amounted to: Passenger receipts, $581.23; freight forwarded, $1,075.81; freight received, $1,850.66,—or a total of $3,507.70. Now it is very evident that the total should not be credited to this station, because to do so would be to deprive the stations from which the incoming freight originated, and the outgoing freight was received, of their proper credit, and their proper share of the necessary expense in handling the same. It is not clear whether the passenger receipts were all derived from outgoing passengers; therefore we will not consider them in the division of business, but will presume that they were properly all credited to this station. Should we divide equally the incoming and outgoing freight, between the station and the stations of its origin or destination, we find that this station should only be credited with the sum of $2,044.46, which included the passenger receipts, for the purpose of arriving at the question—if it be material—as to whether the earnings of the station justify the requirement for the maintenance of an agent. The undisputed evidence shows that it will cost the railroad company $75 per month to maintain an agent at this place, who is not also a telegraph operator, and, as the commission did not require the agent to be an operator, we will assume that that sum would be sufficient.

This would require the yearly outlay of $900, to which we add the sum of $60, shown to be the added incidental expense in the way of fuel, etc. Deducting this sum from the total properly creditable to the station, it leaves a balance of but $1,084.46 for this station to contribute toward the maintenance and operation of the road, payment of interest, and reasonable dividends. Of course, it goes without saying that, under the facts shown to exist in this case, the proportion is not reasonable.

The state corporation commission is authorized "to require railway companies to maintain adequate depots, stock pens, station buildings, agents, and facilities for the accommodation of passengers and for receiving and delivering freight and express," and such as may be reasonable and just. Now, what are adequate facilities? We apprehend that it would be a very difficult matter to lay down a rule or general definition that would be in any wise satisfactory. "Adequate facilities" for the accommodation of passengers and freight in a city of 10,000 inhabitants, where a large volume of business was done, would be one thing, while in a small country station, with little business, altogether another. It would not do to say that the same facilities should be provided at each station. How then are we to determine what are adequate? Must we not consider the volume of business, the revenue derived by the railroad therefrom, the number of people to be accommodated, the present facilities, and all the facts and circumstances, considering on the one hand the rights of the stockholders of the railroad, and on the other the rights of the public? It would not be fair and just to arbitrarily require a railroad company to maintain a station and facilities which the business did not justify, or the requirements of the people demand. The supreme court of Oklahoma, in the case of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 26 Okla. 804, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 110 Pac. 668, in considering what was meant by the term "adequate facilities," says: "The term 'adequate facilities' is not capable of exact definition, being a relative term, and calls for such facilities as may be fairly demanded; regard being had to the size of such station or place, the extent of the demand of transportation, its relative location to other places, the cost of furnishing additional accommodations asked for, and all other facts which would have a bearing upon the question of convenience and cost." See also Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Wharton, 207 U. S. 328, 52 L. ed. 230, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121. Of course, it will not be disputed that where, for some exceptional reasons, the conditions are such as to require the maintenance of an agent for the proper operation of the road, or the safety of the traveling public, or the accommodation of the patrons of the road residing at or near a station, the commission has the power to make an order so requiring, regardless of the fact that the maintenance of such service may entail a pecuniary loss upon the railroad.

But in the case now under consideration there is no claim that an agent is necessary for the proper operation of the trains run by the railroad company, or the safety of the traveling public; indeed, by the terms of the order the agent is not required to discharge any duty toward passengers or the train service. He is required only to "receive freight and properly store the same in freight station to protect same from pillage and the elements, and to properly check out such freight to the rightful owners when called for." Now, do the facts, as disclosed by the evidence, show that it is necessary to entail an expense upon the company of practically one half of the freight and passenger receipts properly credited to this station, for such purpose? Under the present arrangements the train crew unload the incoming freight and store it in the freight room, where it is protected from pillage and the elements, the door being locked and the key left with the wife of the section foreman, who lives in the building. There is no evidence showing that any freight has ever been damaged or injured by exposure, or lost by pillage. Indeed, during all the time the present arrangements have been in force, but two incidents have been recited when any inconvenience has resulted. Upon one occasion some person, by mistake, got a box of salt pork belonging to Mr. Seward, and upon another occasion a box of cheese; but Mr. Seward suffered no loss, as the party who received the goods either returned it or paid for it.

No person who was ever a passenger upon the road, so far as the evidence discloses, has made any complaint as to the character of the accommodations. No freight shipper has complained, with the exception of Mr. Seward, who was the only witness who testified for the complainants. It is true the original grievance or petition was signed by a great many people, but when the time for a hearing came, and they had the opportunity in an effective manner to give voice to their supposed grievances, not one of them appeared, except the merchant in Tres Piedras. Now the grievance of one man is not that of the public. The inconvenience of one man is not the inconvenience of the public.

Mr. Seward's principal grievance was that, since the agent was discontinued, the station was what is known as a "prepay station;" that is, freight was required to be prepaid upon all goods ordered by him. Now, are the inconveniences of a few shippers, receiving freight upon which the railroad realizes $1,850 a year, sufficient to warrant the railroad company in expending $960? We do not believe that, under the facts disclosed by the record, the requirement is reasonable. As was well said by the supreme court of Louisiana in the case of Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 109 La. at page 262, 33 So. 219: "In the consideration of matters of comfort and convenience, the number of persons who may be concerned or interested in some particular matter, at some particular point, enter as important factors in determining what is proper to be done." It might be that the railroad company could make some arrangement whereby it could maintain a representative at this place, who would do all that the order required done, at a much less cost than $960 a year; but the commission has failed to develop any evidence to show such fact, and we cannot go outside of the record.

The attorney general contends, however, that, upon the facts disclosed by the record in this case, the court, in determining the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the order made requiring the maintenance of an agent, must necessarily presume that the order is reasonable and just, because the railroad company has failed to introduce evidence showing the receipts from the operation of its lines in New Mexico, and the expense, and the just proportion of the fixed charges, etc., upon the road; that, having failed to make such showing, the court must presume that its net profits upon its lines in New Mexico are sufficient to justify it in incurring the increased expense at the station in question. He evidently reasons upon the theory upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, 206 U. S. 1, 51 L. ed. 933, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585, 11 Ann. Cas. 398, wherein the court says: "As the duty to furnish necessary facilities is coterminous with the powers of the corporation, the obligation to discharge that duty must be considered in connection with the nature and productiveness of the corporate business as a whole, the character of the services required, and the public need for its performance." In that case the court was considering an order made by the corporation commission of North Carolina, which was sustained by the supreme court of the state, requiring the railroad company to install an additional passenger train, in order that the passengers on its lines could make connection with another road. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case under consideration, differentiates between an order fixing rates and an order requiring the furnishing of a facility necessarily required in order that the road may carry out its absolute duty to the public. The court says: "The distinction between an order relating to such a subject and an order fixing rates, coming within either of the hypotheses which we have stated, is apparent. This is so, because, as the primal duty of a carrier is to furnish adequate facilities to the public, that duty may well be compelled, although, by doing so, as an incident, some pecuniary loss from rendering such service may result. It follows therefore that the mere incurring of a loss from the performance of such a duty does not in and of itself necessarily give rise to the conclusion of unreasonableness, as would be the case where the whole scheme of rates was unreasonable, under the doctrine of Smyth v. Ames, or under the concessions made in the two propositions we have stated." The court sustained the order which required the railway company to run an additional passenger train, even though to do so resulted in a daily loss to the company of $15. It is true the facts in the case disclosed that the company was making a large profit by its operation within the state of North Carolina, and it was contended that the same rule should be applied as that applied in rate cases. The court used language that might seem to imply that if that rule were applied it would be proper to take into consideration the net income; but, as we read the case, the court did not base its decision upon the fact that such net income was shown, but rather upon the theory that it was the absolute duty of the road to provide sufficient passenger and freight trains for the accommodation of the public, and that the duty could be enforced even though as a result a pecuniary loss was entailed. This is so, we think, because it is the primal and absolute duty of the railroad to provide such facilities. Such is the very purpose of its organization. It is chartered for the purpose of transporting freight and passengers, and so long as it continues to exercise its rights under such charter, and does not elect to surrender up its franchise, the performance of the duty for which it was called into existence and given its being may be enforced, even though such performance may entail a pecuniary loss. So long as it continues to exercise 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) its franchise rights, it cannot escape the absolute duties thereby imposed.

Its absolute duty is to transport freight and passengers. It is not its prime duty to provide depots, waiting rooms, station agents, telephone and telegraph facilities. These duties are only incidental to the main purpose of its organization. It might discharge its absolute duties without any of these facilities, by merely stopping its trains at designated places and loading and unloading freight and passengers. When it is called upon to perform an absolute duty, of course, the question of expense cannot be considered; but when the duty is only an incident to the main duty, then the question of expense becomes of more importance, and, in determining the question of reasonableness, the revenue derived by the company from the public for whose accommodation the facility is to be furnished becomes of importance, and must be considered in connection with the public necessity.

This distinction we think was made more manifest in the case of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 54 L. ed. 472, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 330, where the court, in sustaining an order of the Kansas corporation commission requiring the railroad company to run a separate passenger train, say: "But where a duty which a corporation is obliged to render is a necessary consequence of the acceptance and continued enjoyment of its corporate rights, those rights not having been surrendered by the corporation, other considerations are, in the nature of things, paramount, since it cannot be said that an order compelling the performance of such duty at a pecuniary loss is unreasonable. To conclude to the contrary would be but to declare that a corporate charter was purely unilateral, that is, was binding in favor of the corporation as to all rights conferred upon it, and was devoid of obligation as to duties imposed, even although such duties were the absolute correlative of the rights conferred. Was the duty which the order here commanded one which the corporation was under the absolute obligation to perform as the result of the acceptance of the charter to operate the road, is, then, the question to be considered. It may not be doubted that the road, by virtue of the charter under which the branch was built, was obliged to carry passengers and freight, and therefore, as long as it enjoyed its charter rights, was under the inherent obligation to afford a service for the carrying of passengers."

The same distinction is recognized by the same court in the case of Washington ex rel. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Fairchild, 224

U. S. 510, 56 L. ed. 863, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535, where the court say: "If the order involves the use of property needed in the discharge of those duties which the carrier is bound to perform, then, upon proof of the necessity, the order will be granted, even though 'the furnishing of such necessary facilities may occasion an incidental pecuniary loss.' But even then the matter of expense is 'an important criteria to be taken into view in determining the reasonableness of the order.' Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, 206 U. S. 1, 27, 51 L. ed. 933, 945, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585, 11 Ann. Cas. 398; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 54 L. ed. 472, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 330. Where, however, the proceeding is brought to compel a carrier to furnish a facility not included within its absolute duties, the question of expense is of more controlling importance. In determining the reasonableness of such an order, the court must consider all the facts,—the places and persons interested, the volume of business to be affected, the saving in time and expense to the shipper, as against the cost and loss to the carrier. On a consideration of such and similar facts, the question of public necessity and the reasonableness of the order must be determined."

The Constitution does not confer upon the corporation commission the right to arbitrarily establish a station or to require a station agent, regardless of the expense entailed upon the company, or the benefit to be derived by the public. It is only authorized to make such an order in this regard, as "the public interests demand, and as may be reasonable and just." It is not to consider alone the interests of the public affected by the order, but must determine whether or not, taking into consideration both the interests of the public and the expense entailed upon the railroad company, the order is just and reasonable. Of course, were the question involved in this case of the safety or expedition of the operation of trains, or the performance of an absolute duty, a different proposition would be involved; but these questions are not involved.

Suppose, for instance, the railroad company had introduced proof as to its earnings in New Mexico, and it was shown that the railroad company was earning a net return of, say, 10 per cent over and above all operating expenses, would that fact, in and of itself, authorize the corporation commission to require the installation of a service at a station not reasonably warranted by the business which the station produced, or required by the public necessities? A little consideration of the question will demonstrate clearly, we think, the fallacy of such argument. Suppose, for instance, that it was a fact that the railroad company in New Mexico was earning 10 per cent net, after making all proper deductions from its receipts; the corporation commission, in view of this large net revenue, and following the theory suggested by the attorney general, could require the installation of stations, agents, and facilities at divers places along the line of its road where the receipts did not fairly warrant the service, or the public necessities require, thereby entailing upon the company such an expense that its net earnings were reduced to, suppose, 6 per cent per annum, which we will assume, for the purpose of illustration, would be a fair return upon the property, and below which the corporation commission would have no right to reduce its earnings. The maximum passenger fare in New Mexico as fixed by statute is 6 cents per mile, and suppose, for illustration, that the company is charging the maximum amount of fare allowed by law, if the corporation commission is to be permitted, so long as the earnings upon the present rate of fares and charges show a net return above 6 per cent, to require facilities at a station not warranted by the business, how would it ever be possible for the people of New Mexico to secure a reduction in fares and charges? To sanction such a policy would be to impose an unjust burden upon the patrons of larger stations, whose receipts will be required to help make up the deficit caused by the smaller stations.

As said by the supreme court of Oklahoma in the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. State, 24 Okla. 370, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393, 103 Pac. 617: "Where the receipts of such stations will not justify the installation of such service, there being eliminated the question of the safety or expedition in the operation of trains, it would be unreasonable to require such service to be installed, creating a deficit at such station to be borne by the receipts at a larger station, except in exceptional instances. The patrons of a large station, after the expenditures for the reasonable maintenance of the station and the proper contribution towards maintenance, equipment, and operation of the line, and the paying of a reasonable dividend on the investment, are entitled, if it be reasonably practicable, to a reduction in rates; and except as stated, it is unreasonable and unjust to require the large stations to contribute to pay deficits at small stations."

And the same court, in the case of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Newell, 25 Okla. 502, 106 Pac. 818, say: "But the facilities afforded at any station to the general public must in a measure be commensurate with the patronage and receipts from that portion of the public to whom the service is rendered. Otherwise, not only would an injustice be done the railroad company, which would be required to furnish the services at a financial loss, but the other portions of the general patronizing public would be required to pay an additional charge for the service rendered to them, over and above that necessary to pay the expenses of such services, and a fair and reasonable dividend on the investment of the railway company, in order to make up the deficit for the additional services required at such places."

Applying the facts to the principles above enunciated, it does not appear that the order made, requiring the maintenance of an agent at this station at the annual charge shown, is reasonable and just, and as the duty is imposed upon the court to determine the reasonableness and justness of the order upon the evidence in the record, we must decline to enforce the order.

The third provision of the order was as follows: "It is further ordered by the commission that some adequate means of communication be maintained at this station for the purpose of obtaining information as to the running of trains; whether this be by telephone or telegraph is left to the discretion of the company."

The evidence discloses that there are but two trains a day operated upon this road; one going north, and the other south. The train going north is usually on time, while the one running south is frequently late. But the passenger receipts from this station, as disclosed by the record, are but $581.23 a year. To maintain an agent who is a telegraph operator would require an additional charge of $20 a month, or an annual charge of $240, almost 50 per cent of the receipts from this portion of the traffic. If it be contended that it is optional with the company to install telephone facilities, the answer is that there is no proof in the record showing the cost of installing this service. The court cannot speculate as to the probable cost, but it is the duty of the commission to present evidence as to all such facts, so that the court will be enabled to determine therefrom the reasonableness and justness of the order. If it be true that the telephone service could be installed for a reasonable amount, then an order so requiring would probably be just and proper. Certainly it would not be reasonable to require the installation of telegraph service for the purpose of bulletining trains, where the cost of such service would be out of proportion to the revenue derived from that portion of the traveling public to be benefited thereby. The position of the court is fully supported by the adjudicated cases upon the proposition. See St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Newell and Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. State, supra.

For the reasons stated, the Court must refuse to enforce the order made by the Commission, and the cause is remanded to the Corporation Commission for further proceedings, should it so elect, in accordance with this opinion.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

RE CARNEGIE TRUST COMPANY, in Liquidation.

RE APPLICATION OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF BANKS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK for Leave to Declare and Pay a Supplemental First Dividend to the Creditors of Said Carnegie Trust Company.

GEORGE C. VAN TUYL, JR., Superintendent of Banks of the State of New York, Appt.

(206 N. Y. 390, 99 N. E. 1096.)

Appeal — banking superintendent — order fixing priority of claims.

1. Under statutory authority to appeal from a final order in a special proceeding, the state superintendent of banks, having authority to collect and distribute the assets of an insolvent bank, and present objections to claims to the court for determination, may appeal from an order giving the state priority over other claimants upon the assets of an insolvent bank which he is administering.

State — claims against insolvent bank — priority.

2. The claims of a state for money deposited in banks have, under a constitutional provision abrogating only such parts of the common law as are repugnant to the Constitution, priority in case of the bank's insolvency, over those of private depositors having no specific lien, even though the money belongs to special funds, if it is the property of the people.

(November 19, 1912.)

Note. — Common-law priority of state or United States in payment from assets of debtor.

This note is supplemental to that part of the note in 29 L.R.A. 227, 242, which treats of the common-law priority of the state or the United States in payment from the APPEAL by the superintendent of banks from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of a Special Term for New York County, Part III., confirming the finding of a referee that the deposit of state canal funds in the trust company did not entitle the state to a preference over the claims of general creditors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank M. Patterson, Joseph M. Hartfield, and G. V. Smith, for appellant:

The state, as a general depositor, became divested of any priority attaching to it as a sovereign authority, and must share equally in the assets of the insolvent bank with other creditors of that class.

assets of an insolvent debtor. It is limited to the distinctive question whether the state or the United States is entitled to the preference as a prerogative, sovereign right, and is not concerned with cases where the question of preference is based upon a statute, or upon considerations not peculiar to the character of the claimant as a sovereign. Questions of preference of taxes are included only so far as they turn on this prerogative right. Generally, as to priority of claims for taxes against the assets of a debtor, see the note to Bibbins v. Clark, 29 L.R.A. 278.

Generally, as to right to preference in respect to public funds deposited in a bank which subsequently becomes insolvent, see the notes to Page County v. Rose, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 886, and Watts v. Cleveland County, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 918. See also on that specific question, State v. Foster, 29 L.R.A. 226, to which the note first referred to is appended.

Priority of the United States.

As stated in the former note (29 L.R.A. 227), the priority of the United States in payment of debts due it is exclusively founded upon statute. Re Devlin, 180 Fed. 170. The late cases in general do not discuss the matter of any common-law right to such a priority in the United States.

Priority of states.

As shown by the former note (29 L.R.A. 243), the courts of different states are not agreed whether or not a state has any priority apart from statute.

—theory of common-law priority.

In some jurisdictions it is held, as in RE CARNEGIE TRUST CO., that the state has priority as a prerogative rule of the common law.

v. Miller, 237 Pa. 297, 85 Atl. 457; United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Rainey, 120 Tenn. 357, 113 S. W. 397.

The same was probably held in effect in the somewhat insufficiently reported cases of Brenner v. Lawrence, 27 Misc. 755, 58 N. Y. Supp. 769; Re Ripson & N. Fur Co. 32 Misc. 56, 66 N. Y. Supp. 113; Re Bowlby, 34 Misc. 311, 69 N. Y. Supp. 783.

So, in Georgia it is held that the statutory priority of the state is declaratory of the common law. Booth v. State, 131 Ga. 750, 63 S. E. 502; Central Bank & Trust Corp. v. State, 139 Ga. 54, 76 S. E. 587; see also Glynn County v. Brunswick Terminal Co. 101 Ga. 244, 28 S. E. 604.

See also, as recognizing the rule, Parlett v. Dugan, 85 Md. 407, 37 Atl. 36.

As will be seen by the former note, the foregoing cases in New York, Pennsylvania, Georgia, and Maryland are in accord with the earlier decisions in those jurisdictions, while the above cases in Montana and Tennessee are of first impression in those states.

In American Bonding Co. v. Reynolds, 203 Fed. 356 (district of Montana) supra, in holding that without statute the state had priority for its debts on the bond of an insolvent bank with which it had funds, and that therefore one subrogated to the state's right had like priority, the court said: "There is no escape in reason from the conclusion that, by adopting the common law, Montana adopted the prerogative rule of priority of public debts. That the law may not have been heretofore invoked is not considered important. Many laws, statutory as well as common, are quiescent for years, but are not thereby repealed or abrogated. No occasion to appeal to them may have arisen."

In United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Rainey, 120 Tenn. 357, 113 S. W. 397, in holding that the state was entitled to priority on the bond of the clerk of a court for taxes due the state, the court said: "We are of opinion that the prerogative right of the sovereign to receive payment of fines, forfeitures, taxes, and

The common-law right of the state to be preferred over all creditors in the collection of taxes is unquestioned, but the prerogative of the English Crown, to be preferred over creditors generally, never existed in this state.

revenues, and such demands as were due it in its sovereign capacity, was a part of the common law transmitted to this state from North Carolina."

In Re Traders & Travellers' Acci. Co. 68 Misc. 440, 125 N. Y. Supp. 85, it was held that the state was entitled to a preference for the expense of its examination of a company made under a statute directing that the expenses of the examination should be paid by the state and refunded by the company, where the company was put into liquidation as a result of the examination, and no specific liens of creditors would be disturbed, not only on the ground that the examination should be considered substantially as an expense of a liquidation proceeding, but also upon the general doctrine of the state's right of preference.

The CARNEGIE CASE was cited in Re Niederstein, 154 App. Div. 238, 138 N. Y. Supp. 952, where it was held that the state was entitled to preference excepting so far as it had been taken away by express provisions of statute, and that a statement in the statute concerning decedents' estates, that there should be no preference over debts of the same class, did not apply to the state.

So, in Re Wesley, 156 App. Div. 403, 141 N. Y. Supp. 1031, modifying 75 Misc. 157, 134 N. Y. Supp. 1120, the court, while deciding the case upon the provisions of the insanity law, said: "Not only does the insanity law in express terms give preference to the claims of the state, but that is in harmony with our laws and Constitution, making the claims of the state preferred over other creditors of an insolvent. RE CARNEGIE TRUST CO."

The state, as a sovereign power, takes precedence over creditors, and a provision in a statute that it shall have a lien for money lent by it in pursuance of such statute is not repugnant to a constitutional 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

On the contrary, other authorities hold that a state has no sovereign right to priority in the absence of statutory or constitutional authority. Potter v. Fidelity & D. Co. 101 Miss. 823, 58 So. 713.

So, in Commissioner of Banking v. Chelsea Sav. Bank, 161 Mich. 691, 125 N. W. 424, the court, after stating that the legislature might create a preference for debts due the state, but had not done so in the case in question, said, obiter: "The form of our government, the undoubted power of the legislature in this behalf, furnish reasons for saying that, in adopting the applicable rules of the common law as a part of the law of the state, the people did not adopt and thereby assert an arbitrary prerogative right to priority of payment of its debts, which was recognized by the common law."

Statutory abrogation.

In Re Devlin, 180 Fed. 170 (district of Kansas), it was held that if there was in Kansas any common-law right of priority in the state in the payment of its debts, the same had been abrogated by the statute in relation to voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors (which was the only insolvency law of that state, and) which provided for the benefit of all creditors in proportion to their prospective claims, and, consequently, that the state as creditor was not entitled to a preference under the provisions of the United States bankrupt law giving preferences to "debts owing to any person who, by the laws of the states, . . . is entitled to priority."

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the findings of the referee it appears that the Carnegie Trust Company was a corporation transacting a banking and trust business, pursuant to the banking

Nature of the priority.

The reader will observe that it is stated in RE CARNEGIE TRUST CO., upon the authority of Wise v. L. & C. Wise Co. 153 N. Y. 507, 47 N. E. 788, that the common-law priority is subject to a limitation where there is a prior specific lien. It was held in the Wise Case, that, where there is no statute giving the preference, taxes assessed upon the personal property of a corporation which became due subsequent to the levy of an attachment and execution thereon at the suit of creditors are not a prior lien upon the assets in the hands of a receiver for distribution under the direction of the court, which arose from a sale of the property subject to the levy. The court stated that it would be otherwise if, before the fund had come to the hands of the receiver or trustee, a warrant or some other legal process had been issued for the collection of the tax or debt, so that the fund had come to his hands impressed with a lien in favor of the government in consequence of the proceedings for collection.

The Wise Case was followed in Central Trust Co. v. Third Ave. R. Co. 186 Fed. 291, where it was held that the lien of a mortgagee was superior to a subsequent tax lien, where the property was in court for purposes of distribution, and the statute creating the tax lien did not give that lien a priority over claims of all other creditors.

So the lien of an attachment was held prior to taxes which were not a lien at the time the attachment was made. Re Atlas Iron Constr. Co. 19 App. Div. 415, 46 N. Y. Supp. 467.

Devestiture.

It has been held that an assignment for the benefit of creditors will cut off any common-law right of priority. Re Devlin, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

supra, where, however, the real ground of the decision was that any such priority had already been abrogated by the insolvency statute.

Upon the question of the state's right to priority when the property of the debtor is in the hands of a receiver, the courts do not seem to be entirely agreed.

In Commissioner of Banking v. Chelsea Sav. Bank, 161 Mich. 691, 125 N. W. 424, 127 N. W. 351, the court, while considering that there was no common-law priority in Michigan, held that, if there were, the appointment under the state law of a receiver of the property of an insolvent state depository would be in effect equivalent to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and would oust the title of the depository, and destroy any general priority of the state; but this was not, it seems, necessary to the decision of the case.

In State v. Williams, 101 Md. 529, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 254, 109 Am. St. Rep. 579, 61 Atl. 297, 4 Ann. Cas. 970, where the state's property was destroyed by fire, and the insurer's assets passed into the hands of a receiver, it was held that the state's common-law right of priority did not entitle it to any preference either for the insurance or for the unearned premium, as, the state having no lien, its mere right of priority was lost by the passing of the property to the receiver.

On the other hand, in American Bonding Co. v. Reynolds, 203 Fed. 356, it was held that the appointment of a receiver for a state depository under the statute did not oust the title of the depository so that the state would lose its common-law priority on the depository's bond, the court considering that the receiver had no more title than the ordinary receiver in chancery, who took no title, but merely possession as an officer of the court.

law of this state, and by a resolution of the commissioners of the canal fund of the state, it was designated as a depository of such fund; that thereafter, and from time to time, the treasurer of the state made deposits with the trust company in different amounts, and on the 7th day of January, 1911, the trust company held on deposit the sum of $135,843.85 belonging to the state; that all of the amount of such deposit was a part of the canal fund, except the sum of $3,418.93, which belonged to the general fund of the state. On the 29th day of October, 1910, at the instance of the treasurer of the state, the trust company caused to be executed and delivered to the state treasurer two bonds, conditioned that, in the event of default on the part of the trust company, the sureties will repay the state the percentage which the amount of the bonds bears to the total deposits. One bond was executed by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company of Baltimore, Maryland, as security, in the sum of $75,000; the other bond was executed by the Aetna Indemnity Company of Hartford, Connecticut, in the sum of $190,000. Thereafter, and on the 7th day of January, 1911, the trust company went into liquidation and passed into the hands of the superintendent of banks of the state, pursuant to the provisions of the banking law; and thereupon the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company paid to the treasurer of the state its proportional percentage of the claim, amounting to the sum of $38,471.12. This payment was applied by the treasurer in discharging the amount of the deposit belonging to the general fund, and the rest upon the amount of the canal fund held by the trust company on deposit, leaving the sum of $97,372.73 of the canal fund unpaid. It does not appear that the Aetna Indemnity Company of Hartford has paid any sum whatever on the indemnity bond executed by it to the treasurer. The referee found, as conclusions of law, that the treasurer of the state was not entitled to priority over the claims of the general creditors of the company, but that his claim should be allowed as a general claim against the company. Exceptions were taken by the state treasurer to the conclusions of law so found, and the question presented for our determination on this review is as to whether the appellate division properly reversed the judgment entered upon such conclusions.

In the first place we are met with a preliminary objection presented by the attorney general, in which he claims that the superintendent of banks has no power to appeal to this court, and that therefore 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

his appeal should be dismissed. Under the banking law the superintendent is now authorized to take possession of insolvent banks, to collect in their assets, and to make distribution among the creditors and stockholders. He is empowered to declare one or more dividends after the expiration of time fixed by statute, to be paid "to such persons, and in such amounts, and upon such notice, as may be directed by the supreme court in the judicial district in which the principal office of such corporation or individual banker is located." Also, in case of objections made to any claim, he is required to present the same to the supreme court for determination; and in cases of doubt or conflicting claims, he may ask for an order of the supreme court disposing of such claims. In this case a claim was made on behalf of the state treasurer to have the amount of the state funds deposited with the bank preferred over the claims of ordinary depositors. The superintendent had the right, therefore, under the statute, to make application to the supreme court to determine that question. The application having been made pursuant to a statute, it became a special proceeding, and in view of the fact that the superintendent represented the creditors generally in his official capacity, as well as the state and the stockholders, and would be personally liable for any unauthorized distribution of the funds, we are of the opinion that he had the power to appeal from the order of the appellate division under the provisions of the Code empowering an appeal from a final order in special proceedings.

In considering the case upon the merits, the first question that arises is as to whether the funds of the state deposited with the trust company were preferred by any express provisions of the statute. The commissioners of the canal fund are created by the provisions of the Constitution. Article 5, § 5. Their powers and duties were originally prescribed by the Laws of 1817 (chapter 262, § 1), in which it was made the duty of the commissioners of the canal fund to receive, arrange, and manage to the best advantage all things belonging to the said fund, to borrow from time to time moneys on the credit of the people of the state, and out of such funds to make payments, etc. This provision, after passing through several revisions of the statute, has finally been incorporated in our present state finance law (Consol. Laws, 1909, chap. 56, art. 4, §§ 60, 61, 62). The latter section authorizes the commissioners to deposit the moneys belonging to such fund or the canal debt sinking fund with any safe incorporated moneyed institution or banking association in this state, and may make such contracts therewith for the interest on, and the duration of, such deposits as will best promote the interest of the funds. Pursuant to this provision, as we have seen, the commissioners of the canal fund designated the Carnegie Trust Company as a depository for such funds, and thereupon the treasurer paid over to such depository the funds which he now seeks to have preferred.

Section 189 of the banking law (Consol. Laws, chap. 2), among other things, provides as follows: "Any court having jurisdiction to appoint a trustee, guardian, receiver, or committee of the estate of a lunatic, idiot, or habitual drunkard, or to make any fiduciary appointment, may appoint any such corporation to be such trustee, guardian, receiver, or committee, or to act in any other fiduciary capacity. All moneys brought into court by order or judgment of any court of record may be deposited with any such corporation," etc. Section 190, among other things, provides that such trust company, "if dissolved by the legislature or the court, or otherwise, the debts due from the corporation as such executor, administrator, guardian, trustee, committee, or depository shall have the preference."

The contention is made that the provision with reference to a depository was intended only to include moneys brought into court and deposited with the company by an order of the court, and that it was not intended to include public moneys or canal funds which the commissioners had authorized to be deposited with the trust company. In view of the fact that we have reached a conclusion upon another question upon which we prefer to rest the determination of this case, it becomes unnecessary to determine that question.

We think it clear that at common law the King was entitled to preference in the payment of debts due to him from an insolvent before that of a subject. This is stated in 1 Co. Litt. 131b. Under the statute (33 Hen. VIII. chap. 39, § 74) it was enacted that the King's debt shall, in suing out execution, be preferred to that of every other creditor who has not obtained judgment before the King commenced his suit. This apparently has remained the law of England down through and since the American Revolution. Giles v. Grover, 9 Bing. 128, 2 Moore & S. 197, 1 Clark & F. 72, 6 Bligh, N. R. 277, 11 Eng. Rul. Cas. 550. By our Constitution of 1777, § 35, it was provided that "such parts of the common law of England and of the statute law of England and Great Britain, and of the acts of the legislature of the colony of New York, as together did form the law of the said colony on the 19th day of April in the year of our Lord 1775, shall be and continue the law of this state, subject to such alterations and provisions as the legislature of this state shall from time to time make concerning the same. . . . That all such parts of the said common law, and all such of the said statutes and acts aforesaid, or parts thereof, as may be construed to establish or maintain any particular denomination of Christians or their ministers, or concern the allegiance heretofore yielded to, and the supremacy, sovereignty, government, or prerogatives claimed or exercised by, the King of Great Britain and his predecessors, over the colony of New York and its inhabitants, or are repugnant to this Constitution,—be, and they hereby are, abrogated and rejected."

While our present Constitution differs in phraseology, it is not apparent that there is substantial variation in the meaning. The clauses of the common law above quoted from the Constitution of 1777, which was abrogated and rejected under our present Constitution, are condensed in the single sentence, "but all such parts of the common law, and such of the said acts, or parts thereof, as are repugnant to this Constitution, are hereby abrogated." Const. 1894, art. 1, § 16. Under our Constitution we have no King. The King, therefore, and the prerogatives that were personal to him, being repugnant to our Constitution, are abrogated. But his sovereignty, powers, functions, and duties, in so far as they pertain to civil government, now devolve upon the people of the state, and consequently are not in conflict with any of the provisions of our Constitution. Inasmuch, therefore, as the claims or moneys due the King for the support and maintenance of the government, whether derived from taxes or other sources of income, were preferred over the claims of others, it follows that, under the first subdivision of the provision of the Constitution of 1777, quoted, such preference became a part of the common law of our state, and is so continued under our present Constitution.

In Re Receivership of Columbian Ins. Co. 3 Abb. App. Dec. 239, the receivers of the corporation, appointed in proceedings to dissolve the company, applied to the court, stating that they had received notice from the receiver of taxes that he held a warrant for the taxes due from the state, amounting to a large sum, and asked for its payment pro rata with the other claims. The receiver of taxes also applied to the court, at the same time, for an order to show cause why the taxes should not be paid in full. The court made an order denying the application of the receiver, and ordered the payment of the claim of the state in preference to the other demands. In the court of appeals the order of the supreme court was affirmed, upon the ground that the warrant held by the receiver of taxes was entitled to take precedence over the other equitable claims of creditors of the corporation, as it had become a prior lien. Porter, J., however, in delivering the opinion of the court, added thereto the following: "There is great force in the argument submitted by the counsel for the corporation of the city of New York, in support of the broad position that the people of this state have succeeded to all the prerogatives of the British Crown, so far as they are essential to the efficient exercise of the powers inherent in the nature of civil government, and that there is the same priority of right here in respect to the payment of taxes, which existed at common law in favor of the public treasury." 3 Abb. App. Dec. at page 242. While it may be true that this expression of the learned judge may be regarded as obiter, still in the case of Central Trust Co. v. New York City & N. R. Co. 110 N. Y. 250-259, 1 L.R.A. 260, 18 N. E. 92, 96, Peckham, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, after holding that the claim of the state for the payment of taxes was paramount, stated: "We reiterate the statement of Porter, J., in Re Receivership of Columbian Ins. Co.," and then repeats the quotation above given. We thus find our court fully committed upon the question under discussion, and we entertain no doubt as to the wisdom of now adopting it.

There is one limitation, however, and that pertains to claims in which a prior specific lien has been obtained by the creditors. Wise v. L. & C. Wise Co. 153 N. Y. 507, 47 N. E. 788.

It is said that the moneys in question were part of the canal fund. We do not think it makes any difference whether it was the canal fund or the general fund, so long as it belonged to the people of the state. It was a public fund raised by taxation or by the sale of bonds which ultimately must be paid by the people; and, inasmuch as the sovereign power of the King devolves upon the people, they have the right to have the public funds preferred over those of the common creditors.

There may be some conflict in the decisions of our sister states, notably that of New Jersey, which have been considered in the able opinion rendered by Scott, J., in the appellate division. We do not here deem it necessary to further discuss them. We wish, however, to call attention to the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

recent decision of Guarantee Title & T. Co. v. Title Guaranty & S. Co. 224 U. S. 152, 56 L. ed. 706, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 457.

A question was raised with reference to the rights of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, who paid to the treasurer its proportional percentage of its claim; but, inasmuch as it has not been considered or covered by any findings below, we do not deem the question now before us for determination.

The order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, but without costs to either party; they being state officers.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF OREGON, Resp.,

v.

HARRY A. START, Appt.

(— Or. —, 132 Pac. 512.)

Sodomy — receiving sexual organ in os.

1. One receiving the sexual organ of a male into his mouth is within a statute providing for punishment of one committing the crime against nature.

Trial — jury — who is accomplice.

2. The jury, and not the court, must determine whether or not one who accompanied to the room where a crime against nature is committed the person upon whom it was committed, and remained there during the commission of the crime, without protest or effort to prevent or discourage it, is an accomplice so as to prevent conviction on his testimony without corroboration.

Evidence — crime against nature — other offenses.

3. Evidence of the commission of similar crimes at other times is not admissible against one on trial for commission of a crime against nature.

(McBride, Ch. J., and Eakin, J., dissent.)

Note. — Evidence of other crimes in prosecution for sodomy.

This note supplements, as to the particular crime of sodomy, the note to People v. Molineux, 62 L.R.A. 193, on the general question of the admissibility of evidence of other crimes in criminal prosecutions. Sexual offenses generally are treated in that note at pages 329 to 338 inclusive. And see also the case of State v. Place, 5 Wash. 773, 32 Pac. 736, involving an assault to commit sodomy, which is set out on page 274 of that note.

1 Wharton, Crim. Ev. 10, ¶ 59; 1 Wigmore, Ev. ¶¶ 300 et seq.

Burnett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

According to the testimony of Rodby, the defendant performed the disgusting act upon him at the time mentioned in the indictment, by taking into his mouth the penis of Rodby and sucking the same until seminal emission ensued. The defendant contends that such an act does not constitute a violation of our statute providing that, "if any person shall commit sodomy or the crime against nature, either with mankind or beast, such person, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished," etc. L. O. L. § 2099.

Many precedents are cited by the defendant in support of his theory. They are all traced back to and have their origin in the case of Rex v. Jacobs, Russ. & R. C. C. 331. The prisoner there was convicted on evidence showing conclusively that he had accomplished the act by force in the mouth of a boy about seven years old, and the question was whether this was sodomy. All that is said in answer to the question in the report of the case follows: "In Easter term, 1817, the judges met and were of opinion that this did not constitute the offense of sodomy, and directed a pardon to be applied for." The authorities cited by the defendant have implicitly followed this ipse dixit of the English court without giving any reason therefor, always controlled solely by the doctrine of stare decisis, and often with protests against the authority of the rule. Although there are no common-law crimes in this state, we must turn to that law for the definition of certain crimes where the meaning thereof is not set forth in our Code. The rule at common law was that "all unnatural carnal copulation, whether with man or beast, seem to come under the notion of sodomy." 1 Hawk. P. C. p. 357. In the order of nature the nourishment of the human body is accomplished by the operation of the alimentary canal, beginning with the mouth and ending with the rectum.

In this process food enters the first opening, the mouth, and residuum and waste are discharged through the nether opening of the rectum. The natural functions of the organs for the reproduction of the species are entirely different from those of the nutritive system. It is self-evident that the use of either opening of the alimentary canal for the purpose of sexual copulation is against the natural design of the human body. In other words, it is an offense against nature. There can be no difference in reason whether such an unnatural coition takes place in the mouth or in the fundament,—at one end of the alimentary canal or the other. The moral filthiness and iniquity against which the statute is aimed is the same in both cases. Each is rightfully included in the true scope and meaning of the common-law definition quoted above from Hawkins. By far the better reasoning is found in the cases of State v. Whitmarsh, 26 S. D. 426, 128 N. W. 580, Herring v. State, 119 Ga. 709, 46 S. E. 876, and others which might be cited.

It is said in § 1539, L. O. L., that "proof of actual penetration into the body is sufficient to sustain an indictment for rape or for the crime against nature." No particular opening of the body into which penetration can be made is specified in this section. It follows that the actual penetration of the virile member into any orifice of the human body except the vaginal opening of a female is sufficient for the establishment of the crime in question.

The state called as a witness Earl Van Hulén, for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of the witness Rodby. Van Hulén was present at the time the alleged offense was committed with Rodby. Their testimony was to the effect that Rodby met Van Hulén on the street, and asked him to go with him to the office of the defendant to keep an engagement. Arriving there, the two were seated in company with the defendant, who locked the door and immediately began to talk to them about "queans," the significance of which Van Hulén understood. This conversation led up to the act charged in the indictment. He remained seated in the room and watched the performance of the act, testifying substantially that he stayed there because he thought it was better than to go out, and for the reason that if he opened the door and left the room he would be liable to disclose what was going on inside; that he told the defendant he thought it was very daring, and that it was bad enough for two without three in the room. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that the witnesses Rodby and Van Hulen were accomplices, and that a conviction could not be had upon such testimony, unless corroborated by others evidence. This instruction was refused by the court, which gave instead thereof the following: "The state has offered the witness Van Hulen as a witness corroborating the testimony of the complaining witness, Fred Rodby. The defendant contends that this man Van Hulen was an accomplice, and that therefore his testimony was not admissible. The court was unable to agree with the contention of the defendant on that point, and you are now instructed as a matter of law that the witness Van Hulen was not an accomplice of the defendant, and that therefore his testimony may be considered by you as corroborating the testimony of the complaining witness, Rodby."

It is provided in §§ 1458 and 2370, L. O. L., that "all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether it be felony or misdemeanor, and whether they directly commit the act constituting the crime or aid and abet in its commission, though not present, are principals, and are to be tried and punished as such."

It is also said in §1540 that "a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless he be corroborated by such other evidence as tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely show the commission of the crime or the circumstances of the commission."

"To 'abet' is to countenance, assist; to give aid. . . . The word 'abet' includes knowledge of the wrongful purpose of the perpetrator, and counsel and encouragement in the crime." 1 Words & Phrases, p. 15.

Considering the facts: That the two witnesses went together to the defendant's office to meet an engagement with one of them; that on arriving there nothing else was talked of except what resulted in the crime; that the witness Van Hulen was present without protest, and remained until the consummation of the act without making any effort to stop the commission of the felony, or to do anything to prevent or discourage it,—there were circumstances from which the jury could believe, for instance, that he guarded the door to prevent detection, and so that he was at least abetting the commission of the crime, and hence was an accomplice. In State v. Wong Si Sam, 63 Or. 266, 127 Pac. 683, the deceased was said to have been murdered in the room of his paramour, a Chinese woman, Oi Sen, who stood by, offered no resistance, and called for no help. This was deemed sufficient to take to the jury the question 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of whether or not she was an accomplice, and it was held by this court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Bean, that if the jury found that she was an accomplice, she must be corroborated, in compliance with the statute. Van Hulen in this case appears in a stronger light as an accomplice than did the Chinese prostitute. Under these circumstances the court had no right to assume, and so instruct the jury as a matter of law, that he was not an accomplice. The question should have been left to the jury, under proper instruction, to determine, in the first place, whether Van Hulen was present aiding or abetting in the commission of the crime, and, next, that if so, he should be corroborated by other evidence within the meaning of the statute above quoted.

Over the objection and exception of the defendant, the court permitted the state to call several witnesses, who testified that they themselves, at other times, had participated with the defendant in a like action as that described in the indictment. The court in its charge to the jury stated that "this evidence of other similar crimes will be admitted for whatever tendency it may have to show that he, the defendant, was in a state of mind that would naturally dispose him to commit the particular crime charged in the indictment with Fred Rodby." The defendant excepted to that instruction. The testimony showed that the transactions disclosed by the other witnesses were entirely disconnected from that with Rodby, and were committed at other times.

It is said in State v. O'Donnell, 36 Or. 222, 61 Pac. 892: "The rule that evidence of crimes other than that charged in the indictment is inadmissible is subject to a few exceptions, speaking of which Mr. Underhill, in his valuable work on Criminal Evidence (§ 87), says: 'These exceptions are carefully limited and guarded by the courts, and their number should not be increased.'"

In that same case of State v. O'Donnell, Mr. Justice Moore sets down several exceptions to the general rule. He summarizes them as follows:

"(1) If several similar criminal acts are so connected by the prisoner, with respect to time and locality, that they form an inseparable transaction, and a complete account of the offense charged in the indictment cannot be given without detailing the particulars of such other acts, evidence of any or all of the component parts thereof is admissible to prove the whole general plan. . . .

"(2) When the commission of the act charged in the indictment is practically admitted by the prisoner, who seeks to avoid criminal responsibility therefor by relying upon the lack of intent or want of guilty knowledge, evidence of the commission by him of several independent offenses before or after that upon which he is being tried, and having no apparent connection therewith, is admissible to prove such intent or knowledge, which has become the material issue for trial. . . .

"(3) If the facts and circumstances tend to show that the prisoner committed an independent dissimilar crime, to enable him to perpetrate or to conceal an offense, such evidence is admissible against him upon an indictment charging the auxiliary crime, when the intent to perpetrate or conceal such offense furnished the motive for committing the crime for which he is put upon trial."

Neither of these three exceptions apply to this case. There is no testimony here tending in the least to show that the transactions with these several witnesses were in any way connected one with the other. An illustration of the exception would be where a man was killed by the defendant, who several times before had tried to shoot the deceased in the same manner in which he was shot at the time in question. Under the third exception an illustration would be where a burglar stole tools from a foundry with which to break the safe burglarized. Evidence of one crime could in such circumstances be given to support an indictment for the other. On the trial for burglary the stealing of the tools could be shown as preparation for the crime charged, and on an indictment for larceny of the tools the commission of the burglary with them would supply the motive for stealing them. Motive is that which impels one to do an act. In this case the proof of the crime mentioned with A would furnish no motive for the commission of the same species of felony with B. They are independent transactions, and neither one is the reason for the other.

Mr. Justice Moore then states a fourth exception: "When a crime has been committed by the use of a novel means or in a particular manner, evidence of the defendant's commission of similar offenses by the use of such means or in such manner is admissible against him, as tending to prove the identity of persons from the similarity of such means, or the peculiarity of the manner adopted by him." That the manner in which the defendant is said to have committed the crime is not a novel one is proved by the fact that for more than one hundred years precedents have appeared in the reports where the crime was committed in the same manner by men with other offenders. The question has never been whether the method alleged to have been employed here was unique, but whether it constituted any offense at all. Cases under this exception are those where the crime is characterized by some personal peculiarity of the defendant not common to other people. An illustration of this exception is found in cases where a forgery has been committed of documents in which the peculiar writing of the defendant forms a part. Evidence of other writings, although they are forgeries, containing these peculiar earmarks of the defendant's writing, may be given in evidence in support of the particular crime charged. This doctrine is illustrated in the case of State v. La Rose, 54 Or. 555, 104 Pac. 299. There it was shown that within short intervals of time a number of persons had been attacked, and either slain or severely wounded, by a man who invariably used a gas pipe wrapped in cloth or paper. He was positively identified by one of his victims who escaped death at his hands, and this evidence was admitted against him in the trial for murder of another whom he had attacked fatally. His peculiar personal characteristics were therefore admissible to show that he did the act complained of.

The last exception noted by Mr. Justice Moore is: "(5) When a prisoner is charged with any form of illicit sexual intercourse, evidence of the commission of similar crimes by the same parties is admissible to prove an inclination to commit the act for which the accused is put upon his trial." This exception limits illicit commerce among sexes to that between the same parties, and no authority has been cited where this rule is enlarged so as to admit testimony about acts of sexual intercourse with other parties than the one named in the indictment.

In State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 245, 289, 24 Am. Rep. 69, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 506, the doctrine is summarized thus: "1. It is not permitted to the prosecution to attack the character of the prisoner unless he first puts that in issue by offering evidence of his good character. 2. It is not permitted to show the defendant's bad character by showing particular acts. 3. It is not permitted to show in the prisoner a tendency or disposition to commit the crime with which he is charged. 4. It is not permitted to give in evidence other crimes of the prisoner, unless they are so connected by circumstances with the particular crime in issue as that the proof of one fact with its circumstances has some bearing upon the issue on trial other than such as is expressed in the foregoing three propositions." In that case the defendant was on trial upon an indictment charging him with the murder of a young girl while passing over a certain road on her way to school. It was proved, and very properly too, that he had been previously seen about the same place, lurking in the bushes and at times running after school girls on their way to that school, and made various inquiries about different girls passing that way. The theory of the prosecution was that he had committed the murder in an attempt to rape the deceased. Besides the evidence already alluded to, the state was allowed to call another woman, who testified that at some time before the commission of the crime in question, he had raped her at an entirely different place in Canada. Sixty pages of the report are devoted to the exhaustive consideration of this case, and for the admission of the testimony about the former rape on the witness mentioned, the judgment of conviction was reversed. Summing up on that point, the court says: "However extreme the case may be, I think it will be found that the courts have always professed to put the admission of the testimony on the ground that there was some logical connection between the crime proposed to be proved other than the tendency to commit one crime as manifested by the tendency to commit the other."

In Com. v. Snow, 111 Mass. 411, a witness other than the accomplice who participated in the sodomy mentioned in the indictment was allowed to testify that the defendant attempted to commit the same offense with him; said that it would not hurt, and that he had done it with other boys. Under the peculiar circumstances as disclosed by the other evidence, the court admitted that part of the statement to the effect that he had done it with other boys as tending to show a confession of the defendant of the crime charged in the indictment, but said: "The fact that the defendant attempted to commit, with Emerson, a like offense to that charged in the indictment, was not competent by itself. . . . It is true, as the defendant contends, that other instances of a like offense committed by the defendant are not admissible to establish his guilt in the particular instance charged. For the same reason, his confession of such other offenses would not be competent."

Proper v. State, 85 Wis. 630, 55 N. W. 1040, is quoted in some of the cases relied upon by the prosecution here. That was a charge of statutory rape upon Clara O'Brien, a female child under the age of twelve years. A girl named Emma testified on behalf of the state that she and Clara slept together, and one night the defendant came and got into bed with them both and had intercourse with Emma. Commenting 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

upon this testimony the court says: "A greater latitude of proof as to other like occurrences is allowed in cases of sexual crimes. Upon a prosecution for adultery, evidence of previous acts of improper familiarity, amounting to adultery, between the same persons, was held competent either in corroboration of witnesses for the prosecution, or to show the disposition of the parties to commit the crime. . . . We do not suppose that evidence that the defendant had committed adultery or been guilty . . . of . . . familiarity with the girl Emma at another time or place would be competent evidence on the trial of the present issue, but rest our ruling on the ground, already stated, that the act of the defendant in going to the room where both Emma and the prosecutrix were sleeping, and getting in bed with them, was a grossly indecent assault on both."

The case of People v. O'Sullivan, 104 N. Y. 481, 58 Am. Rep. 530, 10 N. E. 880, was a case where the defendant was charged with rape of his servant girl. The court allowed evidence of previous attempts to commit the crime upon the prosecutrix, but said: "In this case it would have been incompetent to prove that the defendant had committed, or attempted to commit, a rape upon any other woman."

In the cases of Scott v. People, 141 Ill. 195, 30 N. E. 329; Lamb v. State, 66 Md. 285, 7 Atl. 399; State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 153, 17 Atl. 483, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 207; State v. Markins, 95 Ind. 464, 48 Am. Rep. 733; People v. Skutt, 96 Mich. 449, 56 N. W. 11; and People v. Jenness 5 Mich. 305,—the previous attempts and acts mentioned in the indictment were admitted, but in every case without exception they were expressly limited to acts between the same parties.

As said by Mr. Justice Gabbert in Jaynes v. People, 44 Colo. 535, 99 Pac. 325, 16 Ann. Cas. 787: "It is not proper to raise a presumption of guilt on the ground that, having committed one crime, the depravity it exhibits makes it likely he [the defendant] would commit another. The reason for the rule is that no person shall be convicted of an offense by proving that he is guilty of another. Evidence of this character tends to create a prejudice in the minds of the jury against the accused, multiplies the issues, and may confuse and mislead the jury."

In Coleman v. People, 55 N. Y. 90, Allen, J., enunciates the principle thus: "A person cannot be convicted of one offense upon proof that he committed another, however persuasive in a moral point of view such evidence may be. It would be easier to believe a person guilty of one crime if it was known that he had committed another of a similar character, . . . but the injustice of such a rule in courts of justice is apparent. It would lead to convictions upon the particular charge made by proof of other acts in no way connected with it, and to uniting evidence of several offenses to produce conviction for a single one." That case is cited with approval in State v. Williams, a Utah case reported in 38 Utah, 273, 103 Pac. 250, where it was decided that "in a prosecution for rape on a child of ten, evidence of prosecutrix that after the assault had been completed, defendant stated that there were other female children that had come to his house with whom he had committed the same offense, was inadmissible." Mr. Justice McCarty, who wrote the opinion, comments on the subject thus: "The statement that he had committed like crimes with other girls in no way tended to elucidate or explain the alleged assault upon the complaining witness. It was a narrative or recital of transactions which were neither directly nor remotely connected with the crime under consideration. The crimes thus sought to be proved were committed on other parties at other times, and were entirely distinct and separate from the specific crime charged in the information, and formed no link in the chain of events leading up to and surrounding the offense, and did not tend in the remotest degree to prove any fact whatever material to the issue.

. . . We can conceive of no purpose for which this evidence was introduced, unless it was to show a general disposition on the part of defendant to commit crimes of that character, and thereby increase the probability that he committed the one charged in this case." The opinion in the Williams Case also refers to Janzen v. People, 159 Ill. 440, 42 N. E. 862, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 489, where the defendant was charged with rape upon his daughter. Evidence that he had also raped another daughter was received over the defendant's objection, but the supreme court of Illinois held that such evidence was not admissible. Again, in Shaffner v. Com. 72 Pa. 60, 13 Am. Rep. 649, Mr. Justice Agnew, quoted with approval by Mr. Justice Moore of this court in State v. O'Donnell, 36 Or. 222, 61 Pac. 892, says: "It is a general rule that a distinct crime, unconnected with that laid in the indictment, cannot be given in evidence against a prisoner. It is not proper to raise a presumption of guilt on the ground that, having committed one crime, the depravity it exhibits makes it likely he would commit another. Logically, the commission of an independent offense is not proof, in itself, of the commission of another crime. Yet it cannot be said to be without influence on the mind, for certainly, if one be shown to be guilty of another crime equally heinous, it will prompt a more ready belief that he might have committed the one with which he is charged; it therefore predisposes the mind of the juror to believe the prisoner guilty. To make one criminal act evidence of another, a connection between them must have existed in the mind of the actor, linking them together for some purpose he intended to accomplish; or it must be necessary to identify the person of the actor by a connection which shows that he who committed the one must have done the other."

To admit testimony that the defendant at other times and places, and under wholly disconnected circumstances, had committed like offenses with parties not named in the indictment, all for the purpose of making it appear that the accused has the bent of mind adapted to such actions, would cloud the issue and confuse the jury.

The relation of the sexes is so closely allied to all that mankind holds dearest that it is very difficult to get men to think and act with judicial calmness in cases where that relation is violated or debauched. Judges themselves are but human beings like other men, and this largely accounts for the exceptions that have been ingrafted upon the law in respect to sexual crimes. Yet these exceptions, as this court has already said in State v. O'Donnell, supra, should be carefully guarded, and not extended, for the law must protect the innocent while it pursues the guilty, so that the rule is, and should be, the same in both instances.

The defendant in this criminal prosecution had the right to "demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and to have a copy thereof." Or. Const. art. 1, § 11. Here, however, he was in real truth brought to trial upon some half dozen charges, while the indictment gave him information of but one offense. Logically, under the rule announced by the court at the trial, it could make no difference in the principle if the defendant had been acquitted or convicted of the other offenses. They could be still put in evidence to show a criminal propensity on his part, and he compelled to again defend against them. In a large degree the effect of such a proceeding is to "shut the gates of mercy on mankind," so that if but once an individual suffers a lapse of virtue, thenceforward the law will pursue him with the vindictive zeal of a Javert, using a single accusation to wreak upon him the cumulative vengeance of a general inquisition.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

McBride, Ch. J., dissenting:

In my judgment the court did not err in instructing the jury that the witness Van Hulen was not an accomplice. His testimony, in brief, is to the effect that about the first Sunday in October Rodby told him that he had an appointment with the defendant, and wanted him to accompany him to the defendant's office; that he knew nothing as to the nature of the appointment and nothing as to the relations between Rodby and the defendant; that when they arrived at the office Rodby introduced him to the defendant, and that defendant at once began talking about "queans" meaning persons who practise the crime against nature; that after some conversation on this subject defendant went over and sat by Rodby on a lounge, and finally committed the act charged; that he sat there and looked on, but made no protest; that he did not go out of the room for the reason that he was afraid that if he opened the door some passer-by might see what was going on, and would form a bad impression from seeing him come out under the circumstances.

"An accomplice is . . . [one] who knowingly, voluntarily, and with common intent with the principal offender, unites in the commission of a crime." "To constitute an accomplice, one must be so connected with a crime that at common law he might himself have been convicted either as the principal or an accessory before the fact." "A person who participates in the moral guilt of a crime, but is not connected therewith in such a way that he could be indicted for the offense, is not an accomplice." See, generally, 1 Words & Phrases, 75, 76, title, "Accomplice," from which the above definitions are taken. There is nothing in any definition that I have been able to find that will include the witness Van Hulen. He did not aid; he did not abet; he did not encourage; he did not advise; and he did not participate in the offense,—and one would have to travel outside the testimony into the realm of speculation and imagination to hold him as such.

The most serious question raised is that relating to the admission of testimony tending to show that defendant had sustained similar criminal relations with other parties. The general rule is that this cannot be done. The authorities on this subject are so well collected in the notes to People v. Molinex, as re-reported in 62 L.R.A. 193, that I have only to cite the latter publication to indicate the rule and 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

most of its exceptions. I think this case falls within an important exception. It is this: "Where a crime is an unusual crime, committed by unusual means, indicating a peculiar habit or system, evidence of other like offenses committed in the same manner may be admitted." Underhill, Crim. Ev. p. 107; Wharton, Crim. Ev. § 39; State v. O'Donnell, 36 Or. 222, 61 Pac. 892; State v. La Rose, 54 Or. 555, 104 Pac. 299. Every condition of this exception is present in this case. The crime is unusual and unnatural, as its name indicates. Indeed it was committed in the present instance in so unusual a manner that a strong and plausible argument has been advanced that the facts proved do not constitute the crime charged, and it is evident that we are dealing with an offense not usually committed, and rarely committed in the manner described in the testimony. This narrows the field of investigation to the inquiry, "Who in the community would be likely to commit so unusual a crime in so unusual a manner?" The response naturally is, "Show us a person in the community who has in other instances perpetrated the offense in the same manner, and we will show you the man most likely to have perpetrated this particular offense." Murder, rape, and larceny are common. They are not infrequently associated with normal minds, but this offense is uncommon and abnormal. The mentally normal man is as incapable of committing it as the physically normal man is incapable of carrying away a rail from a railway track. Let us suppose that a man was indicted for taking, stealing, and carrying away such a rail, and that there was evidence tending to show that some one person had committed the theft, would not evidence that the person on trial was a man of enormous strength, and that he had frequently carried such burdens on other occasions, be some evidence that he was the person who carried away the particular rail charged in the indictment? Standing alone, it would not be sufficient to convict, but it would be a circumstance tending to indicate the probability of his guilt. It would stand as a single witness tree stands in relation to a corner stake of a survey. Alone it may be of small value, but when a second or third witness tree is found, the location of the corner may become a certainty. So in the case at bar it might be said that it was morally impossible that the defendant, with a good reputation and engaged in a respectable business, was morally capable of committing the crime, but the facts that he had personally committed it with A, B, and C, are so many witness trees indicating the principal fact that he possessed that abnormal moral nature that was equal to committing the act charged. It is evident that with the decay of morals that accompanies increase of wealth and luxury, we are compelled to deal with a comparatively new form of crime; the reports of this court covering a period of sixty years do not reveal a single instance of its occurrence up to the present year. It is a crime so unnatural and abhorrent that in the very nature of things it will be committed in secrecy. To apply to this new offense the rules applicable to murder, rape, and larceny will, in the vast majority of instances, be a grant of immunity to offenders. The rules of evidence are not arbitrary. They are the result of experience with prevailing conditions and the necessities of society. They are the servants, not the masters, of justice, and they change as the necessities of society change. Time was when the evidentiary test of the navigability of a stream was whether the tide ebbed and flowed in it, but as civilization advanced to new fields, the rule of evidence changed, so that the evidentiary test of navigation of a stream became the fact that vessels could actually float on its waters. No statute announced this change. It was brought about by new conditions and new necessities. Time was when an assaulted person could not justify under the law of self-defense until he had shown that he had "retreated to the wall," but under new conditions and weapons this rule was dispensed with. So here we have a new method of crime and new conditions, and to apply the archaic rules is like trying to fit a square peg into a round hole. In the days of the common law in England, when more than 160 offenses were punished with death, and cruel and long punishments were inflicted for several hundred minor offenses, and where the accused was not permitted counsel in his defense, courts were inclined to be exceedingly technical in the admission of evidence; but in this age where the presumption of innocence is emphasized at every trial, when the defendant is given double the number of peremptory challenges that is allowed to the state, where he has compulsory process to secure the attendance of witnesses, when he has the privilege of counsel, and is allowed to go upon the stand in his own behalf, the necessity for many of these archaic rules has ceased, and they may well be relegated to the scrap heap of unnecessary judicial machinery. "Where the reason for the rule ceases, the rule ceases."

Another reason for the admission of this testimony is the tendency to show the motive for the association with Rodby by dependant. It might well be contended that the association was either on account of personal friendship or from professional reasons. The fact that other young men about the age of Rodby went to defendant's room at his invitation, for the purpose of committing like offenses, indicates to some extent the motive that might have induced him to so frequently be in company with a person with whom a man in his position in life would not ordinarily associate. For this purpose the evidence was admissible under the authorities already cited. It cannot be denied that the admission of the evidence told strongly against the defendant, not only in the particulars already mentioned, but because it corroborated the testimony of Rodby as to the fact that defendant, apparently as an inducement to him to submit to the act, told him that he committed the same act with other persons. It strengthened the case of the state as to the solicitation by making it clear that the defendant actually had solicited other persons, and that they had yielded to his solicitations. There is no error shown in the record, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Eakin, J., concurs in this dissent.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

LEVI MILBRA, Admr., etc., of Edward Milbra, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

SLOSS-SHEFFIELD STEEL & IRON COMPANY.

(— Ala. —, 62 So. 176.)

Pleading — variance — pendency of action.

1. A plea of former action pending in favor of Albert Milbra, administrator of Edward Milbra, deceased, is not supported by a record showing an action in favor of Albert Milburn, administrator of Edward Milburn, deceased, even though it is attempted to show by parol that the parties are in fact the same.

Note. — Effect of misnaming estate in granting letters.

Where a court acts without jurisdiction, as where it admits to probate the will of a living person, or issues letters of administration when decedent had left a will, the letters issued in either case are ipso facto void, but if the court has jurisdiction, but the proceeding is irregular, defective, etc., the letters are merely voidable. See note to Belton v. Summer, 21 L.R.A. 146.

The court in MILBRA v. SLOSS-SHEFFIELD STEEL & I. Co. holds that a petitioner "can no more bring within the grasp of the court,

Name — idem sonans.

2. The names "Milbra" and "Milburn" are not idem sonans.

Judgment — appointment of administrator — second appointment — collateral attack.

3. A probate court which has appointed an administrator for an estate as that of a person designated by the wrong name may ignore such appointment and appoint another administrator for the estate under the proper name, without subjecting its action to collateral attack.

(April 23, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham dismissing a suit because of former action pending, brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harsh, Beddow, & Flitts, for appellant:

The records of the probate court showing nor has the court any more power to undertake, the administration of the estate of John Doe on a petition for the administration of the estate of Richard Roe, than they have a right and power to administer the estate of a living person," conceding, of course, that John Doe had never been at any time called Richard Roe, except in the petition and letters issued thereon. There are no other cases within the scope of this note in which the facts were such as to require the court to pass upon this jurisdictional question.

The holding in Ellis v. State, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 170, 21 S. W. 66, 24 S. W. 660, was somewhat similar. Here, judgment had been entered upon a petition seeking the escheat of land belonging to the estate of "Thomas Stephens, deceased," and the citation called upon all persons interested in the estate of "Thomas Stephenson." It was held that the question was one that went to the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore it could be raised for the first time on the appeal, and the judgment was reversed. But here the defect was in the order and notice, and apparently not in the petition. Generally, as to effect of summons or notice to persons by wrong initial, see notes to Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hasenwinkle, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 129, and White v. Himmelberger-Harrison Lumber Co. 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 151. As to the rule when the service is by publication, see note to Butler v. Smith, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436.

The facts in the few cases within the scope of this note are such that they neither support nor oppose the holding on the question of jurisdiction. Thus, there are a few cases where the person was known by the name used as well as by another name. The question thus presented is one of identity. L.R.A.(N.S.)

Where a person is known by three different names, and a petition is presented in one of the names upon which the court appoints a committee in lunacy for such person's estate, using the same name in making the order, there is not a jurisdictional defect, so that, upon application and a proper showing, the court may amend the order so as to show that the three different names describe the same person. *Sporza v. In Poillon v. Louisville R. Co. 140 Ky. 707, 131 S. W. 996, the administrator, in bringing an action for damages based upon defendant's negligence in causing the death of plaintiff's intestate, who was an employee of the defendant, used the name as designated in the letters, alleging that it was correct, and that defendant knew him by another name. It was held that, since defendant did not deny the identity of the person for whose death the action had been brought, but simply denied knowledge as to whether or not he had been called by the name in which suit had been brought, there was no issue as to name, and that judgment should be entered in the name in which suit had been brought, adding the other name as alias.

be paid to one who held letters of administration on the estate of "John Lebering." On the trial it was not proved that John Lebering was dead, but the court held that the letters of administration gave rise to the presumption of his death.

An application for letters of administration on the estate of "Morris Zerwinski," on the ground that the widow, who had the prior right, had made no application, will be refused where the widow appears and shows that she had obtained letters for the estate of the same person under the name of "Morris Siriski." Re Zerwinski, 51 Misc. 661, 102 N. Y. Supp. 203.

And in the cases cited, infra, there was the mixed question of identity and idem sonans. As to the doctrine of idem sonans generally, see note to Veasey v. Brigman, 13 L.R.A. 541, and as to the application of that doctrine to interchange of "d" and "t," see note to Napa State Hospital v. Dasso, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 643. The scope of this note does not include the doctrine of idem sonans, since the subject of the note presupposes that the name used is wholly different from the correct name, but the following cases suffice to show that incorrect spelling of the name in letters of administration is subject to the same general test that would be applied to misspelled names in other legal documents:

Letters of administration upon the estate of C. L. Cahill, issued to J. H. Griffin are admissible in a suit brought by J. H. Griffin, administrator of C. Cahill, deceased, to recover damages for the death of C. Cahill, since the insertion or omission of the decedent's middle initial makes no difference if his identity is certain. Alabama Steel & Wire Co. v. Griffin, 149 Ala. 423, 42 So. 1034.

And in Loveman v. Birmingham, R. Light & P. Co. 149 Ala. 515, 43 So. 411, in an action by the administrator d. b. n. for damages on the death of "Laurine Schuler," a release by the administratrix in chief, releasing the defendant from all damages for negligence in causing the death of "Laurine Schuler," is a complete bar to the action. The court said that the real question involved was not that of idem sonans, but was a question of identity of the person, and that under the evidence there could be no doubt that the decedent named in the release was the identical person named in the letters of administration and in the complaint.

Partition proceedings by the heirs of "Valentine Schuetz," of land the title of which was in "Falladine Schutz," give good title to the land. The court, in Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Surprise, — Ind. App. —, 97 N. E. 357, held that the names were idem sonans.

But in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Pierce, 34 Ind. App. 188, 72 N. E. 604, there was held to be a fatal variance between the caption in a suit in the name of "Elizabeth Peirce, administratrix of the estate of Ferdinand N. Armstrong, deceased," and a complaint alleging that defendant's negligence caused the death of "Fernando W. Armstrong," notwithstanding the fact that the complainant also alleged that "Fernando W. Armstrong" was her husband. The court held that "Ferdinand" and "Fernando" are not idem sonans, and that, while a middle letter may be omitted, yet the use of a wrong one is fatal. The report does not disclose the name in the letters, but presumably they contained the same name as used in the caption.
J. W. M.

A difference in name is merely prima facie evidence of a difference in person.

Fowler v. Stebbins, 69 C. C. A. 209, 136 Fed. 365; Brum v. Ivins, 154 Cal. 17, 129 Am. St. Rep. 137, 96 Pac. 876.

Sayre, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, being sued, pleaded at the same time a plea in abatement and pleas in bar of the suit, and the issues so raised were submitted together to a jury. More conveniently, perhaps, the two classes of pleas could have been determined separately; the plea in abatement being tried first in order. It was not impossible, however, to try the case on all pleas at once; but in that case the jury should have been instructed, in the event of a finding for defendant, to indicate by their verdict the issue on which they so found, for so only could the exact meaning and effect of such finding be determined and made to appear. As it is, we are unable to say whether the resultant judgment was intended to determine and conclude the merits of the asserted cause of action, or only the disability of the plaintiff to maintain the particular suit; but no objection to this feature of the procedure was taken, no suggestion made that the plea in abatement had been waived by the filing of the pleas in bar, no effort made to have the verdict discriminate between the issues submitted, and the court below tried the issues of law and fact as the parties presented them. We must now proceed in the same way.

Plaintiff (appellant) sought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of his intestate, those counts which were permitted to go to the jury under the evidence proceeding under the homicide act, § 2486 of the Code. In abatement of the suit, defendant pleaded that there was then pending another suit between the identical parties, on the identical cause of action. There was also plea of ne unques administrator. This, though a plea in bar, went only to plaintiff's right to maintain the suit. It did not deny deliction on the part of defendant. On these pleas, as well as on pleas in denial of defendant's wrong and pleas of contributory negligence, issue was joined and the case tried.

On a former appeal in this case the plea in abatement was held good. Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Milbra, 173 Ala. 658, 55 So. 890. To the same effect we may cite Perkins v. Moore, 16 Ala. 17. The facts upon which this plea and the plea of ne unques administrator rested, and out of which the chief difficulty of this case has arisen, were these: Albert Milbra, a brother of plaintiff administrator, first took steps to have himself appointed administrator of the estate of his father, Edward Milbra, for the purpose of bringing suit against defendant on account of the death of deceased. The testimony tended to show that, through inadvertence or misunderstanding of the attorney to whom he went, a petition was filed on behalf of Albert Milburn for letters of administration on the estate of Edward Milburn, deceased, and letters were so issued designating the administrator and the deceased exactly as they were designated in the petition. Likewise a suit was brought in which plaintiff described himself as Albert Milburn, administrator of the estate of Edward Milburn, deceased. That was the pending suit to which defendant referred in its plea in abatement, while the theory of the plea of ne unques administrator was that the prior issue of letters to Albert Milburn, as administrator of the estate of Edward Milburn, rendered the subsequent letters to plaintiff, Levi Milbra, as administrator of the estate of Edward Milbra, null and void. To establish these pleas defendant was allowed to prove by parol that the letters to Albert Milburn were intended for Albert Milbra, and permitted the jury to find that these letters authorized an administration of the estate of Edward Milbra, deceased. It may be observed, however, that the testimony offered tended only to show the attorney's mistake. There was no evidence to the effect that any of the Milbras were known or called by the name of Milburn, if that be of any consequence in this case, nor any that there was error, clerical or otherwise, in the probate record.

If defendant, instead of putting its plea in abatement into the form of mere conclusions, had pleaded the record of the alleged pending suit as it was without more,—Prout patet per recordum, as the old books put it,—it is manifest that on demurrer the plea would have been held bad. For Milbra and Milburn are not idem sonans, and prima facie they describe different persons. Defendant pleaded a record according to its supposed legal effect; but between the plea and the proof of it, there was a material and fatal variance which the testimony offered was incompetent to explain away.

"The record imports absolute and complete verity. It is neither to be increased nor diminished by any averment out of or beyond the record. It is to the record, as the law and the testimony upon which the pleader refers his claim." Dimick v. Brooks, 21 Vt. 578. And the rule is that what ought to be of record must be proved by the record. Munday v. Vail, 34 N. J. L. 418; Mondel v. Steel, 8 Mees. & W. 858, 1 Dowl. N. S. 1, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 426. But while the record cannot be contradicted or enlarged, consistently with it, and within it, the parties and subject-matter may be identified. Tarleton v. Johnson, 25 Ala. 300, 60 Am. Dec. 515. A number of our cases to the same general effect are cited by counsel for appellee on their brief.

The question then is, How far, within the principles laid down in the cases referred to, may the defendant go in its effort to eke out by parol a record which on its face does not purport to deny plaintiff's authority to sue, in order to destroy the effect of another record regular on its face, and in perfect accord with the facts, granting that authority to plaintiff? This, in a certain aspect, is a question of due process in the probate court. It involves largely more than those considerations of policy advanced by the abatement plea, which would protect defendants against vexatious multiplicity of suits, though the two propositions may come at last to the same practical result, for the policy of the abatement plea does not obtain unless the judgment rendered in the first action would conclude the parties and operate as a bar to the second. The legal effect of the plea was, at least the court on demurrer interpreted the plea as meaning, that plaintiff, to wit, Levi Milbra, as administrator of the estate of Edward Milbra, deceased, had a suit pending; but the proof was only that Albert Milburn, as administrator of Edward Milburn, deceased, had a suit pending. The defect in the situation thus disclosed could not be cured to meet defendant's purpose by assuming that, on the trial of Albert Milburn's suit, he might amend by alleging and proving that his own and his decedent's true name was Milbra. That would still leave defendant's plea in abatement wholly unsupported in its averment of the identity of the plaintiffs in the two actions.

Defendant's plea of no unques administration asserted its more essential right to be held answerable only to that plaintiff who had lawful authority to sue. Authorities cited by appellee are ample to show that when the probate court has granted letters of administration on the estate of a decedent, though the grant be voidable, it is without jurisdiction to make a second grant until the first has been revoked, and a second grant is null and void, and its invalidity may be exposed on collateral attack. But if its first effort is wholly ineffectual, then the court may ignore that effort and its record, and proceed to assert its jurisdiction and to appoint an administrator, and that, in our judgment, is what the probate court properly did in this case.

Jurisdiction attaches to persons, to things, to facts, not to mere words, and an error in name is nothing where there is certainty as to the thing; but names are necessary to due process, and to the sense and effect of those records which the courts are bound to keep. Jurisdiction must not be usurped; it must not be taken of a matter not presented or described. Proceedings omitting the names of persons and the description of things to be dealt with would be absurd. 2 Hughes, Proc. 612, 697, 1021, 1053. As real parties and a real subject-matter are essential to jurisdiction, so certainty in their designation in the pleadings, which go in material part to make up the record, is essential. A person may adopt what name he pleases, and if he deals with others, or goes to court in a name, no matter what, no harm is done. No one with whom he deals or litigates can complain; hence, the rule that the real party directing and controlling litigation may be shown by oral proof. But no one can impose arbitrary, untrue, and unknown descriptions on another person or thing. The estate of a decedent is a definite thing upon which the probate court acts, without notice to persons, by taking jurisdiction for administration. The security of titles and the protection of purchasers at administration sales make it necessary that estates be known and designated by the name of the deceased owner. A petitioner for letters of administration may call himself what he pleases, so long as he does not offend the court by fictitious pleading, but he can no more bring within the grasp of the court, nor has the court any more power to undertake, the administration of the estate of John Doe on a petition for the administration of the estate of Richard Roe, than they have a right and power to administer the estate of a living person. Now, here, Milbra and Milburn are almost as far apart as John Doe and Richard Roe. There was no testimony that the decedent was ever known or called by the name of Milburn except on the occasion of the application for letters of administration on his estate. There was no mistake, clerical or otherwise, on the part of the probate court. The record was made to correspond precisely with the petition by which the court's jurisdiction was invoked. If the probate court had subsequently dealt with the estate of Milbra in the record entitled "The Estate of Milburn," the parties interested in the estate of Milbra being present, a different question would be presented. Perhaps that would be considered a de facto administration. Perhaps, also, if defendant had been required to respond in damages to Albert, as administrator, for the death of decedent, it might have relief somewhere and somehow against a second suit by Levi. But those questions have not arisen. Defendant's only right at this time is that it be impleaded by a plaintiff with authority to bind the estate. Plaintiff in this case shows an authority of unimpeachable authenticity and regular on its face, whereas defendant's effort is not to explain who it is that is managing the first suit, for it may be conceded that Albert Milbra is doing that, but to enlarge the meaning of the probate record upon which Albert relies for authority, by showing that a grant of letters to administer the estate of Milburn concluded the court against a grant of letters to administer the estate of Milbra.

The court of probate is a court of general jurisdiction in the matter of granting letters of administration. All intendments must be indulged in favor of its records. Here the court in both instances was dealing with its own record, and must be presumed to have been informed of the facts. The facts authorized a finding that its first effort had been abortive; and, with the view of sustaining the second grant of administration, when collaterally assailed, it is proper to consider the action of the court as a finding that the first grant was ineffectual for the reasons we have stated, and that there was a vacancy in the administration of the estate of Milbra, because no administrator of his estate had been appointed. Or, if the validity of the subsequent proceeding could not be otherwise upheld, we would consider the record as having been amended so as to show a finding of the facts as they now appear. Ragland v. King, 37 Ala. 80; Cogburn v. McQueen, 46 Ala. 551; Bean v. Chapman, 62 Ala. 58; Morgan v. Casey, 73 Ala. 222. An examination of the cases cited by appellee will show that inferentially they sustain our position. Accordingly, we hold on the case presented that the letters issued out of the probate court to plaintiff in this action were not impeachable collaterally. It follows that on the issues raised by the plea in abatement and the plea of ne unques administrator plaintiff was entitled to the affirmative charge.

Other questions indicated by the assignment of errors have not been argued by counsel for appellee, and it would probably serve no useful purpose to discuss them at this time. Because the trial court failed to observe the principles which we think should have controlled its action in respect to the questions discussed, the judgment will be reversed.

All the Justices concur, except Dowdell, Ch. J., not sitting.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

FRANK J. BECK, Plff. in Err.,
v.
SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 2 IN BENT COUNTY.

(— Colo. —, 131 Pac. 398.)

Settlement — mistake — setting aside.

The settlement of an account for a less amount than was due, because of a mutual mistake as to the state of the account, may be set aside and the true balance recovered.

(April 7, 1913.)

ERROR to the District Court for Bent County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action to recover a balance alleged to be due on the contract price of a schoolhouse erected by plaintiff for defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. L. Lubers, for plaintiff in error:

A mistake of fact consists in an unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness of a fact, past or present, material to the transaction, or in the belief of the present existence of a thing material to the transaction, which does not exist, or in the past existence of a thing which has not existed.

20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 807; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 839.

Note. — Mistake as to state of account or amount due as ground of relief from compromise agreement.

As to conclusiveness of stated or settled account containing inaccuracy or error in method of mathematical calculation, see note to Ripley v. Sage Land & Improv. Co. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 787.

Unless a mistake of fact "constitutes a material ingredient in the contract of the parties and disappoints their intention by a mutual error," or "is inconsistent with good faith and proceeds from a violation of the obligations which are imposed by law upon the conscience of either party," it seems to be no ground of relief. 8 Cyc. 524.

And, accordingly, as said in Brooks v. Hall, 36 Kan. 697, 14 Pac. 236: "The rule is, if two parties having, or supposing that they have, claims upon each other, agree to compromise those claims, and to come to a general settlement of the matters in dispute between them without resorting to litigation, and they act with good faith, and stand upon an equal footing, and have equal means of knowledge as to the facts, the compromise is binding. It is not enough to set aside the compromise, that one of the parties may have been in error as to his figures."

So, where two parties have effected a compromise and settlement without any mutual mistake or fraud or unfairness, it cannot be invalidated and set aside merely because one of the parties made a mistake in subtraction at the time of the compromise, and acted upon the resulting mistake in his figures. Ibid.

And a contract deliberately made in full settlement of all matters between the parties, whereby one of them voluntarily agreed to solicit insurance for the other until his commissions amounted to $2,000, which sum was to be used toward reducing the indebtedness of the first party's deceased father to the second party, for which the former was not legally responsible, cannot be avoided by the second party, three years after it has become operative, merely on the ground that, although he had the means at hand to determine accurately the condition of the account between the parties, he executed the contract in ignorance of certain facts concerning it, and under a mistake as to the amount due to him from the first party. Brevoort v. Partridge, 156 Mich. 359, 120 N. W. 803.

Likewise, where the parties to certain long-standing and loosely kept accounts, without any computation by either of them of their respective claims, agreed to a "jumping settlement" of all matters between them, including certain notes and other matters in addition to the accounts, and gave, each to the other, receipts in full of all demands of every name and nature, one of the parties cannot, three years later, and after the death of the other party, avoid the effect of the compromise and settlement, and recover a further amount, by showing that at the time of the settlement, there was a mistake upon his books in not carrying forward the amount of one page of his ledger and adding it to the amount of his account, which mistake was discovered before the death of the other party, but never mentioned to him. Blackmer v. Wright, 12 Vt. 377.

And in the absence of fraud or mutual mistake, a compromise and settlement in full between a city and the sureties of its defaulting treasurer cannot be avoided by the city on the ground that, subsequently 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to the settlement, additional deficits of the treasurer have been discovered. Perkins v. North End Bank, 17 Wash. 100, 49 Pac. 241.

Where parties have joined in a written contract of mutual compromise and settlement on their respective demands against each other, which were largely unliquidated, although one of them was acting under a mistake, in that he had omitted from his books and statements a large payment which he had made to the other party, and the latter knowingly took advantage of this mistake, a court of equity will not grant any relief, where, notwithstanding the mistake, the party making it was at fault, and has paid no more than he should have paid in settlement of the whole controversy, and the substantial equities of the parties require no repayment to him, and the other party would not have been led to consent to any better settlement than he did, by knowledge that the first party was advised as to the true state of the matter as to which he was mistaken. Armour & Co. v. Renaker, 202 Fed. 901, affirming 191 Fed. 48.

And where, in the settlement of a claim against an estate upon a note given by the decedent, the holder of the note and the beneficiaries of the estate both acted upon a mutual mistake as to the amount due upon the note, based on a miscalculation of the holder, and the beneficiaries gave a new note and a mortgage for an amount which all parties assumed was considerably less than the amount due on the original note, the holder assuming to remit the difference in the compromise, but the amount of the new note and the mortgage was in fact more than the amount actually due on the old note, failure of the beneficiaries to discover which fact was the result of gross negligence on their part,—they cannot be relieved of their obligation, but the holder may enforce the mortgage against them for the amount actually due. Otto v. Long, 127 Cal. 471, 59 Pac. 895.

And a compromise and settlement of an open account cannot be avoided on the ground of a mistake in the written memo-

Pac. 85; Corson v. Berson, 86 Cal. 433, 25 Pac. 7.

One may surcharge by alleging and proving omissions in the account, or may falsify by showing error in some of the items stated in it.

Mr. Allen M. Lambright, for defendant in error:

There was neither mutual mistake nor mistake at all by the evidence; there was an unliquidated matter in dispute, a new consideration for the new agreement, and an agreement which is in legal effect an agreement under seal.

random in which the negotiations were conducted, where the mistake was known to and acted upon by the attorneys for both of the parties at the time of the settlement, and the settlement is a fair one in itself. Peters v. Worrall, 32 Can. S. C. 52.

But a compromise agreement whereby the conditional vendor of goods agrees to transfer the goods to the vendee, after default, for $525, under the mistaken belief that only $650 remains due and unpaid on them, whereas, in fact, the sum of $950 remains due, will be rescinded and set aside in equity for the mistake, where the vendor discovers the mistake immediately and renounces the agreement, and the other party has not acted upon it to such an extent that it would be unjust to him to be compelled to submit to the rescission. Scott v. Hall, 58 N. J. Eq. 42, 43 Atl. 50.

And where the attorney for the holder of a note, through an inadvertent error, stated to the surety of the maker too small an amount as the balance due on the note, and offered to accept the amount stated in full of the surety's liability, and upon payment of such amount gave the surety a receipt in full, it has been held that this does not preclude the holder of the note from recovering from the surety the further balance actually due, although the offer was made by way of compromise of a disputed claim, and the surety did not know of the error or expect to take advantage of it, but accepted the attorney's offer in good faith as a compromise. C. Aultman & Co. v. Graham, 29 Ill. App. 77.

So, where an account has been compromised and settled under a mutual mistake as to one item, whereby credit has been twice given for one payment, but the mistake has not influenced the settlement of the other items of the account, the mistake does not avoid the whole settlement, but the amount thus erroneously credited twice may be recovered from the debtor. Russell & Co. v. Stevenson, 34 Wash. 166, 75 Pac. 627.

And where an account containing two or three disputed items has been settled by 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) a compromise, and thereafter one of the parties discovers in the account a charge against him which is conceded by both parties to have been erroneous, but of the error in which neither party knew at the time of the settlement, the first party is entitled to recover the amount of that charge without opening the account; and in the absence of any mistake in reference to any disputed item, which could have affected the settlement, the other party is not entitled to have the whole account opened. Carpenter v. Kent, 101 N. Y. 591, 5 N. E. 787.

But where, in the compromise and settlement of certain mutual demands, largely unliquidated, one of the parties by mistake omitted from his books and the statements rendered, a payment which he had made to the other party, he cannot surcharge the settlement with the amount of this payment and recover judgment therefor, but, at most, is entitled only to have the settlement vacated and the parties restored to their original situation. Armour & Co. v. Renaker, supra.

And where one of the two partners of an insolvent firm, having commenced a suit to dissolve the partnership and for the appointment of a receiver, agrees, as a compromise, and without regard to the amount of the liabilities, for the purpose of avoiding a sacrifice of the good will of the business and a lessening of the assets by the expenses of a receivership, to pay to the other partner a certain sum for all his interest in the property and good will of the business, and to assume and pay all the indebtedness of the firm, the mere fact that, in arriving at the agreement, both parties labored under the mistake that the liabilities of the firm were about $500 more than they really were,—the available assets still being considerably less than the amount of the liabilities,—does not entitle the selling partner to recover from the other partner one half of the amount of the error, but he is entitled, at most, only to a rescission of the compromise agreement for the mutual mistake. Meinecke v. Sweet, 106 Wis. 21, 81 N. W. 986.

Musser, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this proceeding is to review the action of the district court in sustaining a general demurrer to a complaint filed by the plaintiff in error, and a judgment against him for costs; he having elected to stand on the complaint. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff had entered into a contract with the school district to erect a schoolhouse for $5,785, setting out the contract; that the plaintiff erected the schoolhouse, and thereafter, on the 26th day of May, 1910, sent to the directors a statement of the amount due him, wherein he stated that the balance unpaid on the contract price was $2,285, and there was due him for extras $100, and for damages for delay of removal of the old building and material $100, making a total of $2,485; that on May 27th, believing the statement rendered and sent by him to be true, he wrote a letter to the school board offering to accept $2,300 in full, providing settlement was made at once. Then comes the following allegation: "That on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1910, the plaintiff and defendant came to an accounting and settlement, they mutually believing the statement made by the plaintiff to the defendant, dated the 26th day of May, 1910, wherein a balance of $2,285 was shown in favor of the plaintiff on the contract price for the said building, to be a correct statement of the balance due, and both parties, acting in that belief, thereupon entered into a written settlement, which is in words and figures as follows:" Then follows the contract of settlement, wherein it was recited that the plaintiff and the school district, through its board of directors, entered into a written agreement for the erection of the school building; that divers sums of money had been paid to the plaintiff on account of the contract; that divers disputes existed between the parties, the board claiming that the contract had not been kept by the plaintiff, and that they had been delayed in the use of the building and thereby greatly damaged, and that they became liable for architect's charges, time, and expense, and had been otherwise damaged; 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and that the plaintiff also claimed that he had been delayed with his work by the failure of the board to remove the old schoolhouse, and furnish cement on demand; that the plaintiff had offered to compromise the differences and to take and accept the sum of $2,385 in full payment, satisfaction, and discharge of all the balance due on account of the amounts to be paid under the said contract, and all extras and damages of whatever nature and in full for all sums due him, and the district had accepted the compromise offered. After the recital of these matters, the contract stated that, in consideration of the premises and of $1 to each party in hand paid by the other, and in consideration of the payment of $2,385 to the plaintiff, the receipt of which he acknowledged, each party acknowledged that settlement in full had been made of all amounts due or to become due under the building contract, or any extras or damages, in whatever manner arising out of said contract, and of all damages or claims held by said district against the plaintiff on account of any delays, damages, or default in any manner, and the parties released and discharged each other from all claims, debts, or liabilities which existed between them.

The complaint then alleged that, since the settlement, the plaintiff had discovered error and false credit given the district, of which he was ignorant at the time, and that the statement of account rendered by him, showing a balance of $2,285 unpaid him on the contract price, was error and wrong; that the balance due was $3,285, and set forth the payments made; that the error arose on the part of the plaintiff through the fact that he was erecting another school house for district No. 7, and had received a payment from that district of $3,500, and, through inadvertence, error, and mistake, mixed the accounts of the two districts, and had given the defendant district a credit of $3,500, which was $1,000 more than he had received from it, and then alleges: "That on June 4, 1910, the plaintiff, believing that he had received from the defendant the sum of $3,500 on such contract, and the board of directors of the defendant believing that they had paid such sum unto the plaintiff, they and each of them, in that belief, entered into said final written settlement of said date; and that said settlement is incorrect in that the balance therein should have been $3,300 in favor of the plaintiff, instead of $2,300."

The complaint then goes on and alleges that as soon as the plaintiff discovered the error, about one week after the settlement, he notified one of the directors of the mistake and asked that it be corrected, and that the defendant pay him the further sum of $1,000; that from time to time thereafter he had demanded of the several directors the payment of said sum, and that the directors refused to correct the settlement of June 4th. Plaintiff prayed to be let in to prove the error in stating the account and in the settlement of June 4th, and that the same be corrected, and that there be judgment against the defendant for $1,000, with interest.

There is no doubt that the complaint alleges that the settlement of June 4th, evidenced by the written contract, was made upon the understanding by each of the parties that the balance due on the contract price was $2,285, and that it alleges that both parties were mistaken about this, and that the true amount unpaid on the contract price was $3,285 instead of $2,285. So that it appears from the complaint that the compromise offer made by the plaintiff and its acceptance by the defendant, and the written agreement of settlement of June 4th, occurred without consideration by either of the parties of this difference of $1,000, and was based upon mutual error and mistake. There can be no question that the amount unpaid from the district to the plaintiff on the contract price was an essential element to be considered in the settlement of the controversy existing between them, and that the complaint alleges that there was a mistake made as to this element. In Page on Contracts, vol. 1, § 71, it is said that it is substantially unquestioned that the general rule is that a contract entered into because of mistake as to an essential element is void. Perhaps it is better to say that the general rule is that a contract entered into because of a mistake as to some essential element may be avoided in a proper action. If the plaintiff made his offer of compromise under the mistaken idea that he had received $3,500 from the district, when he had received but $2,500, and the directors, falling into the same error, or knowing that the plaintiff was in error, took advantage of it, accepted the compromise offer, whereupon the contract of full settlement was made, it certainly seems that in equity and good conscience the plaintiff ought to be relieved from such a contract, induced by such an error, and an examination of the authorities shows that they are practically unanimous in saying that such a mistake will vitiate such a contract. In Page on Contracts, vol. 1, § 72, it is said: "So if A gives his note to B, thinking that there is a balance due from him to B for which such note is given, when in fact nothing is due, such note may be avoided as to B or an indorsee with notice. Thus, if A is mistaken as to the amount of his indebtedness, and under such mistake gives a note for too large an amount, equity will give rescission and cancel the note on payment of the amount due, and, if he has overpaid his debt, will decree repayment of such excess. A similar rule exists where one by mistake assumes a debt due him to be smaller than it is.

. . . So if, under a mistaken belief that no credit had been given for a payment which had been made, and in fact credited, the creditor gives a receipt in full on payment of less than the real amount due in pursuance of a contract settling the account, he may recover such difference. Any other contract entered into under mistake as to the amount due on a pre-existing liability and based thereon may be avoided for such mistake."

In St. Louis Lager Beer Bottling Co. v. Colorado Nat. Bank, 8 Colo. 70, 5 Pac. 800, it is said that an account stated or settled is open to impeachment for mistakes or errors. The following authorities, wherein settlements induced by or made through mistakes as to essential elements occurring in various ways, and wherein such settlements were set aside or the injured party permitted to recover the amount lost by the mistake, support the conclusion that, if the allegations of the complaint in this case are true, the plaintiff is entitled to relief. Lawler v. Jennings, 18 Utah, 35, 55 Pac. 60; Russell & Co. v. Stevenson, 34 Wash. 166, 75 Pac. 627; Gould v. Emerson, 160 Mass. 438, 39 Am. St. Rep. 501, 35 N. E. 1065; Carpenter v. Kent, 101 N. Y. 591, 5 N. E. 787; Conville v. Shook, 144 N. Y. 686, 39 N. E. 406; C. Aultman & Co. v. Graham, 29 Ill. App. 77; Powell v. Plant, — Miss. —, 23 So. 399; Fink v. Smith, 170 Pa. 124, 50 Am. St. Rep. 750, 32 Atl. 566.

The complaint sets out the contract of settlement, and the plaintiff prays to be let in to prove the error in the settlement, and that it be corrected. This shows sufficiently that the plaintiff desires that the contract of settlement of June 4th be set aside and a new settlement be made, based upon the true facts, and undoubtedly, if the allegations of the complaint are true, the plaintiff is entitled to such relief, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

L. T. PENICK, SR., Exr., etc., et al., Appts.,
v.
MRS. Z. D. ATKINSON et al.

(139 Ga. 649, 77 S. E. 1055.)

Tax — on perpetual lease.

A lease of land to A for as long as he, his heirs, or assigns shall pay a stipulated annual ground rent to the lessor or his heirs or assigns, and shall comply with the covenants therein stated, creates a base or determinable fee, and the property should be taxed to the lessee as owner.

(April 15, 1913.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Morgan County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to compel a lessor to reimburse a lessee for taxes assessed upon the leasehold and paid by the lessee. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. H. George, K. S. Anderson, John C. Hart, and T. S. Felder, Attorney General, for appellants.

Mr. Samuel H. Sibley, for appellees:

The lessee does not owe taxes on the unencumbered fee, but only on his interest at its market value.

Wells v. Savannah, 87 Ga. 401, 13 S. E.

Headnote by EVANS, P. J.

Note. — Taxation of land under perpetual lease or ground rent.

For the purposes of this note, leases for ninety-nine years and like periods are considered as perpetual leases.

Practically all of the cases support the holding in PENICK v. ATKINSON, that land under a perpetual lease is taxable to the lessee.

Thus, in Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Asso. v. Reeves, 79 N. J. 334, 75 Atl. 782, affirmed in 80 N. J. L. 464, 79 Atl. 1119, the assessment of taxes against a lessee on account of his interest in the land was held to be proper where he held under a lease for ninety-nine years, renewable to the lessee, his heirs, and assigns forever, where the rent reserved was grossly disproportioned to the value of the land and the lessee owned the buildings and improvements.

In Elmira v. Dunn, 22 Barb. 402, it was held that the interest of a lessee of land, held under a lease from a village given for 990 years in consideration of a certain sum in hand paid and a nominal annual rent, if demanded, was rightfully taxed to the lessee as real estate of which he was the owner.

In Connecticut Spiritualist Camp-Meeting Asso. v. East Lyme, 54 Conn. 152, 5 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

442; Mixon v. Stanley, 100 Ga. 377, 28 S. E. 440.

Evans, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 3, 1880, Atharates Atkinson and F. C. Foster, as executor of A. G. Foster, jointly executed the following instrument:

"Whereas, Atharates Atkinson of the said county did lease from Albert G. Foster, late of said county, deceased, two lots on the northeast side of the public square in the city of Madison in said county, one known as the Masonic Hall corner, and one the Goldberg lot, upon condition that the said Atkinson might erect houses thereon, paying the said Foster for the ground rent thereof the sum of $300 annually on or before the 1st day of July in each and every year, the said Atkinson to retain possession so long as he paid said rent, and upon his failure to pay the same according to the terms of said contract, then in that event the said Foster to take absolute possession of said property and the buildings thereon as his property; and whereas, said contract went into effect during the year 1869, and the said Atkinson went into possession and has continually paid his rents for each and every year since the making of said contract, with the exception of the year beginning July 1, 1880, as appears from the receipts of said Foster; and whereas, the said Foster departed this life on the 9th day of

Atl. 849, it was held that leases made by a camp-meeting association of lots for a price paid in advance and running to the lessees, their heirs, and assigns forever, but forfeitable upon breach of certain conditions, constituted the lessees owners, their title being a determinable or base fee; and such lots were taxable to the lessees, and not to the association.

In Dennis's Appeal, 72 Conn. 369, 40 Atl. 545, capital of a corporation invested in a lease of real estate for 999 years, an annual rent being reserved and the lessee being liable for the taxes, was held to be invested in real estate within the meaning of a statute which provided that capital invested in real estate on which it is assessed and pays a tax shall be deducted from the market value of its stock in its returns to the assessors.

In Cincinnati College v. Yeatman, 30 Ohio St. 276, a lease of a part of the second story of a building for ten thousand years in consideration of a lump sum paid in advance, free of all rent and renewable forever, was held to be an estate in land liable to taxation in the name of the lessee.

In Frank v. McCrossin, 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 93, the holder of land under ground rent is held to be personally liable for payment of taxes on the land.

July, 1880, without having reduced said contract to writing:

"Now, therefore, for the purpose of having written evidence of the same, we, the undersigned Atkinson and F. C. Foster, as executor of A. G. Foster, late of said county, deceased, do hereby contract with one another, the same being the contract verbally entered into and put in execution by and between the said Atkinson and Albert G. Foster as hereinbefore set forth: The said Atkinson obligates and binds himself to pay to the said Foster, executor, as aforesaid, or to whomsoever may be the legal holder of this paper under a division in distribution of the estate of said A. G. Foster, and before the 1st day of July of each year, commencing with July, 1880, the sum of $300, and on failure to do so he is to have ninety days' notice; then in that event he is to turn over the possession of said lots and houses and premises to the legal holder of said lots, houses, and possessions, and the legal holder of this paper, or otherwise will be considered as a tenant holding over. In consideration of which the said Fred. Foster, Ex'r, as aforesaid, agrees that so long as the said Atkinson, his heirs or assigns, pay said rent and comply with his contract herein set forth, he, the said Atkinson, his heirs, and assigns, shall remain in the legal possession of said premises as tenant."

The plaintiffs, alleging themselves to be the successors in title of Atkinson, brought suit against the defendants, who are the successors in title of Foster, alleging that the city of Madison had assessed for taxation the land, together with the improvements thereon, at a stated sum, three fourths of which is attributable to the improvements, and one fourth of the assessment is attributable to the land without the improvements. The plaintiffs contended that the taxes should be borne in that proportion by them and the defendants. The defendants declined to admit the plaintiffs' contention. Whereupon the plaintiffs paid the whole tax under an agreement with the defendants that they would submit an issue to the courts as to what portion of the assessed tax, if any, was legally collectable of the defendants. The jury, under the court's instruction, found that the tax was apportionable, and fixed the amount to be paid by the defendants. The defendants moved for a new trial, which being refused they excepted.

The instrument out of which grows this suit was construed, in Atkinson v. Orr, 83 Ga. 34, 9 S. E. 787, to be a perpetual lease on condition of the prompt payment of an annual ground rent. The exigencies of the present action call for further interpretation, so as to determine the nature of the estate or interest passing thereunder to the lessee. As ordinarily employed, the word "lease" implies a term and reversion to the owner of the land after its termination, and only a chattel interest passes. In the argument of the learned chief justice, who de-

In Franciscus v. Reigart, 4 Watts, 98, and Philadelphia Library Co. v. Ingham, 1 Whart. 72, it was held that one holding land under a ground rent in fee is liable for the taxes on the land, and is not entitled to deduct the amount of taxes paid by him from the annual rent.

In State ex rel. Glenn v. Mississippi River Bridge Co. 134 Mo. 321, 35 S. W. 592, it is held that a lease by a bridge company to a railroad company in perpetuity, with a defeasance clause, leaves the legal title in the bridge company; and the bridge is taxable as a bridge, and not as railroad property.

However, in Wilgus v. Com. 9 Bush, 556, a lease for ninety-nine years, with a provision for perpetual renewal, is held to be personalty, and is not to be listed as real estate for purposes of taxation.

The fact that the fee of land is in the public does not prevent the levy of taxes upon the land when leased in perpetuity to an individual.

Thus, a municipality may lay taxes upon land which it has let at an annual rental for a term of ninety-nine years, renewable forever, to one who covenants to pay, in addition to the rent, the public taxes levied on the property. Norfolk v. J. W. Perry Co. 108 Va. 28, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, 128 Am. St. Rep. 940, 61 S. E. 867, affirmed in 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

220 U. S. 472, 55 L. ed. 548, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465.

In Street v. Columbus, 75 Miss. 822, 23 So. 773, it is held that school section lands leased to individuals for terms of ninety-nine years, renewable forever at the option of the lessees, are taxable.

In Washington Market Co. v. District of Columbia, 4 Mackey, 416, property leased by Congress to a corporation for ninety-nine years under a statute which declared the property of the corporation subject to taxation, and that the lease should be taken and considered as a determinable fee, was held to be taxable to the company on the same footing as property owned in fee by other property holders.

And in Well's v. Savannah, 87 Ga. 397, 13 Ill. 442, land held by purchase from the city, the terms of purchase being an annual ground rent forever, or, at the option of the purchaser, his heirs, etc., the payment of the full amount of the stipulated purchase money at the time, was held to be taxable as the property of the purchaser or his successor in title.

The general question as to the right to tax property leased to individuals by the public is discussed in a note to Norfolk v. J. W. Perry Co. 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167.

livered the opinion in Atkinson v. Orr, supra, he made a clear demonstration that the parties to this instrument meant something more than the creation of a tenancy by the year, or from year to year. Two features were especially stressed by him, viz.: That there was no specification or limit to the character or value of the buildings to be erected by the lessee, and that all buildings, however expensive or valuable, were to become the absolute property of the lessor in the event of the nonpayment of rent for a single year. He also took into consideration that the lease was in perpetuum, and that the owner of the premises was to be restored to possession, not by the termination of any term, but by a forfeiture and re-entry upon failure to pay rent. And when it is further considered that the right of possession in express words is extended to the lessee, "his heirs, or assigns," it is clear that the learned chief justice was not speaking of leases in the ordinary acceptation of the word; but when he characterized this instrument as a perpetual lease he had in mind the quality of the estate that the lessee took, which was something more than a leasehold interest. A decisive indication that the instrument was not intended as a technical lease, or to create a chattel interest, is that the lessee shall have and retain possession of the premises for himself, his heirs, and assigns, so long as he complies with his contract. The original signification of the word "lease" is that the lessee has an estate into which he cometh by lawful means. Co. Litt. 43b. The grant of the possession of one's land to another and his heirs will pass a fee, for the reason that an absolute grant of exclusive possession of land is inconsistent with any other estate except that of a fee. The estate is to be held by the grantee, his heirs, or assigns, so long as the grantee, his heirs, or assigns, shall pay the rent reserved and comply with the conditions of the grant. The effect of this limitation is not to render the estate granted less than a fee, but only to render it a base or defeasible fee. A perpetual lease sometimes has been referred to and considered the legal equivalent of a conveyance in fee reserving rent. 1 Tiffany, Land. & T. § 11; Folts v. Huntley, 7 Wend. 210.

In Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 9 Allen, 159, it was held that "an instrument by which, for a consideration received all at one time, the grantors 'lease' certain land to the grantee, mentioning no time during which the estate is to continue, and reserving, 'so long as this lease shall continue, the right to any logs or pipes in the same leased premises,' and certain other rights connected therewith, to have and to hold the same to the grantee, 'his heirs, and assigns under the restrictions and reservations aforesaid, so long as said grantors shall keep pipes in his land, as aforesaid, and no longer,' conveys a base fee." The supreme court of Pennsylvania has held that a lease to A B, his heirs, and assigns creates a base fee. Robb v. Beaver, 8 Watts & S. 107. In Connecticut Spiritualist Camp Meeting Asso. v. East Lyme, 54 Conn. 152, 5 Atl. 849, a corporation owning a camp ground upon which was erected a pavilion, and in which religious services were held, leased cottages on the camp ground to lessees, the lease being to the lessee and "his heirs and assigns forever," but forfeitable on breach of certain conditions; and it was held that such a lease created a determinable or base fee.

We think that a perpetual lease is the substantial equivalent of a fee reserving rent. A grant of land to another, reserving a fixed annual rent, with power to re-enter for nonpayment of rent, creates a defeasible fee. Van Rensselaer v. Hays, 19 N. Y. 68, 75 Am. Dec. 278; Stephenson v. Haines, 16 Ohio St. 478; Hudson Tunnel Co. v. Atty. Gen. 27 N. J. Eq. 573. In the last-cited case lands under water were granted by the state, and in the grant a rent, payable to the state, was reserved, and in the instrument of grant power to re-enter for nonpayment of rent was also reserved. One of the questions was, What interest in the land did the state have under this grant? In the opinion it was said: "The interest which the state has in the premises is, not an actual estate. It consists merely in a charge to secure the payment of the rent reserved by distress and re-entry and taking possession. On a grant of the whole estate in fee simple, reserving a certain rent, with a clause for distress and re-entry for nonpayment of the rent, the owner of the rent has neither seigniority nor reversion. 2 Stephens's Com. 25; Co. Litt. §§ 217, 218. A right of entry is not a reversion or estate in the land. Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 121. Nor is a mere possibility of reverter for condition broken, which may or may not happen, an estate in reversion. 4 Kent, Com. 354; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 390."

Ground rents are not unknown to the jurisprudence of this state. Three cases involving this subject have been considered by this court: Laurence v. Savannah, 71 Ga. 392; Savannah v. Weed, 84 Ga. 683, 8 L.R.A. 270, 11 S. E. 235; Wells v. Savannah, 87 Ga. 397, 13 S. E. 442. In the latter case land demised forever, subject to a perpetual rent, was treated as the property of the grantee, his heirs, and assigns, and ground rent reserved was treated as an incorporeal hereditament, belonging to the vendor, his heirs, and assigns.

We have reached the conclusion, from the foregoing considerations, that under the instrument in this case Atkinson took a base fee,—that is, an estate in fee,—defeasible upon noncompliance with the conditions therein named; and that the estate of Foster reserved an annual rent charge, which, so long as the estate granted is not forfeited, is an incorporeal hereditament. The base fee and the ground rent are inheritable, and the heirs and assigns of each sustain the same relation to each other as did the original parties to the instrument. Scott v. Lunt, 7 Pet. 596, 8 L. ed. 797; McCammon v. Cooper, 69 Ohio St. 366, 69 N. E. 658.

Our Civil Code, § 1018, declares that “taxes are to be charged against the owner of property if known, and against the specific property itself if the owner is not known. Life tenants, and those who own and enjoy the property, are chargeable with the tax thereon.” Hence, while the public may treat property as belonging either to the maker or the holder of a bond for titles, when the latter is in possession, yet as between the parties the one receiving the rent or enjoying the use is liable for the tax.” [Civil Code, 1895, § 778.] Applying this principle to the case at bar, the owners of the base fee (the defendants in error in this case) are chargeable with the tax assessed against the land and improvements. Wells v. Savannah supra; Franciscus v. Reigart, 4 Watts, 98; Connecticut Spiritualist Camp Meeting Asso. v. East Lyme, supra.

The petition was projected and the case tried on the hypothesis that the two parties in the contract had separate interests in the land, and that as between themselves there should be an apportionment of the tax. But, as we have attempted to demonstrate, such is not the case. As we view it, the owner of the base fee is the owner of the property in possession, and is liable for such taxes as may be assessed against the property. It is true that his property is burdened with a ground rent, but that gives him no more right to call upon the owner of the ground rent for contribution than, if the property was encumbered by mortgage, to call upon the mortgagee to share in the payment of the tax assessed upon the property. The mortgagee pays taxes on his mortgage and the mortgagor on the property. Likewise, the owner of the ground rent is personally liable for the tax on his ground rent, and the owner of the base fee is liable for the taxes assessed against the land.

Judgment reversed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

W. F. STERMAN, Appt.,

v.

J. M. HANN.

(— Iowa, —, 141 N. W. 934.)

Exemptions — undivided interests.

1. That a physician owns only a half interest in a safe of which he is in possession, which he uses in his business, does not prevent his claiming it to be exempt from execution.

Same — office safe.

2. A safe used by a physician in his business for the keeping of his instruments and books and medicines is exempt from execution.

Same — notice of exemption — elements.

3. Under the Iowa statutes a debtor claiming property levied on under execution to be exempt need not state the extent of his interest in the property, from whom acquired, the consideration paid, and the nature of the interest claimed by the execution creditor.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Madison County in defendant's favor in an action brought to Note. — Exemption of safe from execution.

The majority of the cases involving the question under consideration herein reach a conclusion similar to that arrived at in STERMAN v. HANN, but the several decisions of necessity turn largely upon the wording of the particular statute under which the exemption is sought to be had.

In Cunningham v. Bricton, 101 Wis. 378, 77 N. W. 740, holding that a merchant, under a statute exempting the tools, implements, and stock in trade of any mechanic, merchant, trader, or other person, used to carry on his trade or business, not exceeding a certain sum, may select as exempt from execution the safe used in his business, the court said that “Exemption laws must be liberally construed; that, in following out the constitutional mandate, the legislature must provide for the enactment of laws giving the debtor a reasonable amount of property to be held free from the claims of creditors; that such laws are founded on the soundest considerations of public policy, and are designed to stimrecover a half interest in a certain safe levied on under execution and claimed by plaintiff to be exempt. Reversed.

Statement by Gaynor, J.:

Action in replevin to recover a half interest in a certain safe levied on under execution, and claimed to be exempt on the grounds that the plaintiff was a physician and surgeon and used the same in and about his business.

Messrs. C. A. Robbins, W. S. Cooper, and Leo C. Percival, for appellant:

Exemption laws are to be liberally construed to carry into effect the purposes for which they were enacted.

An iron safe has been held to be exempt in the hands of an abstracter of titles, under a statute exempting to mechanics, miners, and other persons, necessary tools and instruments kept for the purpose of carrying on their trade or business.

The safe of a jeweler, necessary in the profitable conducting of his business, is exempt under a statute exempting tools or implements of a mechanic or artisan necessary to carry on his business.

ulate individual freedom and manly citizenship. . . . The law says that the 'tools and implements and stock in trade' belonging to classes named shall be exempt. Under the rule of liberal construction, the words 'tools and implements' should be construed to cover such articles as are usually used in, and are reasonably necessary to carry on, the trade or business of the claimant."

And the safe of a jeweler or watch repairer has been held exempt under a statute providing that the "tools or implements of a mechanic or artisan necessary to carry on his trade" shall be exempt from execution, it being said that the term "implements" is sufficiently broad to include any instruments needed and used for the purpose of carrying on a trade or business. Re McManus 87 Cal. 292, 10 L.R.A. 567, 22 Am. St. Rep. 250, 25 Pac. 413.

And an iron safe used by an insurance agent and abstracter of titles was held to be an instrument within the meaning of a statute exempting the "necessary tools and instruments" of any person "used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business," in Davidson v. Sechrist, 28 Kan. 324, quoted in STERMAN v. HANN.

So, in Betz v. Maier, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 219, 33 S. W. 710, an insurance agent was held to be engaged in a "trade or profession," and the safe used by him to keep his papers, etc., to be a "tool or apparatus," within the meaning of the Texas statute exempting such articles when belonging to "any trade or profession," from forced sale.

And under a statute exempting from seizure under execution the tools and instruments necessary for the exercise of the trade or profession by which a debtor gains a living, iron chests used by a merchant for the keeping of his books and papers were held exempt, in Farmers' & M. Bank v. Franklin, 1 La. Ann. 393.

And see Harrison v. Mitchell, 13 La. Ann. 260, wherein it was held that an iron safe was not subject to execution under the rule that the implements by which the business of a commercial firm is carried on are not legally subject to seizure or execution.

But a safe belonging to an undertaker and used by him in his business was held not to be within the meaning of a statute exempting "professional instruments and furniture" from execution, in O'Reilly v. Erlanger, 108 App. Div. 318, 17 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 254, 95 N. Y. Supp. 760, affirming 46 Misc. 278. 92 N. Y. out of the office of the justice of the peace, levied upon the safe and took the same into his possession as the property of the plaintiff. That at the time the safe was levied upon by the defendant it was in plaintiff's possession. He was a married man and the head of a family, and a practising physician and surgeon. The safe was kept by the plaintiff in his office, and he had the possession, custody, and control of the same, and was using it in connection with his business, and for the purpose of keeping therein his professional instruments, books, and accounts, and certain rare and valuable medicines. That soon after the levy on the safe the plaintiff served on the defendant the notice required by § 3991 of the Code of 1897, claiming the same as exempt, and demanding the return of the safe to him. The defendant, answering, admits that he received the notice to release the safe as exempt, but says that he took the same under an execution against the plaintiff, issued upon a certain judgment in favor of J. F. Tate. He says that all he did was to take and hold it under the execution, and was so holding it at the time this action was commenced. He denies that the safe was exempt from execution, and asks that plaintiff's petition be dismissed. Upon the issues thus tendered, the case was tried to the court without a jury, and the court found for the defendant, dismissing plaintiff's petition.

This is an action in replevin, and the only questions submitted for our consideration are: First. Can a person maintain exemption under § 3991 of the Code, where the property claimed to be exempt was held by him in common with another? Second. Can a physician hold, as exempt, a safe kept and used by him in his office in connection with his business as physician and surgeon, for the purpose of keeping therein his professional instruments, books, and accounts, and medicines?

It must be borne in mind at the outset that exemption laws are to be liberally construed; that they are given to the debtor to secure to him the necessary comforts of life for himself and family, and are enacted on the ground of public policy, for the purpose of saving debtors and their families from want, by reason of misfortune or improvidence and should be so construed as to carry out the intent and purpose of the legislature.

On the first proposition it seems to be well settled that a debtor may claim personal property exempt which he owns in common with another, and that title in severalty is not necessary. In support of this, see Servanti v. Lusk, 43 Cal. 238; 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Heckle v. Grewe, 125 Ill. 58, 8 Am. St. Rep. 332, 17 N. E. 437; Rutledge v. Rutledge, 8 Baxt. 33, 34; Radcliff v. Wood, 25 Barb. 52; Moyer v. Drummond, 32 S. C. 165, 7 L.R.A. 747, 17 Am. St. Rep. 850, 10 S. E. 952; Bonsall v. Comly, 44 Pa. 442.

In Radcliff v. Wood, 25 Barb. 52, the property in question consisted of a span of horses, harness, and wagon used in carrying vegetables from a farm to market. The court held that, where property is exempt under the laws of a state, it is none the less exempt because the debtor owns but an undivided interest in it, in common with a stranger to the judgment, and the court says: "To hold that, if a poor man be able to own a team by himself, it shall not be liable to sale under execution, but if he be too poor to own it alone, and joins another poor man in making the purchase, so that each has but half the benefit contemplated by the legislature, then neither shall be entitled to exemption, would, in my judgment, be a most unreasonable interpretation of the law." The same doctrine is laid down in Servanti v. Lusk, above cited.

It is true that some courts hold to a contrary doctrine. The defendant relies on Wright v. Pratt, 31 Wis. 99. The Wisconsin court holds that there may be exemptions in property held in common with another, but the exemption cannot be claimed unless the property so held is divisible. That is, it makes a distinction between divisible and indivisible property. In that court it was held that a tenant in common of personal property may claim his exemptions therein when the property is divisible in its nature, so that the share can be readily determined and set apart or apportioned with the consent of the other owner, but there seems to us no good ground for this distinction.

In the present case, the plaintiff owned the safe in common with his wife, each owning an undivided half interest. It was in his possession and under his control, with the knowledge or consent of his wife. It was used in and about his business. The defendant, under the execution, made no claim against the interest of the wife. Therefore, as against the constable, the plaintiff had the right to the possession of his wife's interest in the property, and if his interest in the property was exempt, he had the right to hold that, too, as against the levy of attachment. He therefore had dominion over the entire property. He had a right to take it, use it, and keep it, and this right came to him from the other party having a joint interest with him in the property. He had dominion over the property, with the consent of his wife, and had a right to use it in connection with his business, and for the purposes for which it could, and would, be used, were he the sole owner.

On the second proposition we hold that the safe was exempt, in the hands of the plaintiff, the same as office furniture and the supplies of a lawyer are exempt, as held in Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Goode, 101 Iowa, 160, 35 L.R.A. 690, 63 Am. St. Rep. 378, 70 N. W. 113, and Abraham v. Davenport, 73 Iowa, 111, 5 Am. St. Rep. 665, 34 N. W. 767.

In Davidson v. Sechrist, 28 Kan. 324, it was held that an iron safe was exempt to an insurance agent and abstractor of titles, under a statute similar to ours, "as . . . tools and instruments used by the owner in carrying on his business." In this case the court said: "The exemption laws must receive a liberal construction for the purpose of carrying out their object and design, and one of the main objects . . . is that every person shall have the means of carrying on some useful business, and thereby of obtaining an honest livelihood."

In the case of Re McManus, 87 Cal. 292, 10 L.R.A. 567, 22 Am. St. Rep. 250, 25 Pac. 413, the California court held that a safe owned by a jeweler and watch repairer is exempt, under a statute exempting from execution the tools and implements of a mechanic or artisan necessary to the carrying on of his business.

In Betz v. Maier, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 219, 33 S. W. 710, it was held that an iron safe is included among tools and apparatus exempt from forced sale. In this case the party claiming exemption was an insurance agent, and used the safe in which to deposit his notes and insurance policies, and other papers pertaining to his business as an insurance agent.

It is next claimed by the defendant that the notice served was insufficient, in that it failed to state truly the extent of interest in the property, from whom acquired, the consideration paid, and the nature of plaintiff's interest in the property. These requirements of the statute relate only to cases where a third person, a person other than the defendant, is claiming to be the owner of the property levied upon, and do not apply to cases where the defendant, admitting his ownership, seeks to have the property released on the grounds that it is exempt from execution. There is nothing in defendant's contention on this point.

On the whole record we think the case should be, and is, reversed and remanded. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES K. BEIDENKOPF, Appt.,
v.

DES MOINES LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, et al.

(— Iowa, — 142 N. W. 434.)

Injunction — temporary — discretion.

1. Application for a temporary injunction is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, to be guided according to the circumstances of the particular case.

Same — disputed right — effect.

2. A temporary injunction will not ordinarily be granted, if the parties are in dispute concerning their legal right, until the right is established, especially if the legal or equitable claims asserted raised questions of a doubtful or unsettled character.

Equity — preventing sale of corporate property — right of minority stockholders.

3. Equity will not interfere to prevent the confirmation of a sale by the majority stockholders of the property of a business corporation, even though it is not insolvent, if, acting without fraud and upon reasonable ground, they conclude that the exigencies of the business and the best interests of all concerned require it, at least if the protesting members will not be likely to suffer any injury for which there is no other adequate remedy.

Corporation — sale by majority stockholders.

4. The holders of a majority of the stock of a life insurance company may, upon change of management and the advent of conditions which will result in declining profits and decreased assets which may lead to insolvency, sell the business while it is in a condition to command the highest possible price.

Same — dissolution — sale of assets.

5. The sale of all the assets of the corporation is not necessarily a dissolution within the meaning of a statute requiring unanimous consent of all the stockholders to a dissolution.

Same — purchase of stock for less than value — effect.

6. A dissenting minority stockholder in a corporation cannot take advantage of the fact that the majority purchased stock of other holders for less than its value before selling all the assets of the company, unless they can establish a general scheme to defraud of which the sale attacked is merely a part.

Same — one person dominating both companies — effect on sale.

7. The mere fact that one person owned

Note. — For power of officers or majority stockholders, against consent of minority, to sell property of corporation essential to its existence as a going concern, see note to Maben v. Gulf, C. & C. Co. 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 396.

the majority of the stock of two corporations does not per se make the sale of assets of one to the other void.

Laches — temporary injunction — sale of corporate assets.

8. Laches will prevent a dissenting stockholder from securing a temporary injunction against a sale of all the assets of the corporation, if, with knowledge of a contract to do so, he delays action until the terms of the agreement have been substantially carried out.

Weaver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Des Moines Life Insurance Company is an Iowa corporation organized for the transaction of the business indicated by its title. Prior to October, 1907, it had been doing business as a mutual concern, but on the day named it was reorganized into a stock company, and adopted articles of incorporation appropriate to effectuate the change. Its capital stock was fixed at $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. Of these shares Charles E. Rawson and Louise C. Rawson, who were the principal figures in the company from the outset, held a numerical majority. The larger part of the minority stock was owned by Wilmot A. Harbach, a son-in-law of the Rawsons, and small holdings were in the hands of various individuals, among whom were the plaintiff herein and one Max Holtz, each owning one share. Plaintiff and Holtz were and are residents of New York. The company continued in active prosecution of the life insurance business, quite largely increasing the volume of insurance carried, as well as its showing of assets and profits, until the opening of the year 1912. On January 16, 1912, at the time and place fixed therefor in the articles of incorporation, the stockholders of the company assembled in annual meeting. Of this meeting plaintiff and Holtz were given no notice other than such constructive notice as was imparted by the provision of the articles naming the day, hour, and place of the annual meeting. That meeting was attended by the holders of 983 of the 1,000 shares of stock issued and outstanding. The business of the annual meeting not being completed on January 16th, it was adjourned for one week, when the transactions took place over which this litigation has arisen. Prior to this date negotiations had been begun by the Rawsons (who for alleged considerations of health wished to retire from the company) looking to the reinsurance of the business of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company in the National Life Company, a corporation of the state of Illinois, and the sale of their shares of stock in the Des Moines Life Company to one Johnson, who owned a controlling interest in the National Life.

Referring to this situation, the stockholders at the meeting above mentioned adopted by unanimous vote a resolution as follows: "Resolved by the stockholders of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company in regular annual meeting duly assembled: That the inability of C. E. Rawson and L. C. Rawson, president and vice president respectively of the company, to whose unremitting efforts through a period of more than twenty years its past success has been chiefly due, to continue longer in the active management of its affairs, and the difficulty of securing officers of known experience, ability, and integrity to take their places, render it advisable for the company to reinsure its outstanding liabilities and to retire from business. That the proposition made by National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America to reinsure the company's outstanding liabilities is satisfactory to the stockholders, and that the directors be, and hereby they are, authorized and requested to cause the proper officers of the company in its name and behalf to sign, seal, acknowledge, deliver, and carry into effect a contract of reinsurance with said National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America in terms substantially as follows, to wit: [Here follows a copy of the contract with the National Life Company.] That from and after this date, the company transact no business except such as is properly incidental to the carrying out of such contract, and to the fulfilment of its existing obligations, and to the winding up of its affairs. That the directors be, and hereby they are, authorized and requested to take such steps as may be appropriate for the voluntary liquidation of the company's business." The contract is too voluminous to be here set out. It assigns and transfers to the National Life all the property and assets of every kind and nature owned by the Des Moines Life, and empowers and authorizes the former company to collect and receive all premiums, reserves, and income thereafter becoming due and payable to the Des Moines Life. In consideration of such transfer of all the property and assets of the last-named company, the National Life assumed as its own all the policy obligations and other indebtedness of the Des Moines Life except its liability to its stockholders. In addition to the foregoing, and as a further consideration for said sale and transfer, the National Life undertook to pay the Des Moines Life $300,- 000 cash and the further sum of $400,000 in five annual payments of $80,000 each. The contract being executed, the cash installment of $300,000 was paid. On January 24, 1912, Harbach, as secretary of the Des Moines Life, addressed letters to the plaintiff and Holtz, informing them of what had been done, and inclosing to each a check for $300 as a "first liquidation dividend." In this letter the reasons for going into liquidation were stated as follows: "Owing to the continued ill health of Mr. C. E. Rawson, who has been for many years the president and manager of this company, it became necessary either to change the management of the company, or to arrange with some other company to perform its obligations. All things considered, it seemed that the latter course was most advantageous to the stockholders and the policy holders alike, provided suitable arrangements could be made with a company of the requisite financial strength and business character." The letter proceeds then to say that the National Life appears to be one of the necessary financial soundness, and the stockholders thus addressed are informed of the essential features of the sale and transfer. On January 30, 1912, plaintiff and Holtz, who appear to be acting together, each addressed a letter to Harbach, protesting that they had been given no notice of the meeting or of the proposed sale of the business, expressing their objection thereto, and returning the checks which had been sent them. No legal proceedings were instituted to prevent the carrying out of said contract until April 23, 1912, when this action was begun.

In his petition plaintiff sets out the facts above stated, and further alleges that Rawson and his wife were in substantial control of the business of the company under its original organization, and that the change thereof to a stock company was designed to perpetuate such control, and to enhance their personal profits in the business, and that said persons did in fact continue in such management until the date of the attempted liquidation. He further alleges that at the date of such liquidation the company was solvent and in the enjoyment of a large, profitable, and growing business, and owned and possessed property, money, securities, and other assets largely in excess of the securities and reserves which it was required to retain for the benefit of its policy holders, and that in such excess or accumulation of profits plaintiff was entitled to share in just proportion with other stockholders; that in making the sale of said assets and business to the National Life, and in entering upon a liquidation of its affairs, the said Des Moines Life exceeded its powers, and that the resolution authorizing such sale and the contract made in pursuance thereof are void and of no effect. He further charges that the officers of said company knew that plaintiff and other stockholders would be opposed to such proceedings and would not consent thereto, and that to prevent their opposition being made effective notice of the contemplated meeting and of the proposed sale to the National Life was fraudulently withheld from them until after the contract had been made. It is further charged that the sale of the assets and business of the company is in fact and in legal effect an attempted dissolution of the corporation, and in pursuance of such design its offices have been closed, and it has ceased to do or transact the business for which it was authorized, although under the terms of its organization it has yet many years of corporate life, and its dissolution cannot lawfully be effected except by the unanimous consent of its stockholders. As further illustrating the alleged fraudulent character of the transaction, plaintiff says that after the sale had at least been tentatively negotiated by the Rawsons at a figure making the stock worth at least $700 a share, said Rawsons, aided by Harbach, the secretary, and one Donahey, a director of the company, entered upon an organized effort to purchase the stock held by the minority members at the price of $200 per share, and, by falsely representing or concealing the fact and terms of the proposed sale to the National Life, did in fact induce many of said stockholders to part with their shares at the grossly inadequate price of $200, and that the shares so obtained were by the purchasers voted in favor of ratifying and carrying out said contract of sale. He further alleges that the officers and directors of the company having had part and share in all said wrongful transactions, application to them to bring this action would be unavailing, and that he as a stockholder is entitled to bring the same in his own name and for himself and for all other stockholders similarly situated.

By amendment to the petition it is charged that at the date of the adjourned stockholders' meeting of January 23, 1912, Johnson had become the actual or beneficial holder of all the stock, except fourteen shares only, of the Des Moines Life Company, and that said Johnson, having thus acquired full control of such company, and having already full control of the National Life Company, was enabled to manipulate and direct the action of both companies in his own interest, and fix the terms of the agreement for both parties and to his own personal profit, and that this was done in utter disregard of the rights of the Des Moines Life Company, and especially of its minority stockholders. It is finally charged that the true consideration for the sale to the National Life is not expressed in the contract, but that in addition thereto other large and valuable considerations were paid to the Rawsons and those with whom they were associated in the deal.

Upon the showing thus made, plaintiff prays the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the business and property of the Des Moines Life Company, and for a decree declaring the contract for sale and transfer of its assets and business to the National Life Company void and of no effect, and requiring the latter company to restore to the former all the property and assets delivered to or received by it in pursuance of said contract, and further requiring the Des Moines Life Company to use and administer such assets in conformity with the trust imposed upon it by its charter and by law. Plaintiff also asks for the issuance of a temporary injunction pending the final termination of the action, restraining the Des Moines Life Company and its officers from making any further delivery or transfer of its property and assets to the National Life Company, restraining said last-named company from further receiving such property and assets, and from disposing of any property or assets received from the Des Moines Life Company until the rights of the parties have been finally adjudicated.

Answering the petition, the defendants admit the sale and transfer of the assets and business of the Des Moines Life Company to the National Life Company, but deny all allegations of wrong and fraud in such transaction, and deny that they acted therein in excess of their lawful power and authority. They aver that of the 1,000 shares of capital stock of the Des Moines Life Company 998 shares were held by persons expressly consenting to such sale, and that all of said 998 shares have been transferred to and are now owned and held by Johnson, who is their sole owner. They further alleged that while the Des Moines Life had done a profitable business up to the date when liquidation was determined upon, yet by reason of the fact that Rawson and his wife, to whose efforts and business capacity such prosperity had been largely due, were compelled to retire from the company because of failing health, and by reason of the peculiar conditions then obtaining in the business of life insurance, rendering the same likely in the immediate future to be more hazardous and less profitable, it appeared both expedient and wise to accept an advantageous offer for the reinsurance of its risks and the sale of its assets, rather than to continue the business under less favorable conditions than had theretofore attended it. Under such circumstances, and acting in good faith for the benefit of all concerned, they say they entered into the contract. They further represent that, beginning immediately after the making of said contract, they began the performance of its stipulations, and long before the institution of this action all the assets of the Des Moines Life (other than the price received for said sale) were transferred and turned over to the National Life, and the instalment of $300,000, paid to the former company upon said contract, was distributed and paid out to its stockholders as a liquidation dividend. Prior to the beginning of this suit, defendants further say, more than 10,000 of the policy holders of the Des Moines Life Company had acquiesced in the contract of reinsurance, and executed their written consent to substitute the contract of the National Life for that of the Des Moines Life, thereby releasing the latter from such policy obligations, and that under the obligations so assumed by the National Life the latter has become liable to pay and has paid death claims to the amount of $94,000. Thousands of policy holders have paid to the National Life the premiums falling due upon the insurance issued by the Des Moines Life, and it is averred that the court ought not and cannot make any order or enter any judgment herein affecting the rights of the policy holders, none of whom are parties to this proceeding.

The pleadings—petition and answer—with various affidavits, counter affidavits, and exhibits, of which more specific mention is not necessary, were submitted to the court upon plaintiff's application for temporary injunction. The writ was denied by the court in a brief opinion, stating, in effect, that the demand for an injunction having been delayed some three months after the contract complained of had been made, and such contract having already been largely performed, a temporary injunction might at that stage of the proceedings be productive of harm rather than benefit to the policy holders and to others interested in the controversy. It is from this order that appeal has been taken. No trial has been had upon the merits of the dispute, and the question before us is to be disposed of upon the petition and answer and the supporting documents to which we have referred.

The foregoing statement is perhaps of tedious length, but it has seemed necessary to a fair understanding of the position of the parties to a controversy which, however small the sum immediately involved in its determination, effects directly or indirectly interests of great importance.

I. Counsel on either side have favored the court with carefully prepared briefs, discussing with great thoroughness the legal questions they believe raised by the appeal. Some of these we think unnecessarily anticipate or assume the merits of the litigation as they may appear on the trial yet to be had. The granting or refusal of the demand for a temporary injunction is not always a matter of right, even where the petition shows a probable right of relief on final hearing. Application therefore is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, to be guided according to the circumstances of the particular case. High, Inj. 4th ed. § 11.

It is, of course, familiar doctrine that this court will not interfere in such cases except upon clear showing of abuse of the discretion so reposed in the court below.

The writ is to a great extent a preventive remedy; and where the parties are in dispute concerning their legal rights, it will not ordinarily be granted until the right is established, especially if the legal or equitable claims asserted raise questions of a doubtful or unsettled character. Says the Pennsylvania court: "As a preliminary injunction is in its operation somewhat like judgment and execution before trial, it is only to be resorted to from a pressing necessity to avoid injurious consequences, which cannot be repaired under any standard of compensation." Mammoth Vein Consol. Coal Co's Appeal, 54 Pa. 183, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 460.

On the same subject Baldwin, J., in Boharte v. Camden & A. R. Co. Baldw. 205, Fed. Cas. No. 1,817, uses this language: "There is no power the exercise of which is more delicate, which requires greater caution, deliberation, and sound discretion, or more dangerous in a doubtful case, than the issuing an injunction; it is the strong arm of equity, that never ought to be extended unless to cases of great injury, where courts of law cannot afford an adequate or commensurate remedy in damages." So, also, in Thompson ex rel. Bergen v. Pater-son, 9 N. J. Eq. 624, in affirming the refusal of a temporary writ, it is said that "in the bill, answer, and affidavits, no case of threatening, irreparable mischief is made out. That is the only question he (the chancellor) had to decide upon the motion for a preliminary injunction,—in advance of the hearing of the cause, and before the case was in a situation to be decided upon the merits. Where it does not appear that irreparable mischief is liable to ensue from leaving a party to go on exercising a right he claims, the court never stops him before it has an opportunity of examining the question of right." In the same line is the declaration of the same court: "An injunction will not issue where the right of the complainant, which it is designed to protect, depends upon a disputed question of law about which there may be a doubt, which has not been settled by the . . . law of this state." Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 126.

Even where the technical right to injunctive relief is otherwise clearly established, it will be denied where the issuance of the writ may occasion inconvenience to the public and serious loss to the defendant, while the injury to the plaintiff can readily be compensated in damages. Becker v. Lebanon & M. Street R. Co. 188 Pa. 484, 41 Atl. 612; Fisk v. Hartford, 70 Conn. 720, 66 Am. St. Rep. 147, 40 Atl. 906.

We have cited but few of the many precedents upon this question, but they establish, we think, the general trend of judicial opinion, and indicate the conservative and safe rule to be observed in cases of this character. Applying that rule to the case made by the record before us, we hold that it shows no abuse of discretion by the trial court, justifying us in reversing its ruling, and requiring it to sustain the plaintiff's demand for a temporary injunction.

II. Strictly speaking, the conclusion announced in the preceding paragraph is as far as it is necessary for us to go in disposing of the plaintiff's appeal from the ruling on his motion for a temporary writ. But the manner in which the case has been presented and argued evidences a common desire of counsel on both sides that we express our views on some of the more fundamental propositions underlying the principal controversy. Within limits this may be proper and serve to keep the future course of the litigation within due bounds. These views will also have quite direct bearing upon the correctness of the position taken by the trial court in refusing the writ.

The basic contention of the plaintiff is that the sale of the business and assets of the Des Moines Life Company is, in law and equity, tantamount to a dissolution of that corporation, and that the dissolution of a corporation before the expiration of its charter period cannot be legally effected, or the business for which it was organized abandoned, except by the unanimous consent of all its stockholders. It is to be admitted that this rule, stated in a general way, has the support of numerous authorities, most of which are collected in appellant's brief. The leading and most frequently cited decision to this effect is Abbot v. American Hard Rubber Co. 33 Barb. 578. It is perhaps open to fair doubt whether the question was necessarily involved in that case, but it has undoubtedly been treated as an authority, and not infrequently followed. See Forrester v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. 21 Mont. 544, 55 Pac. 229, 353; People v. Ballard, 134 N. Y. 269, 17 L.R.A. 737, 32 N. E. 54; 4 Thomp. Corp. 2d ed. § 4489, and cases there cited.

But the doctrine has by no means the unanimous support of the precedents, and it has frequently been held that its strict enforcement would neutralize the efficiency of that other and necessary rule to which every stockholder impliedly agrees in becoming a member of a corporation, that the management and control of the corporate business and interest shall be vested in the majority. See Treadwell v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 7 Gray, 393, 66 Am. Dec. 490; Bowditch v. Jackson Co. 76 N. H. 357, 82 Atl. 1014, Ann. Cas. 1913 A, 366; Lauman v. Lebanon Valley R. Co. 30 Pa. 42, 72 Am. Dec. 685; Ritchie v. Vermillion Min. Co. 1 Ont. L. Rep. 654; Arents v. Blackwell's Durham Tobacco Co. (C. C.) 101 Fed. 338; Maben v. Gulf Coal & Coke Co. 173 Ala. 259, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 396, 55 So. 607.

The rule of the Abbot Case has been mentioned arguendo by this court as affording a general standard by which corporate powers are restricted. Traer v. Lucas Prospecting Co. 124 Iowa, 112, 99 N. W. 290. But while frequently called upon to hold invalid the sale of all the property of a corporation, we have never applied or enforced the rule relied upon by the appellant. Looking to our decisions having any legitimate bearing upon the issues now presented, we find fairly sustained the proposition that, when the majority of the stockholders of a business corporation, acting without fraud and upon reasonable grounds, conclude that the exigencies of the business in which it is engaged and the best interests of all concerned therein require a sale of the property and a liquidation of the corporate affairs, equity will not interfere to prevent the consummation of such transaction at the suit of one or more minority stockholders, especially where it appears that the protesting members are not likely to suffer any injury for which there is no other adequate remedy. For example, while stating the general rule of the Abbot Case, it has been held that when insolvent or in a failing condition the corporation may sell all its property without the unanimous consent of its stockholders. Traer v. Lucas Prospecting Co. supra.

Where a minority stockholder was given no notice of a meeting at which a sale of the corporate assets was authorized (it being known to the majority that he was opposed to the transaction), the sale was held to be valid; it appearing that the financial condition of the corporation made it advisable, and no fraud being disclosed. Sawyer v. Dubuque Printing Co. 77 Iowa, 242, 42 N. W. 300.

The same question arose in Price v. Holcomb, 89 Iowa, 135, 56 N. W. 410, and it was there said: "It is unquestionably true that a private corporation holds its property as a trust fund for the stockholders. . . . act together; they are in a sense the corporation, and must act with due regard to the right of the minority. If the majority decide arbitrarily, and without just cause, to sell the property of the corporation to the prejudice of the minority, and thereby compel the winding up of the business, . . . it is a fraud upon the minority, and courts of equity will interfere. If, however, just cause exists for selling the property, as when the corporation is insolvent and the sale is necessary to pay debts, or where . . . the business is a failure . . . and the best interests of all require it, the majority have clearly power to order the sale, and in such case their acts are not ultra vires."

While the cases here cited present instances of sales made under conditions of financial embarrassment, it is nowhere held that insolvency and financial stress afford the only occasion for the exercise of such power. Indeed the rule as stated in Price v. Holcomb, supra, fairly implies that such power may be exercised where any "just cause" exists therefor. In Platner v. Kirby, 138 Iowa, 265, 115 N. W. 1034, this court appears to have interpreted the effect of its former holdings in harmony with that view, saying that "in this state we have recognized the right of the majority to determine whether the corporation shall be continued or shall be wound up." This position finds support in precedents from other states already cited.

Speaking of the stockholders of a business corporation, Judge Bigelow of the Massachusetts court has said: "By accepting a charter they do not undertake to carry on the business for which they are incorporated indefinitely, and without any regard to the condition of their corporate property. Public policy does not require them to go on at a loss. On the contrary it would seem very clearly for the public welfare, as well as for the interest of the stockholders, that they should cease to transact business as soon as, in the exercise of a sound judgment, it is found that it cannot be prudently continued. If this be not so, we do not see that any limit could be put to the business of a trading corporation, short of the entire loss or destruction of the corporate property. The stockholders could be compelled to carry it on until it came to actual insolvency. Such a doctrine is without any support in reason or authority." In that case the corporation was not insolvent, but the conditions were such that means to go forward properly with the business were not available. Of the power of the majority under these circumstances the court further says: "We entertain no doubt of the right of a corporation, established solely for trading and manufacturing purposes, by a vote of the majority of their stockholders, to wind up their affairs and close their business, if in the exercise of a sound discretion they deem it expedient so to do. At common law the right of corporations, acting by a majority of their stockholders, to sell their property is absolute, and is not limited as to objects, circumstances, or quantity."

The same line of reasoning is followed in the recent case of Bowditch v. Jackson Co. 76 N. H. 351, 82 Atl. 1014, Ann. Cas. 1913 A, 366. The court there says, after reference to the various statements of the rule by which a corporation under proper circumstances may sell all its property: "All these are fairly summed up in the statement that the majority may close out the affairs of the company when it can no longer make a reasonable profit. It is believed no court would now hold that the rights of the minority were more extensive than this rule implies. If the majority may sell to prevent greater losses, why may they not also sell to make greater gains? Bearing in mind that this is purely a business proposition, with no public rights or duties involved, there seems to be no substantial difference between the two cases, as a matter of principle. In each case the sale is made because it is of advantage to the stockholders. Whether the profit to be made is a reasonable one must be a relative matter." Further discussing the subject the court adds: "And the question is one of future prospects. Its decision requires the exercise of business judgment, sagacity, and power to forecast coming events. It is not an issue appropriate for trial and decision in courts, but rather one to be settled by the judgment of the men conducting the business in question. In a limited sense, the majority act as trustees for all the stockholders. When their acts are impugned by the minority, it is not the function of the court to set its judgment against theirs in settling the wisdom or policy of proposed action. By the contract of association all questions of this nature were committed to the majority for final decision (citations omitted)."

A brief reference to the text-writers upon this question may also be of interest.

Mr. Thompson, after quoting a judicial holding that a corporation must remain in business unless all stockholders consent to its being wound up, expresses his own views as follows: "But it is believed that this dictum is unsound when applied to a case where a majority of the stockholders elect to wind up the affairs of the corporation and distribute its assets, because, although the affairs of the corporation may at the particular time be prosperous, yet circumstances may exist rendering it probable that this prosperity will not continue; and whether such circumstances do exist, or are likely to supervene, is a question committed exclusively to the judgment of the majority. It is believed that no case can be found in which a court of equity has granted an injunction, at the suit of a minority stockholder against the majority, to prevent them from discontinuing the business of the corporation and winding up its affairs. The exercise of such a power would be most extraordinary. It would be tantamount to compelling the specific performance of an agreement to form and carry on a corporation extending over an indefinite period of time, and when, in the judgment of the majority, on a question of mere economy and propriety, on which their judgment ought to be conclusive, it has been found more expedient to discontinue the business." 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4443.

To the same effect it is said by Mr. Morawetz: "Ordinary trading corporations are formed solely for the pecuniary benefit of their shareholders. It is therefore no more than reasonable that the majority of an association of this description should have a discretionary power to give up the joint speculation, and wind up the company's business, whenever they deem this step to be in the interest of the whole association. The law is settled accordingly; and it may be stated as a rule that it is an implied condition in the charter of every corporation, formed solely for the pecuniary profit of its shareholders, such as an ordinary trading or manufacturing corporation, that its business may be wound up whenever the majority deem this to be expedient. Under these circumstances the majority may, without the consent of the minority, sell the whole of the company's property, close up the business, distribute the assets, and surrender the charter to the state." 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 413.

And it seems to us that when appellant concedes, as he does in argument, that the majority may sell and dispose of the corporate property and assets when the necessities of business require it, they recognize a departure from the strict rule in the Abbot Case, the effect of which goes distinctly beyond the limits which he asks 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

us to lay down for the government of the present case. We have no statute which, directly or by necessary implication, defines the line between a valid and invalid exercise of this power. If we look to the reasons which have led the court to say that a single stockholder, who has contributed perhaps a thousandth part of the capital fund, shall not be authorized to compel the owners of the other 999 shares to perpetuate the business of an insolvent corporation, they just as imperatively require that even a solvent corporation may be liquidated and closed out if those to whom the management of that business is committed foresee, or honestly believe they foresee, threatened perils which sound business wisdom warns them to avoid by disposing of the corporate assets and winding up its affairs. The business man who does not consult the future, and lay out his course with reference to what he there discovers, finds himself, sooner or later, involved in financial ruin. Nor can we suppose that a corporation for pecuniary profit is looking for that kind of blind leadership. If it be wise and just to say that a corporation may dispose of its assets when overcome by disaster, it is even more wise and just to say that they may do likewise to prevent disaster and preserve a solvency the permanence of which changed conditions have rendered insecure.

The defendants herein allege that by the retirement of the persons whose skill and industry had built up the business of the Des Moines Life, and by reason of radical changes which had taken place in the field of life insurance, rendering the business more hazardous and less profitable, they were persuaded that it was for the benefit of all concerned to withdraw from the competition and take advantage of an opportunity to sell at a figure which insured to each and every stockholder the full return of his investment with large added profits. And if this be true, and the majority saw or had reason to believe that while the business had theretofore been profitable, it had reached the high tide of its prosperity, and was quite sure to enter upon an era of declining profits and decreasing assets, which might lead the corporation to the verge of insolvency, then sound business policy and the due concern for the preservation of the trust imposed upon the corporation would appear to dictate a sale and transfer of the concern while it was in the condition to command the highest possible price. To say the least, there is no rule of equity to which we have ever given our adherence which requires a court to interfere by injunction to defeat a sale so made in good faith and for an adequate consideration.

Whether these conditions did exist in this company, and whether the majority had any reason to anticipate changes rendering a sale of the assets and a winding up of the corporate affairs advisable as a sound business proposition, we do not now stop to inquire. The defendants assert that such conditions did exist, and that the sale was made in good faith toward all stockholders. The plaintiff denies the plea thus made, and charges that the majority action was tainted with bad faith. The truth of this issue is yet to be tried, and we ought not to express any opinion upon controverted facts.

Before leaving this branch of the case we may say that the Code of 1897 introduced a significant change in the language of the statute referring to the dissolution of corporations. In the Code of 1873, § 1066, it was provided that "no corporation can be dissolved prior to the period fixed in its articles of incorporation, except by unanimous consent, unless a different rule has been adopted in their articles." As re-enacted into the present Code, § 1617, the provision is that "a corporation may be dissolved prior to the period fixed in the articles of incorporation, by unanimous consent or in accordance with the provisions of its articles,"—a regulation far less sweeping in its terms than the one for which it has been substituted.

But the question presented in this appeal is not one of the limitation of the power to dissolve the corporation, but one of power to sell the assets of the corporation and wind up the business. That such sale is not necessarily equivalent to a dissolution has been determined by us. Price v. Holcomb, 89 Iowa, 123, 56 N. W. 407. As we have already noted, there is no statute denying such power of sale. There is a statute permitting a life insurance company to reinsure its risks, or to consolidate with another company by observing certain conditions. Code Supp. §§ 1821, n, et seq. Among these conditions is none requiring the unanimous consent of the stockholders.

III. Concerning the alleged fraud and misrepresentation by which it is alleged that certain of the minority stockholders were induced to part with their holdings at $200 per share, it is possible that upon that final hearing such acts, if proved, may tend to establish a general scheme to defraud, in which the sale of the assets of the company played a part, but, so far as is developed by the pleadings, it is not clear what relevancy such matter has to the plaintiff's claim in this proceeding. None of the persons so parting with their stock are in court demanding redress, nor does the plaintiff appear to be authorized to represent them. So far as the record discloses, they are satisfied with the consideration paid them, and do not care to risk its loss or diminution by litigation. Neither plaintiff nor Holtz were so misled; they refused the offer, and have suffered no loss or damage because of that fraud. They constitute a class by themselves, and the claim of plaintiff to represent others "similarly situated" with himself would seem to affect the rights of no other stockholder, except perhaps those which may be asserted by Holtz.

IV. Of the claim that, Johnson being the holder of a majority of the stock of the National Life, and having made more or less complete arrangements for the purchase of the Rawson stock in the Des Moines Life, he stood in such a relation of trust to both companies that a sale negotiated by him of the assets of one to the other is per se, or at least presumably, fraudulent, it is sufficient to say (without going into an examination at this time of the argument and authorities presented in support of the point thus made) that, as at present advised, we think the fact that the control of both companies was actually or potentially in the hands of Johnson would not make the transaction per se fraudulent or void. If the fact be established, it is of course a material circumstance, and the court will scrutinize a deal so accomplished with care; and, if fraud in fact be found, will take proper steps to protect the interests of those injuriously affected thereby.

V. Believing that the ruling of the trial court may be sustained upon other and perhaps more vital principles, we have not entered upon any consideration of the question of plaintiff's laches, which that court deemed sufficient ground for denying a preliminary injunction. That view is, however, not without merit. While there was probably no such laches as leaves the plaintiff remediless, if he has been wronged as he alleges, yet he is not in a position to justly complain if it be said to him that he has waited so long the court will not listen with favor to his demand for the extraordinary aid of a temporary injunction. It is clear from his own showing that he knew a sale of the assets was in contemplation of those having a controlling interest; and, while he was living at a distance, and did not attend the meeting, he was promptly notified of its action, and of the contract which had been made,—a contract which called for immediate delivery of the company's property and assets,—yet he waited three months till, as it is alleged, the terms of the agreement had been substantially complied with and carried out, and then asked to have the writ issue. Even if otherwise the court should have granted the writ, we think it was not reversible error to deny it under these circumstances.

Other matters argued by counsel it is not necessary to discuss at this preliminary stage of the case, and we shall pass them without further mention.

For the reasons stated, the ruling of the trial court denying plaintiff's prayer for a preliminary injunction is affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

BROOKS HARDWARE COMPANY

v.

J. B. GREER et al.

(— Me. —, 87 Atl. 889.)

Garnishment — soldier's home — jurisdiction.

A soldiers' home established on land,

Note. — Liability of Soldiers' Home to process of garnishment in state courts.

A search has failed to show the existence of any decision as to the liability of a Soldiers Home to garnishment or trustee process issuing out of a state court, other than Foley v. Shriver, 81 Va. 568, referred to in BROOKS HARDWARE CO. v. GREER. In that case it was held that a Soldiers' Home, a corporation created by Congress, and supported by appropriations made by Congress, and in the occupation of land purchased by the United States government with the consent of the state legislature, which ceded to the United States such jurisdiction as is within the contemplation of the 17th clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Federal Constitution, providing that Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings, the state reserving such right to serve process, etc., as might be consistent with the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress over the ceded territory, was a nonresident of the state, and so not within the jurisdiction of the court. It was said: "In this case, the state legislature having given the required consent, and the United States having purchased the land in question, the United States have acquired, under the Federal Constitution, exclusive jurisdiction over the ceded lands, and they are no longer a part of the state of Virginia, and are not subject to the jurisdiction of the state courts. Persons residing there are not citizens of Virginia; the property situated there is not subject to the control or disposal of any state court, and the circuit court of Elizabeth City county is without jurisdiction within the said territory. The reservation in the act of cession of concurrent jurisdiction with the United States over the same 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

jurisdiction over which is ceded to the Federal government, is not subject to garnishment in a state court for a debt due a citizen of the state, under a statute permitting all corporations having a place of business or doing business within the state to be summoned as trustee.

(May 3, 1911.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Kennebec County, exempting the trustee in a proceeding to reach a balance due under a contract for a drainage improvement for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in satisfaction of a debt due to plaintiff by the contractor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williamson & Burleigh, for plaintiff:

The National Home for Disabled Volun-

piece or parcel of land, so that the courts, magistrates, and officers of the state may take such cognizance, execute such process, and discharge such other legal functions within the same as may not be incompatible with the consent hereby given, is subject to the provisions of the 1st article and 8th section of the Federal Constitution,—that is, as may not be incompatible with the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and which may operate to authorize the service by the officers of the state of the civil and criminal process of the state courts, with reference to acts done within the acknowledged territory of the state outside of the ceded lands." The decision was also put on the further ground that the officers of the Soldiers' Home were disbursing officers of the United States government, and the money in their hands as such, appropriated by act of Congress for public uses, was the money of the United States until applied to the designated ends, and could not be reached by garnishee process.

It may be of interest to note in this connection that it has been held that a state lunatic hospital (Dewey v. Garvey, 130 Mass. 86) and a state asylum for the deaf and dumb (O'Neill v. Sewell, 85 Ga. 481, 11 S. E. 831), under the control and government of the state, are not liable to the process of garnishment in suits against persons to whom they are indebted.

As to whether one stationed on a military reservation within a state is a nonresident for purposes of attachment, see Bank of Phoebe v. Byrum, 110 Va. 708, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 436, 135 Am. St. Rep. 953, 67 S. E. 349.

As to whether a court of the county in which land is located which has been ceded to the Federal government for a Soldiers' Home has jurisdiction over the estate of an inmate dying in the home, see Divine v. Unaka Nat. Bank, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 586, and note.

King, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit, on an account annexed, brought in the supreme judicial court for Kennebec county, Maine, in which the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is summoned as trustee. The principal defendant was defaulted. It was admitted that the alleged trustee had entered into a written contract with the principal defendant for the complete construction of the improvements of the sewage and drainage system of the Eastern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, located at Chelsea, in said county of Kennebec, and the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show a balance due the principal defendant in the hands of the treasurer of the Home at the time of the service of the writ upon the alleged trustee. The case was heard by the presiding justice upon the preliminary question whether the National Home could be legally charged as trustee in this action, and the justice ruled that it could not be so charged, because it was a disbursing agent of the United States government. The case is before this court on plaintiff's exceptions to that ruling.

The question thus presented leads at once to an inquiry as to the creation and constitution of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and its character and functions. It was established under the provisions of an act of Congress, approved March 21, 1866, and now embodied in U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4825 et seq. p. 3337. Section 4825 is as follows:

"The President, Secretary of War, Chief Justice, and such other persons as have been or from time to time may be associated with them shall constitute a board of managers of an establishment for the care and relief of the disabled volunteers of the United States Army, to be known by the name and style of 'The National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers,' and have perpetual succession, with powers to take, hold, and convey real and personal property, establish a common seal, and to sue and be sued in courts of law and equity; and to make by-laws, rules, and regulations, not inconsistent with law, for carrying on the business and government of the home, and to affix penalties thereto."

In the other sections of the act, and in the subsequent statutory amendments and additions, it is provided, in substance, and so far as seems material here, that nine managers of the Home (the number was subsequently increased) shall be elected from time to time, as vacancies occur, by joint resolution of Congress; that the managers shall have authority to select sites for branch Homes, and have the necessary buildings erected; that the general treasurer shall give bond to the United States "faithfully to account for all public moneys and property which he may receive," and the treasurer of the branch Homes shall give bond to the general treasurer; that no money shall be appropriated or drawn for the support and maintenance of said Home, "except by direct and specific annual appropriations by law." In the original act it was provided that the managers should make an annual report of the condition of the Home to Congress on the first Monday of every January, and that they should audit the accounts of the treasurer; but later provisions in this respect, and as to the limit and regulation of expenditures, were more exacting and explicit, and are important as showing the relation of the "establishment" so created by Congress to the general government.

By the act of March 3, 1887, chap. 362, 24 Stat. at L. 539, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3348, it was required that "all of the expenditures of the said home, including the expenses of the board of managers, shall be made subject to the general laws governing the disbursements of public moneys, so far as the same can be made applicable thereto, and shall be audited by the proper accounting officers of the treasury, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

By the act of March 3, 1891, chap. 542, 26 Stat. at L. 984, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3348, it was provided: "That the accounts relating to the expenditure of said sums, as also all receipts by said Home from whatever source, shall, in addition to the supervision now provided for, be reported to and supervised by the Secretary of War."

By the act of March 3, 1893, chap. 210, 27 Stat. at L. 653, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3349, it was provided that "the Secretary of War shall hereafter exercise the same supervision over all receipts and disbursements on account of the Volunteer Soldiers' Homes as he is required by law to apply to the accounts of disbursing officers of the Army."

And by the act of March 3, 1901, chap. 853, 31 Stat. at L. 1178, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3350, it was provided: "That the accounts relating to the expenditures of all public moneys appropriated for the support and maintenance of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall be audited by the board of managers of said Home in the same manner as is provided for the accounts of the various departments of the United States government, and thereupon immediately transmitted directly to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department for final audit and settlement."

The Home can make no contract not authorized by Congress, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfilment. Expenditures must be applied solely to the objects for which they are appropriated, and are not to exceed such appropriations. With some small exceptions, all the means for the establishment and support of the Home are provided by Congress.

A consideration of the provisions of the act of Congress of March 21, 1866, which created and provided for the perpetual maintenance of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, as a great national charity, to be supported by appropriations from the national Treasury, together with an examination of the many subsequent acts of Congress which have explicitly defined the purposes, limited the powers, regulated the management, and controlled the expenditures of the Home, leads us to the conclusion that the essential character and functions of this "establishment" are those of an agency,—an instrumentality of the United States government.

It was the United States that had the purpose to establish this great public charity, and that was to provide the means for its perpetual maintenance from its treasury. To effectuate that purpose, it created this "establishment" as its agency to execute its will. The money appropriated by Congress from the national treasury for the support of this charity is the money of the United States, and not the money of the Home, and it so remains until expended for the purposes intended. This is clearly apparent from the explicit congressional provisions and requirements as to its expenditures, and especially that requiring the treasurer of the Home to give bond to the United States "faithfully to account for all public moneys and property which he may receive."

But the plaintiff contends that, if the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is to be regarded as an agency or instrumentality of the United States, it is, nevertheless, subject to this trustee process, which is in effect a suit against it, because the act which created and established the Home expressly provided that it could "sue and be sued in courts of law and equity." The application of the well-settled principle that the sovereign cannot be sued is, of course, necessarily predicated upon the condition that the sovereign has not consented to be sued, which it may do.

It has been held that this power conferred upon the Home, to sue and be sued, is not to be construed as a consent that it may be sued in tort. Overholser v. National Home, 68 Ohio St. 236, 62 L.R.A. 936, 96 Am. St. Rep. 658, 67 N. E. 487. But no case has been called to our attention (except, perhaps, Foley v. Shriver, 81 Va. 568), and we have found none, in which the question has been considered whether the Home can be sued in the state courts in actions ex contractu. Foley v. Shriver, supra, was an action in the state court in which it was sought to charge the Home as trustee,—precisely the same question as here presented,—and the court there held (1) that the Federal government had exclusive jurisdiction of the territory of the Home under the ceding act of the state of Virginia, excepting only that civil and criminal processes of the state courts could be served there, and (2) that the officers of the Home were disbursing officers of the United States government, and that the funds in their hands as such cannot be attached under trustee process. The court did not consider, or at least comment, as to the effect to be given to the provision that the Home could "sue and be sued."

Whether this provision of the act imposing upon the Home the liability to be sued must be construed as a consent by Congress that this governmental agency may be sued in the state courts, and if so, upon what causes of action, is an inquiry not necessary to be decided, we think, in the determination of the question now before us, for in this case the plaintiff regards the alleged trustee as an independent corporation, and as such seeks to charge it as a trustee of the principal defendant. And assuming, but not admitting, that it is such an independent corporation, the question presented is whether it is within the provisions of the statute of this state authorizing corporations to be summoned as trustees; that statute provides that "all domestic corporations, and all foreign or alien companies or corporations established by the laws of any other state or country, and having a place of business, or doing business, within this state, may be summoned as trustee." Rev. Stat. chap. 88, § 8. Our court, then, did not have jurisdiction to summon this National Home as trustee, unless the Home, which is not a domestic corporation, had a place of business, or was doing business, within this state. It is not contended that the Home as a corporation had any place of business, or was doing business at any place, in this state, other than upon the territory of the Eastern Branch of the Home in Kennebec county. The question, then, is whether this "establishment," irrespective of whether it is an independent corporation or not, had a place of business "within this state."

The title to the land comprising the Home is not in the United States, but in the "establishment," as it is called in the act of Congress, which was empowered to take and hold title to real estate. That title was acquired by the consent of Maine, expressed in chapter 66 of the Public Laws of 1867. In that act it was provided: "And jurisdiction over said lands is hereby granted and ceded to the United States; provided that this state shall retain a concurrent jurisdiction with the United States in and over said lands: so far that all civil processes, and such criminal processes as may issue under the authority of this state, against any person or persons charged with crimes or offenses committed outside of said lands, may be executed thereon, in the same manner as though this cession and consent had not been granted; and provided further, that no change shall be made in the location of highways over said premises without the consent of the county commissioners of Kennebec county." If by this act of cession the territory ceded ceased to be territory over which the state of Maine has jurisdiction, and became territory over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction and supremacy, then it follows that the Home has no place of business, and is not doing business, "within this state," for the import of those words as used is "within the jurisdiction of this state." The language used in this ceding act is practically identical with that used in the ceding acts passed by other states, where land has been purchased by the United States for public purposes, from which fact it is reasonable to infer that the use of such uniform language of cession was at the instance of the United States; and an examination of the cases in which this language has been construed discloses the reason for its use to be in the fact that its construction, by both Federal and state courts, has been definite and consistent from an early date.

It is provided in article 1, § 8, of the United States Constitution that "the Congress shall have power . . . to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may by cession of particular states, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings." In the decisions construing ceding acts, where land has been purchased by the United States with the consent of the state, and determining the extent of the jurisdiction of the United States over such ceded territory, regard has been had to this constitutional provision.

In Com. v. Clary, 8 Mass. 72, involving the question of jurisdiction over lands at Springfield, purchased by the United States, with the consent of the state, for erecting thereon arsenals, etc., the court, by the chief justice, said: "On the facts argued in this case we are of opinion that the territory on which the offense charged is agreed to have been committed is the territory of the United States, over which the Congress have the exclusive power of legislation. The assent of the commonwealth to the purchase of this territory by the United States had this condition annexed to it, that civil and criminal process might be served therein by the officers of the commonwealth. This condition was made with a view to prevent the territory from becoming a sanctuary for debtors and criminals."

In Mitchell v. Tibbetts, 17 Pick. 298, the same construction was put upon the same language in the ceding act of the territory for the Charlestown Navy Yard.

In 1841 the house of representatives of Massachusetts requested the opinion of the justices of the supreme court of that state whether persons residing on lands in that state, purchased by or ceded to the United States for navy yards, arsenals, dockyards, forts, etc., were entitled to the benefits of the state common schools for their children in the towns where such lands were located, and the justices answered in the negative, saying: "Where the general consent of the commonwealth is given to the purchase of territory by the United States for forts and dockyards, and when there is no other condition or reservation in the act granting such consent but that of a concurrent jurisdiction of the state for the service of civil process and criminal process against persons charged with crimes committed out of such territory,—the government of the United States has sole and exclusive jurisdiction over such territory for all purposes of legislation and jurisprudence, with the single exception expressed." Accordingly it was there held that the persons residing on such territory were not entitled to the benefits of the common schools for their children in the towns in which such lands are situated; that they are not subject to taxation by said towns; that residence upon such territory for any length of time will not give such person a "legal inhabitancy" of such towns; and that such persons were not entitled to any elective franchise in such towns. Opinion of Justices, 1 Met. 580.

In Ft. Leavenworth R. Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S. 525, 29 L. ed. 264, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 995, the question of the jurisdiction over lands within a state, acquired by the United States with the consent of the state, is exhaustively considered, and the authorities as to the construction of the uniform language of the ceding acts are collated, showing "the consistency with each other of the decisions on the subject by Federal and state tribunals, and of opinions of the Attorneys General." It is there said: "When the title is acquired by purchase by consent of the legislatures of the state, the Federal jurisdiction is exclusive of all state authority. . . . The reservation which has usually accompanied the consent of the states that civil and criminal process of the state courts may be served in the places purchased is not considered as interfering in any respect with the supremacy of the United States over them; but is admitted to prevent them from becoming an asylum for fugitives from justice."

The Ft. Leavenworth Case was an action to recover back the amount of a tax paid, which the state of Kansas had assessed against the plaintiff upon its railroad property upon the military reservation. The 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

land constituting the reservation was part of the territory acquired in 1803 by cession from France, and for many years prior to the admission of Kansas as a state the territory of the reservation had been reserved from sale. After the admission of Kansas, the legislature of the state passed an act ceding to the United States jurisdiction of the land of the reservation, containing substantially the same language as in other ceding acts, providing for the right to serve civil and criminal processes in the territory, and also "saving further to said state the right to tax railroad, bridge, and other corporations, their franchises and property on said reservation." The court held that this reservation was valid, and that the tax could not be recovered back. As we understand the opinion, it states the reason for the decision of the court, on the precise question involved, to be that the land of the reservation was not purchased by the United States with the consent of Kansas, and that the subsequent cession of jurisdiction to the United States was not exclusive, containing a saving clause of the right to tax the railroad, and that the exercise of the right under that saving clause did not interfere with the use of the reservation by the United States; and hence the right to tax the railroad existed in the state the same as before the cession. But the paramount idea of the opinion, as the conclusion of the court, after a review of the authorities, manifestly is that the effect of a cession of jurisdiction over certain territory within a state to the United States, by consent of the state, reserving to the state only concurrent jurisdiction to serve civil and criminal processes therein, is to put that territory under the exclusive jurisdiction and dominion of the United States, with the single exception expressed, at least when the property is purchased for the constitutionally specified purposes.

The following cases involved the question as to the jurisdiction over lands purchased, with the consent of the states, for sites for branches of this National Home. Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 306, 2 Am. Rep. 397; Re O'Connor, 37 Wis. 379, 19 Am. Rep. 765; Foley v. Shriver, 81 Va. 568; Re Kelly (C. C.) 71 Fed. 545. It will be seen that these cases are to some extent conflicting.

In Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 306, 2 Am. Rep. 397, the supreme court of Ohio had before it the question of the legality of votes cast at an election of a county officer by inmates of the branch of the National Home located in that state, and the conclusion there reached is that the legislative cession of jurisdiction to the United States operated to fix "the exclusive jurisdiction of the general government over this institution, its lands, and its inmates, 'in all cases whatsoever,' except as to the execution of process issuing under state authority." Speaking of a person who becomes an inmate of the Home, the court said: "He becomes subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of another power, as foreign to Ohio as is the state of Indiana or Kentucky, or the District of Columbia."

The court holds that "asylums for the disabled soldier in no substantial sense differ from hospitals in a fortress or in the field. All are alike necessary, and the power to erect and maintain them is incidental to the war power of the government;" and hence, that the land was acquired for a purpose reasonably within the constitutional purposes.

In Foley v. Shriver, 81 Va. 568, an action of foreign attachment against the Home, hereinabove referred to to some extent, the court of Virginia seems to regard the constitutional provision giving to the United States power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over lands within a state, purchased by the United States with the consent of the state, as applicable to the question before it.

The court said: "In this case the state legislature, having given the required consent, and the United States having purchased the land in question, the United States have acquired, under the Federal Constitution, exclusive jurisdiction over the ceded lands, and they are no longer a part of the state of Virginia, and are not subject to the jurisdiction of the state courts." It was also held, as hereinbefore stated, that the officers of the Home were disbursing officers of the United States government, and for that reason not subject to trustee process. It is thus seen that in the Ohio and Virginia cases it is held that the lands acquired for the branch Homes, under the ceding acts of the respective states, are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

In the two Wisconsin cases, however, the conclusion was reached that the state courts has at least jurisdiction over criminal offenses committed on the land on which the branch Home in that state was located.

In Re O'Connor the question was whether the state court had jurisdiction to try an inmate of the Home for an alleged assault and battery committed upon another inmate upon the grounds of the Home. The court held in favor of such jurisdiction, treating the ceding act of the state as void, because the land was not purchased directly by the United States,—a feature of the decision commented upon somewhat adversely in the later case of Re Kelly, which arose in the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

United States circuit court of the same state.

In Re Kelly (C. C.) 71 Fed. 545, the question was reversed from that in the O'Connor Case, and was whether the circuit court had jurisdiction to try and punish the petitioner charged with the commission of a crime upon the grounds of the Home, and the court held that it did not have such jurisdiction. In the opinion the learned district judge reasons and holds that the constitutional provision giving the Congress power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over lands purchased with the consent of the state in which the same is situated is only applicable to cases where there is an actual purchase, with the consent of the state, for the constitutional purposes; and when that is the fact all jurisdiction passes to the United States by virtue of the constitutional provision, and irrespective of any express cession of jurisdiction, other than an unqualified consent by the state that the purchase be made. He seems to regard the purposes of the establishment and maintenance of the National Home as not within the letter of the constitutional purposes, but he says: "But, whatever may be the rule pronounced when that question arises, it appears indisputable that all state jurisdiction is not excluded from every parcel of land purchased by the general government in a state with legislative consent, irrespective of its use; and therefore that, if the purpose is not one of those distinctly named in this clause of the Constitution, the act of Congress which provides for the purchase and requires the legislative consent must, in some unequivocal terms, declare that exclusive jurisdiction is intended and necessary for the proposed use, or at least the purpose stated must be one of which it is manifest that any exercise of co-ordinate or other jurisdiction would be incompatible therewith." And he further says: "I am therefore of opinion that this clause of the Constitution, upon which the Ohio and Virginia decisions mainly rest their view of the state enactments, respectively, is not applicable to this Wisconsin case, and cannot be invoked to exclude the exercise of state jurisdiction over the crime charged against the petitioner."

Passing to the consideration of the effect of the ceding act, he says: That "has impressed me as presenting the greatest difficulty;" but the conclusion is reached "that the purpose was not one for which exclusive legislation was prescribed, either by the Constitution or by congressional enactments; the omission of the word 'exclusive,' or some equivalent term, is material, and in my opinion the act must be interpreted as ceding—that is, yielding or surrendering—to the United States such jurisdiction as Congress may find necessary for the objects of the cession, and for the exercise of which there must be clear enactments to that end within its powers."

This decision in Re Kelly is the only expression of the Federal courts, so far as we are advised, touching the question of jurisdiction over the sites of the branch Homes, and for that reason we have referred to it at some length. It seems very clear to us that the question involved in that case, whether the United States had such exclusive jurisdiction over the territory owned by the Home as would take from the state jurisdiction over crimes committed thereon, is entirely different from that involved in the Virginia case, and in the case now before us. In the Wisconsin cases the question of jurisdiction was respecting only a person on the territory of the Home, and his acts committed there, but forming no part in the execution of the functions of the Home. But the question here presented is whether the United States has the exclusive jurisdiction over the Home itself,—the "establishment" created by Congress for the sole purpose of maintaining and carrying on, under explicit congressional regulations, a great national charity supported by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States. We do not understand the Federal decision to hold, even by implication, that the United States does not have such exclusive jurisdiction. Such jurisdiction over the Home itself, over the impersonal entity, created by the general government to execute its purposes as expressed in the congressional enactments establishing the Home, and providing for its perpetuation and maintenance, must have been intended, for, in the language of the Kelly Case, "it is manifest that any exercise of co-ordinate or other jurisdiction [over the Home itself] would be incompatible therewith." Such exclusive jurisdiction is obviously necessary for the proper execution of the functions of the Home. And we are of opinion that, under the purchase of this territory in Maine, on which the Eastern Branch of the Home is located, the title to which was taken in the name of the Home, but which was paid for from the national Treasury and under the ceding act passed by the legislature of Maine, expressly consenting to purchase, "for the purpose of locating, erecting, and maintaining thereon an asylum for disabled volunteer soldiers," and ceding to the United States "jurisdiction over said lands," excepting only that civil and criminal processes issued from the state courts might be served thereon, the United States has the exclusive jurisdiction over the Home itself as the "establishment" which Congress created, and that the "establishment," though regarded as a corporate existence, and having the right to sue and be sued, does not have its place of business "within this state," and is not subject to trustee process issued from the courts of this state.

We do not here undertake to decide the question as to what jurisdiction the state courts may have over crimes committed on the territory of the Home, or over rights arising between individuals residing on the territory, or between them and persons residing elsewhere in the state, or any of the many other questions that might arise involving jurisdiction over the territory. Those questions are not now presented.

ANNIE REHAN.

(119 Md. 92, 85 Atl. 1035.)

Insurance — benefit society — reduction of benefit — suicide.

1. Agreement of a member of a mutual benefit society to be bound by subsequently enacted rules and regulations authorizes the society to reduce the benefit in case of suicide, while sane, but not while insane.

Pleading — benefit certificate — defense — suicide.

2. The defense of suicide, contrary to a by-law enacted after the issuance of a mutual benefit certificate which bound the member to comply with subsequently enacted rules and regulations, is not sufficient, but intentional suicide while sane should be alleged.

Subsequently enacted by-laws of fraternal depends upon, the stipulations of the contract at the time it was made. The stipulations are expressed in varying terms, and several of them import no more than would be implied,—the observance by the assured of the requirements of the association, such requirements as were reasonable and intended to promote the harmony of the association, and the purposes and objects for which it was formed. They import also obedience to the by-laws, so far as reasonable, consistent with the charter and law of the land. We do not construe them as reserving, or as intended to reserve, to the association the power to change or avoid its contracts, to lessen its responsibilities, or to deplete its members of rights. This is not the proper office of a by-law; and from the general expressions to which we are referring, it cannot be fairly presumed or intended that it was contemplated to affect the members by other than such by-laws as it was within the competency of the association to enact. But in addition to these, the averment of the plea is that the certificate was accepted by the assured, 'subject to the laws of the order now in force or which may be hereafter enacted by the supreme commandery.' These are words of large signification, and clearly express that the assured consented that the contract should be subject to future, as well as to existing, by-laws. Parties may contract in reference to laws of future enactment, may agree to be bound and affected by them, as they would be bound and affected if such laws were existing. They may consent that such laws may enter into and form parts of their contracts, modifying or varying them. It is their voluntary agreement which relieves the application of such laws to their contracts and transactions from all imputation of injustice.

. . . The fundamental principle of such organizations is the mutuality of duty and equality of rights of the membership, without regard to time of admission. This cannot well be preserved, if the members stipulating for benefits were not required to consent that they would be subject to future as well as existing by-laws. Time benefit associations, relating to suicide, are valid and binding.

Messrs. John H. Richardson and George Washington Williams, for appellee:

A clause in a certificate of insurance issued by a fraternal benefit association, and experience will develop a necessity for changes in the laws, and if the consent was not required, there would be a class of members bound by the changed laws, and a class exempt from their operation. The case before us is an illustration. Of the legality and propriety of the provision relieving the association from liability if a member while insane deprived himself of life, there is no good reason to question. If no other reason could be given, that it relieves the association from litigating with the representatives of a deceased member the distressing question of his sanity would be sufficient. If the law was applied only to certificates issued subsequent to its enactment, there would be a class of members having certificates of greater value than the certificates held by another class: yet each class would be subject to the same assessments and the same duties. There is but little room, if any, for the apprehension that advantage will be taken by the governing body of the assent of the member to be bound and affected by subsequent laws, to impose upon him unjust burdens, or to vary the contract, save so far as an alteration or modification of it may be promotive of the general good. Subsequent or existing by-laws are valid only when consistent with the charter, and confined to the nature and objects of the association."

And in Clement v. Clement, 113 Tenn. 40, 81 S. W. 1249, where the insured undertook to be bound by the laws and rules in force, and that might thereafter be enacted, it was held that a by-law passed subsequently to the issuance of the original certificate providing that only a proportional part of the fund named in the certificate should be recovered in case the insured should commit suicide sane or insane, was binding, especially as it was in force at the time a new certificate was substituted for the old one at the request of the insured, in order to effect a change of beneficiary. The insured in this case apparently committed suicide while insane, but no point appears to have been made of this fact.

The following decisions, in which the insured was sane when he committed suicide, expressly limit the validity of subsequently enacted by-laws reducing or excluding liability in case of suicide to cases where the insured was sane when he took his life. Mitterwallner v. Supreme Lodge, K. & L. G. S. 86 N. Y. Supp. 786 (reducing benefit); Shipman v. Protected Home Circle, 174 N. Y. 398, 63 L.R.A. 347, 67 N. E. 83 (excluding benefit).

And see Olson v. Court of Honor set out by the court in SUPREME CONCLAVE, 1. O. H. v. REHAN, and cases infra, passing upon the validity of attempted changes of the incontestable periods provided for by the original contract.

And the court in Plunkett v. Supreme Conclave, 1. O. H. 105 Va. 643, 55 S. E. 9, upheld a subsequent by-law providing for a forfeiture in case the insured committed suicide, while sane or insane, in so far as it applied to a case where the insured, who had agreed to be bound by subsequent by-laws, committed suicide while sane, but reserved its decision as applied to a case where he was insane at the time he took his

And in Reynolds v. Supreme Conclave, 1. O. H. 24 Pa. Co. Ct. 638, where a contract of benefit insurance contained no provision making the insurer liable in case the insured committed suicide while sane, it was held that a subsequent by-law providing that in case a member committed suicide within three years after admission to the order, no benefits should be paid except where he was judicially declared insane, or the act was done in delirium, or in a case where the medical director had a reasonable doubt as to the mental responsibility of the insured, and also providing that when a membership of three years had been completed, a certain proportion of the total benefit should be paid,—was held valid and binding, the court saying that suicide by the insured while sane is a full defense to an action on a benefit certificate which contains no provision applicable to the situation, and that the section in question was in mitigation of the rigors of the law, and providing that the member insured shall abide by all by-laws subsequently enacted, does not give the association an unlimited right to make by-laws, which will be binding upon said members. Only reasonable ones may be enacted by the authority of such provision.

an extension of the restriction of the rights of the insured and his beneficiary.

In Missouri and New Jersey the courts have held subsequently enacted by-laws excluding or reducing the right of recovery in case the insured committed suicide, whether sane or insane, unreasonable and void, even where the insured was apparently sane when he took his life, although by his contract he had agreed to be bound by by-laws enacted after he became a member. Lewine v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. 122 Mo. App. 547, 99 S. W. 821 (reducing benefit); Sautter v. Supreme Conclave, I. O. H. 72 N. J. L. 325, 62 Atl. 529 (excluding benefit).

The court in the first case said: "It must be conceded, however, that this was a matter within the power of the parties to determine by contract, and no one would question for a moment the right of the parties when entering into the contract here involved, to have stipulated in plain and express terms to the effect that the association reserved to itself power to provide by subsequent laws a reduction of the insurance in event of suicide, and had such express stipulation been inserted in the contract at the time, it would operate to have substantially modified the contract with the express assent of the member, and would therefore stand and be enforced as a valid provision of the contract of insurance. But no such express stipulation was incorporated. The argument advanced is that, even though such was not provided in express words, the language employed on that question was of such a character as to signify that the member contracted in advance to abide by the result of such subsequent law. It is true Lewine agreed that, first, 'I will be governed,' and second, 'This contract shall be controlled, by all laws' in force or hereafter enacted. There is no doubt that a fair interpretation of this agreement reveals that it was twofold. That the agreement should be twofold is natural indeed, for the members of these societies stand in a dual relation to the society; one relation is that of a member, the same as any other member, whether insured or not, regard being had to the social features of the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) organizations; and the second is that of an insured person having a valuable contract therewith whereby an indemnity is guaranteed to his designated beneficiaries. This, then, being the situation of the parties, it is clear that the agreement, 'I will be governed,' bore reference to such laws as were then in force, or future laws as might be provided tending to regulate his conduct as a member and the internal affairs of its lodge system, all of which were essentially within the contemplation of the parties, while the second agreement, to the effect that 'this contract shall be controlled' by present and future laws, bore reference only to such present and future laws as were in aid and in furtherance of the essential elements of indemnity vouchsafed in his contract for insurance, for it is reasonable indeed that both the member and the society should contemplate and intend, when looking into the future, that the society should reserve some rights with respect to bringing about such reasonable changes in aid of the provisions of the contract as experience might dictate were necessary, and it does not seem reasonable that the agreement bore reference to such subsequent laws which, instead of aiding the beneficial purposes of the organization, would modify or entirely abrogate such purpose, by destroying the insurance for which the member had contracted and paid."

And a fortiori it is held in Missouri that subsequently enacted by-laws reducing the benefit in case the insured commits suicide are invalid where the insured takes his life when insane. Smail v. Court of Honor, 136 Mo. App. 434, 117 S. W. 116; Umbarger v. Supreme Council, R. L. — Mo. App. —, 118 S. W. 1199; Wilcox v. Court of Honor, 134 Mo. App. 547, 114 S. W. 1155; Smith v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. 83 Mo. App. 512.

In Northwestern Benev. & Mut. Aid Asso. v. Wanner, 24 Ill. App. 357, where the insured appears to have been sane when he committed suicide, the certificate contained no provision regulating the rights of the parties in case of suicide, and the insured merely agreed to comply with the constitution and by-laws, it was held that a by-law

H. v. Miles, 92 Md. 613, 84 Am. St. Rep. 528, 48 Atl. 845.

Burke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 10th day of November, 1898, the Supreme Conclave of the Improved Order of Heptasophs, a fraternal beneficiary association (a corporation duly organized and doing business in this state), issued its cer-enacted subsequently to the issuance of the certificate, exempting the insurer from liability in case of suicide, whether sane or insane, was invalid, since it affected the vital principles of the contract.

In a number of cases in which the insured was apparently sane when he took his life, where he had undertaken by his contract to be bound by by-laws enacted after the issuance of his certificate, by-laws limiting the right of recovery in case of suicide, while sane or insane, have been upheld, notwithstanding the fact that the original contract contained an incontestable clause, applicable to cases of suicide. Fraternal Union v. Zeigler, 145 Ala. 287, 39 So. 751; Scow v. Supreme Council, R. L. 223 Ill. 32, 79 N. E. 42 (by-laws enacted after incontestable period, reducing benefit in case of suicide); Supreme Tent, K. M. v. Hammers, 81 Ill. App. 560; Supreme Tent, K. M. v. Stenaland, 105 Ill. App. 267, affirmed in 206 Ill. 124, 99 Am. St. Rep. 137, 68 N. E. 1098 (subsequent by-laws extending time during which suicide should constitute defense beyond incontestable period); Knights of Maccabees v. Nelson, 77 Kan. 629, 95 Pac. 1052 (by-law enacted after incontestable period excluding benefit in case of suicide).

The court in Fraternal Union v. Zeigler, 145 Ala. 287, 39 So. 751, said: "The logical and reasonable deduction from this argument would lead to the conclusion that the insured had the right after the lapse of two years from the date of the issuance of the certificate, to elect the mode and manner of his death, and, by suicide, to terminate the life expectancy which was in the contemplation of the parties, and entered into and formed the basis of the contract of insurance. Moreover, the argument, when analyzed and carried to its legitimate conclusions, would leave no field of operation for the provision in the contract relative to the adoption by the association of subsequent rules and laws for the government of its members. It cannot be doubted that the law which was here adopted by the association, and set up by the defendant in its pleas, was not only a reasonable one, but also beneficial to all its members, including 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) the insured in this case. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the incontestable clause contained in the constitution was applicable to cases of suicide, still the provision contained in the benefit certificate in reference to the adoption of subsequent laws by the association is more specific, and, if a conflict between the two exists, the latter should prevail, and for the reason, if no better could be given, by such construction a field of operation would be given to both provisions. We are of the opinion that the adoption of the subsequent law by the defendant association did not impair the obligation of the contract as entered into by the parties at the time it was made; and, from what we have said above, our conclusion is that the court erred in overruling the defendant's demurrers to the plaintiff's replications."

And provisions of this character have been upheld in cases where the insured committed suicide while insane.

Thus, in Chambers v. Supreme Tent, K. M. 200 Pa. 244, 86 Am. St. Rep. 716, 49 Atl. 784, where a by-law provided at the time of the original contract was made, that no benefit should be paid in case the insured committed suicide, whether sane or insane, within one year, and the insured agreed that he would comply with the laws of the order then in force, or that might thereafter be adopted, it was held that a by-law adopted more than a year after he became a member, which provided that no benefit should be paid in case a member committed suicide within five years after admission, whether sane or insane, was valid and barred a recovery, although the insured was insane at the time he committed the act. The court said: "No right became vested in the plaintiff by virtue of said certificate until the death of her husband. The defendant's obligation to pay the benefit was conditioned on the member's compliance with the laws of the order then in force or that might thereafter be adopted. . . . At the time of the amendment of the by-laws in the present case, the member, George F. Chambers, was living and of sound mind. The amendment referred tificate of membership of John P. Rehan. The certificate provided for the payment from the benefit fund of the association, under certain conditions hereafter mentioned, of $1,000 to his wife, Annie Rehan, the plaintiff in this case and the appellee on this record. The certificate was issued upon the condition, among others, "that the said member complies in the future with the laws, rules and regulations now governing said conclave and fund, or that may be hereafter enacted by the supreme conclave to govern said conclave and fund."

In 1903 the association enacted the following law: "Sec. 257. No benefit shall be paid the beneficiary or beneficiaries of any member committing suicide (sane or insane): Provided, however, that where such to the personal conduct of the members. It was such in my opinion as the order had power to make under the right of amendment reserved in the certificates in question."

And Eversberg v. Supreme Tent, K. M. 33 Tex. Civ. App. 549, 77 S. W. 246, where a by-law at the time the certificate was issued provided that no benefit should be paid in case the member should commit suicide within one year after admission, whether sane or insane, and the insured contracted to be bound by laws then in force, or that might thereafter be adopted, a subsequent by-law providing that no benefit should be paid in case the insured committed suicide, whether sane or insane, at any time, and stipulating for a return of twice the amount of the assessments paid, was held valid and binding, although the insured was insane at the time he committed suicide.

Some courts, however, have refused to hold provision of this character valid where the insured committed suicide while insane.

Thus, in Weber v. Supreme Tent, K. M. 172 N. Y. 490, 92 Am. St. Rep. 753, 65 N. E. 258, where the rules of the insurer at the time the certificate was issued provided that the contract should be void if the party committed suicide within one year, whether sane or insane, a subsequent amendment of the by-laws adopted long after the named became a member, extending the time from one year to five within which self-destruction, whether the result of an intentional or unintentional act, should operate to destroy the policy, was held unreasonable and void, where the insured was irresponsible when he committed suicide.

And this case was followed in Fargo v. Supreme Tent, K. P. 96 App. Div. 491, 89 N. Y. Supp. 65, where the by-laws at the time the contract was made provided that no benefit should be paid when death was the result of suicide within one year after admission, whether the member was sane or insane, and it was held that a subsequent by-law striking out all time limit as to suicide was invalid, and did not bar a re-suicide has completed one year of membership (although the supreme conclave shall by his act be released from all claims represented by the benefit certificate), his beneficiary or beneficiaries shall, nevertheless, receive from the supreme conclave a sum of money in full discharge of all demands which he, she, or they might otherwise have upon said supreme conclave, equal to an equitable proportion of the total benefit, such equity to be determined by the number of years the suicide was a member of the order as related to his expectancy of life when admitted." In the absence of anything to the contrary appearing in the record, we will assume that the law was regularly and properly passed conformably covery where the insured committed suicide when insane.

In Court of Honor v. Hutchens, 43 Ind. App. 321, 82 N. E. 89, where the insured was apparently sane when he committed suicide, it does not appear that he agreed to be bound by subsequently enacted by-laws, and where his certificate provided that it should be incontestable after two years for any cause except fraud, it was held that a by-law enacted two years after the issuance of the policy, stipulating that in case of suicide only a part of the benefits should be payable, was invalid on the ground that it was unreasonable and impaired the obligation of the contract.

The decision in this case was followed in Court of Honor v. Rausch, — Ind. App. —, 95 N. E. 1018, where the insured was evidently sane when he committed suicide and a by-law enacted within two years after he became a member, which provided for the payment of a percentage in case of suicide, and did away with an incontestable clause making suicide unavailable as a defense after the expiration of two years, was held invalid as to the insured, who died after he had been a member about five years, although he had agreed to be governed by by-laws enacted after he became a member.

In Bottjer v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 37 Misc. 406, 75 N. Y. Supp. 805, affirmed in 78 App. Div. 546, 79 N. Y. Supp. 684, where the purposes of the order were to establish a fund for the relief of sick or distressed members, and a benefit fund for their families, a by-law enacted many years after the insured had become a member, which stipulated that only a portion of the amount named in the certificate should be paid in case a member committed suicide, sane or insane, was invalid, although the insured had agreed to be bound by by-laws thereafter adopted, and the right to alter or amend the laws covering the benefit was reserved to the insurer by its constitution, the court holding that such a by-law was in violation of the spirit and terms of the constitution and beyond the legislative power of the governing body. It does not ap-to the constitution and laws of the association.

John P. Rehan died on the 6th day of September, 1911. The benefit was not paid; and this action was brought to recover the amount named in the certificate. The case was tried in the court of common pleas, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $1,000, and from this judgment the defendant has appealed.

When this certificate was issued and accepted, there was no suicide law of the association in force. The defense relied on was that John P. Rehan committed suicide, and that the law we have transcribed governed the case, and that under that law the plaintiff was entitled to receive only the sum of $471, which amount the defendant tendered itself ready to pay. The plaintiff, however, contends that this after-enacted law is not binding upon her, and does not affect her rights under the certificate.

The precise questions presented, which were raised by demurrer to the defendant's fourth and fifth pleas and by the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's rejoinder to the replication to the third plea, are these: First. Was it within the power of the defendant, by the enactment of this law, to reduce the amount payable to her as expressed in the certificate? Secondly. If the by-law is valid and binding upon her, do the defendant's pleadings disclose a defense within its terms? This is a narrow question, and is one which has not heretofore been passed upon by this court. It is an important question both to societies of this character and to their members. The trial court sustained the demurrers, and held that the defendant's pleadings did not disclose a good defense to the suit. It, however, granted leave to the defendant to plead over within ten days. The defendant declined to plead further; and judgment was entered upon the demurrers in favor of the plaintiff.

There appears to be a general concurrence of authority in support of these two propositions: First, that a general power to amend the laws reserved either by the constitution or by-laws of a fraternal benefit society does not authorize an amendment which impairs the vested rights of the members. Secondly, that where a member of a fraternal benefit society agrees in his application for membership to be bound by the rules or laws then in force, or which might be thereafter adopted, the society, after he has become a member, may enact reasonable rules and amendments, and bind him to their observance. Brown v. Grand Fountain, U. O. T. R. 28 App. D. C. 200; State ex rel. Strang v. Camden Lodge, A. O. U. W. 73 N. J. L. 500, 64 Atl. 93; Lange v. Royal Highlands, 75 Neb. 188, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 666, 121 Am. pear in this case whether the insured was sane or insane when he committed suicide, and no point is made of this circumstance.

The mere substitution of a certificate in a benefit association for the original certificate, for the sole purpose of changing the beneficiary, has been held not to constitute such certificate a new and independent contract, and not to render by-laws passed between the date of the original certificate and that of the substituted one binding upon the insured. Briggs v. Royal Highlanders, 84 Neb. 834, 122 N. W. 69.

And it has been held that the insurer cannot invoke a subsequent by-law providing that it shall not be liable in case a member commits suicide, whether sane or insane, where it has not complied with an act stipulating that before any amendment or alteration in the constitution or by-laws of a benefit association shall take effect, a copy of the amendment or alteration duly certified must be filed with the auditor of public funds. Knights of Macabees v. Nitsch, 69 Neb. 372, 95 N. W. 626, 5 Ann. Cas. 257.

And in Hunziker v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. 117 Ky. 418, 78 S. W. 201, where the insured agreed to be controlled by the rules in force at the date the certificate was issued, and that might thereafter be enacted, it was held that the insurer could not invoke the provisions of a by-law which was adopted subsequently to the issuance of the certificate, which provided that in case of suicide, voluntary or involuntary, the amount paid should be a sum in proportion to the whole amount as the matured life expectancy might be to the entire expectancy at the date of admission, where such by-law was never attached to the member's certificate in accordance with § 679, Kentucky Statutes, requiring by-laws and rules either forming a part of the contract or having any bearing on it to be attached to the policy or certificate, and stipulating that unless so attached the by-laws and rules should not be received in evidence in an action on the policy or certificate.

J. T. W.

In Lange v. Royal Highlanders, 75 Neb. 188, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 666, 121 Am. St. Rep. 786, 106 N. W. 224, 110 N. W. 1110, the court said that a member of a fraternal benefit society, "who agrees in his application, or has the agreement incorporated in his policy or benefit certificate, that he will comply with the by-laws of the company then in force or thereafter to be adopted, is bound by subsequent by-laws the same as by those in force at the time his certificate was issued, provided that such subsequent by-laws are reasonable in their nature, and are properly adopted in conformity of the rules of the order and the statutes governing such associations."

In Ayers v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 188 N. Y. 280, 80 N. E. 1020, the court said: "An amendment of by-laws which formed part of a contract is an amendment of the contract itself; and, when such a power is reserved in general terms, the parties do not mean, as the courts hold, that the contract is subject to change in any essential particular at the election of the one in whose favor the reservation is made. It would be not reasonable, and hence not within their contemplation, at least in the absence of stipulations clearly specifying the subjects to be affected, that one party should have the right to make a radical change in the contract, or one that would reduce its pecuniary value to the other. A contract which authorizes one party to change it in any respect that he chooses would in effect be binding upon the other party only, and would leave him at the mercy of the former; and we have said that human language is not strong enough to place a person in that situation." The two cases from which we have quoted express the practically unanimous view of the courts upon the two propositions stated.

Although these general principles are well settled, there is a diversity of opinion as to what are reasonable changes or amendments. Confining our attention to the precise legal question first presented for consideration in this case, viz., the right of the defendant, by the after-enacted law transcribed, to reduce the amount payable to the beneficiary named in the certificate, the plaintiff in this case, in the event the insured committed suicide, "sane or insane," we find some conflict in the authorities.

In some jurisdictions it is held that a subsequently adopted amendment, partially or totally depriving the beneficiary of rights under the certificate in the event of suicide of the insured while sane or insane, is reasonable and valid. Other courts hold that such an amendment is wholly ineffective as to outstanding certificates issued when there was no suicide law in force, notwithstanding 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) ing the insured had agreed in the contract to be bound by after-adopted laws. In other jurisdictions it is held that such a retroactive law is valid so far as it relates to members committing suicide while sane, but is invalid so far as it attempts to affect the rights of the beneficiary where the member has taken his own life while insane. This is the position taken by the New York, Virginia, Minnesota, and some other courts, and is based upon reasons manifestly sound and just to both parties to the contract.

The crucial question in all the cases has been one of construction, the courts, however, differing upon the reasonableness vel non of the new law; and, in deciding this question, reference has always been had to the nature and purposes of the contract, read in the light of the objects of the order. These contracts, like other contracts, confer vested rights and interests upon the member; and it would be most unreasonable and unjust to hold that, under a general reserved power to amend, or upon a general stipulation of the insured that the society might amend, one party to the contract had the power to destroy the rights of the other. Such a construction would put the rights of one party to the contract wholly at the mercy of the other.

In Olson v. Court of Honor, 100 Minn. 117, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 521, 117 Am. St. Rep. 676, 110 N. W. 374, 10 Ann. Cas. 622, the insured in his application expressly agreed that he would strictly comply with the constitution, laws, and rules then in force or thereafter to be enacted or adopted. When the certificate was issued and delivered, a by-law of the association then in force provided that "this order will not pay the benefits of members who commit suicide, whether sane or insane, except it be committed in delirium resulting from illness, or while the member is under treatment for insanity, or has been judicially declared to be insane; but in all cases not within said exceptions the amount of money contributed to the benefit fund by such member shall be returned, and shall be paid to the beneficiary out of said fund in lieu of the benefit." The application for membership contained this provision: "I further understand and agree that the laws of the order now in force or hereafter enacted enter into and become a part of every contract of indemnity by and between the members of the order, and govern all rights thereunder." In the place of the original by-law, the association, after the issuance of the certificate, adopted the following: "If a benefit member commits suicide, whether sane or insane, voluntary or involuntary, there shall be payable to the beneficiaries entitled thereto five (5) per cent of the face of the certificate for each year he shall have been continuously a member of the society, and after twenty (20) years of continuous membership, the certificate shall be payable in full." The assured committed suicide, and suit was brought upon the certificate by the beneficiary. The trial court held that the by-law in force when the certificate was issued governed the case, and instructed the jury that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the full amount named in the certificate, unless the insured committed suicide; but, if she did, then the defendant was entitled to a verdict, unless the jury further found that she was at the time under treatment for insanity. In passing upon this prayer, the court said: "It is the contention of the defendant that it was by virtue of the provisions of the original contract that the society might change its by-laws, and that the members should be bound thereby. It is obvious that such a provision must receive a reasonable construction. It would be unreasonable to construe it as giving the society plenary power to change its by-laws in any manner it might elect, for, if such construction were to obtain, then the original contract would be simply one to the effect that the society would pay the beneficiary in case of the death of the member, in accordance with the terms of the contract, or in accordance with such new, other, or further contract as it might elect thereafter to make for the parties. It seems clear that when the member—that is, the insured—gives in advance his general consent to a change in the by-laws, and agrees in his certificate to abide by all the laws thereafter enacted by the society, he does not intend thereby that the society shall have the power to impair, in essential particulars, the contract for the payment of a specific sum to his beneficiary which it agrees by its certificate to pay; or, in other words, he does not consent that the society may make, without consulting him, a new contract for both parties. It has accordingly been held by this court, in accordance with the weight of judicial authority, that the general consent and agreement of a member of a mutual fraternal benefit society, in his application and certificate, to be bound by any future changes in the constitution, by-laws, and rules of the society that it may enact in the future, are subject to the implied condition that they must be reasonable. . . . The precise question in this case is whether the change in the by-laws of the society was reasonable, whereby it attempted to relieve itself from liability to pay the stipulated benefit when the death of the member resulted from suicide while under treatment for insanity, which it contracted for by its certificate and original by-laws. There are a number of cases which hold, in effect, that a mutual benefit society may legally make such a change in its by-laws, where a general power to change its by-laws has been reserved. See Supreme Commandery, K. G. R. v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 46 Am. Rep. 332; Hughes v. Wisconsin Odd Fellows' Mut. Ins. Co. 98 Wis. 292, 73 N. W. 1015; and Daughtry v. Knights of Pythias, 48 La. Ann. 1203, 55 Am. St. Rep. 310, 20 So. 712. The change, however, in the by-laws in the case at bar is quite as fundamental as the respective changes in the cases of Thibert v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. 78 Minn. 448, 47 L.R.A. 136, 79 Am. St. Rep. 412, 81 N. W. 220, and Tebo v. Supreme Council, R. A. 89 Minn. 3, 93 N. W. 513, and unless we overrule those cases, we must hold that the change in the by-law in this case was also unreasonable." This case and the case of Plunkett v. Supreme Conclave, I. O. H. 105 Va. 643, 55 S. E. 9, followed the cases of Shipman v. Protected Home Circle, 174 N. Y. 398, 63 L.R.A. 347, 67 N. E. 83, and Weber v. Supreme Tent, K. M. 172 N. Y. 490, 92 Am. St. Rep. 753, 65 N. E. 258.

In the last-cited case, one of the precise questions now under consideration was decided. Chief Justice Parker, speaking for the court, stated the question and the reasons upon which the decision of the court permitting a recovery was rested. This case was directly approved in Shipman v. Protected Home Circle, 174 N. Y. 398, 63 L.R.A. 347, 67 N. E. 83, in which the court said that the conclusion reached was not in conflict with the doctrine announced in Weber's Case, supra, "for in that case there was a finding that the deceased member took his life while insane; and, as already pointed out, that was a risk which was included in his contract, and therefore his beneficiary was entitled to claim the fund." "At the time Weber joined the order and received his policy," said Judge Parker, "the rules of the defendant and the contract of insurance provided that the contract should be void if the party committed suicide within one year, whether sane or insane. Before Weber's death, defendant undertook to amend its by-laws and rules so as to extend the time from one year to five within which self-destruction, whether the result of an insane act or an intentional one, should operate to destroy the policy; and it insists the amendment was legally accomplished, and that the self-destruction of the . . . [defendant] within the five years, although an insane act, operated to deprive this plaintiff of all right of recovery. Plaintiff challenges the alleged amendment, and insists that it was not legally accomplished, and hence is not available as a defense. But the disposition which we deem it necessary to make of this appeal renders it unnecessary to pass upon that question; and hence we shall assume, without deciding, that defendant took all the steps necessary to bring about this change in its laws. This brings us directly to the question whether defendant had the power by amendment, long subsequent to the taking out of the policy by its member, to deprive his beneficiary of all rights under the policy in the event of unintentional self-destruction on the part of the insured; for, in the eye of the law, the taking of life by an insane person, whether it be his own or that of some other person, is not an act for which he is responsible. In the Century Dictionary, a suicide is defined to be: 'One who commits suicide; at common law, one who, being of the years of discretion and sound mind, destroys himself.' And the act itself is defined to be: 'Designedly destroying one's own life. "To constitute suicide at common law the person must be of years of discretion and of sound mind."' This distinction was evidently in the minds of the draftsmen of the rules of the defendant, for they provided that members who should commit suicide within one year from the time of their admission, whether sane or insane, should not secure to others any benefits from the membership. It was entirely competent, of course, for the defendant to provide in the contract between it and its members that there should be no recovery in the event that, within a given period, the insured should take his own life, although insane; and it could as well have provided that the effect of a death by consumption should be to avoid the policy and deprive it of all force, and the same could be said of typhoid fever or any other disease. But it did not see fit to include any of these diseases, nor even unintentional self-destruction after a period of one year. The query, therefore, is whether one who has become a member of this order, and entered into a contract with it, may be deprived of rights under it by a subsequent amendment of the by-laws, providing that unintentional self-destruction shall avoid the policy. It needs no amendment to the by-laws to accomplish that result where a person of sound mind deliberately takes his own life, for in such case, as the Supreme Court of the United States held in Ritter v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 169 U. S. 139, 42 L. ed. 693, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 300, it is an implied condition of the policy that insured will not purposely, when in sound mind, take his own life, but will leave the event of his death to depend upon some cause other than deliberate, wilful self-destruction. So, if the proof were that this defendant, while of sound mind, intentionally took his own life, there could be no recovery, although the policy were silent upon the subject. But unintentional self-destruction, whether due to insanity or accident, after the lapse of a year from the making of the contract, was as much insured against as death from typhoid fever or consumption; and an amendment to its by-laws, providing that the death of an existing member from any of these causes should render the policy void, would deprive the party of vested contract rights. An amendment which effects such a result, we have recently held, may not be made, because it is an unreasonable amendment, destroying contract rights, instead of regulating the administration of the corporation and its membership within reasonable bounds. Parish v. New York Produce Exch. 169 N. Y. 34, 56 L.R.A. 149, 61 N. E. 977. The division line between proper and improper amendments, and the authorities bearing thereon, were sufficiently considered in that case. In this one it suffices in conclusion to say that this defendant cannot, by amendment to its rules, deprive persons already insured, or their beneficiaries, of their rights under contracts of insurance in the event that death should ensue from specified causes necessarily insured against by the original contract. This contract insured Weber against unintentional self-destruction after one year; and the defendant had not the power to take away the right thus secured without his consent. As against him and the beneficiary under his contract, therefore, that part of the amendment which provided, in effect, that self-destruction while insane, within five years from the date of the policy, should render the policy void, was unreasonable and ineffectual."

In the Shipman Case, supra, the question was, as one of the questions is here, as to the binding effect of a new law upon the wife of a member who had committed suicide while sane; the member having agreed to be bound by after-enacted laws of the society. The court held the by-law valid so far as it related to members committing suicide while sane, saying: "To the extent that the amended by-law provides for a forfeiture of contract rights in event of suicide by the insured while he was sane, it is valid: First, because it invades no vested right of the insured; and, second, because it is a fundamental, though unexpressed, part of the original contract that the insured should not intentionally cause his own death. If we assume, therefore, that the original contract and by-laws were silent upon the subject of suicide by the insured while sane, the amended by-law is valid, because there can be no such thing as a vested right to commit suicide, and for the further reason that it is nothing more than the written expression of a provision which the law had read into the contract at its inception."

We therefore hold, upon what we regard as the safer, sounder, and more reasonable rule upon this question, that the after-enacted by-law before us is not binding upon the plaintiff if her husband took his own life while insane, but that it is binding upon her if he committed suicide while sane. There is nothing in the case of Mathieu v. Mathieu, 112 Md. 625, 77 Atl. 112, in conflict with this doctrine. That case related to changes in the by-laws invalidating a previous designation of a beneficiary. The court found the change to have been reasonable upon the facts of the case. After quoting the by-laws and referring to the provisions of the application for membership, the court, in assigning its reasons for holding the by-laws reasonable, said: "The amended by-laws imposed no hardship on the member. They gave him the right to make a new designation of his beneficiary, if he desired to do so, in all cases in which the original designation was rendered inoperative by their passage, and also made it lawful for him to redesignate the same beneficiary. It was only in the event of his failure to exercise his right of making a redesignation or a new designation that the fund became payable on his death to the members of his immediate family in the order of precedence under which his widow was first entitled to it."

2. This brings us to the consideration of the only remaining question: Do the allegations of the defendant's pleadings disclose a defense under the valid and binding provision of this law, which we have held to operate upon her rights under the certificate? There is no allegation that the member was sane or insane at the time he took his own life; nor is it alleged, as it was in Plunkett's Case, 105 Va. 643, 55 S. E. 9, that the deceased "died from the effects of a pistol wound inflicted by himself with suicidal intent;" nor as in Tisch v. Protective Home Circle, 72 Ohio St. 233, 74 N. E. 188, that the death of the insured "was caused by a pistol shot fired purposely by herself with suicidal intent," which fact in that case was admitted by the plaintiff; nor is there any allegation that the member intentionally or purposely destroyed his own life. The defense rests upon the by-law and the mere allegation that the member committed suicide. The case of Supreme Conclave, I. O. H. v. Miles, 92 Md. 613, 84 Am. St. Rep. 528, 48 Atl. 845, shows that this court has been careful to protect the rights of certificate holders in the defendant association.

In the Miles Case this court held that the mere fact that the insured had committed suicide would not bar a recovery under the contract. Judge Jones, speaking for the court, said: "The court refused to instruct the jury that, notwithstanding there was no condition in the contract between the defendant and the assured that the defendant should be exempt from liability to pay the insurance to the beneficiary in case the death of the assured occurred by suicide, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover if the jury found the cause of death to be suicide. We think this ruling is in accordance with what has been the generally accepted doctrine in regard to suicide as a defense in cases of the nature of this. In the present case this doctrine can be very justly applied. The charter of the defendants stated the object of the incorporation thereunder to be 'for beneficial purposes, and to provide an endowment fund to be paid to the family or friends of a deceased member.' Its constitution described one of the objects of the order to be 'to create and maintain, by stated and fixed contributions, a benefit fund from which, on satisfactory evidence of the death of a member who has complied with all the lawful requirements of the order, a sum not exceeding $5,000 shall be paid to his beneficiary or beneficiaries.' The whole spirit and design of the order is, according to its professed objects, to assist members and relieve them in sickness while they live, and to provide for the needs of their families and friends in case of their death,—those of the families and friends of the deceased members who are made objects of care by the order, but have no more control over the cause of death than have the members of the order. Their need of assistance is the same, whatever the cause of death. To refuse them this assistance for a cause over which they have no control would not accord with the expressed objects of the order, and would be contrary to the spirit which professedly prompted its organization."

Had the defendant's pleadings showed that the insured, while sane, had intentionally or designedly taken his own life, they would have disclosed an excepted cause of liability within the terms of the by-law.

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Nicklas, 88 Md. 470, 41 Atl. 906, the provision in the policy, upon which the defendant relied, was as follows: "If the insured 'shall die by suicide, whether the act be voluntary or involuntary, felonious or otherwise, or whether the insured be sane or insane at the time of the act, then . . . this policy shall be null and void and of no effect, except in the case provided for in the 6th section of his policy.'" There was no question of insanity in the case. The evidence showed that the insured was found dead on the floor of his bathroom, fully dressed, with a pistol shot wound over his right ear, and the pistol on the floor near by. The court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury "that, where death results from a pistol shot wound, self-destruction is not to be presumed; but the law presumes the wound was the result of accident, and the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show, by a preponderance of testimony, the wound was intentionally self-inflicted, and that it was not the result of accident, and that, unless the jury find from the evidence, that the insured intentionally shot himself, their verdict must be for the plaintiff." This instruction was approved; the court saying: "We do not understand that it was seriously contended that the propositions of law set forth in this prayer are not sustained by authority."

A full discussion of suicide provisions in policies of insurance, and a review of the decisions upon them, may be found in 2 Bacon, Ben. Soc. 3d ed. In § 336 the author says: "To avoid the effect of those decisions, it has become customary with life insurance companies to insert in their policies a stipulation that the contract shall be void if the insured shall 'die by suicide, felonious or otherwise, sane or insane,' or 'by suicide, sane or insane,' or 'die by his own act or hand, sane or insane.' These conditions have been generally upheld, and successfully eliminate the element of suicide, so that no kind or degree of insanity will prevent the avoidance if the insured had the intent to do the act, even though the intent of an unbalanced mind, or realized the physical consequences of his act."

Being of opinion, for the reasons stated, that the defendant's pleadings were insufficient, and that the judgment for the plaintiff was properly entered, it will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed; the appellant to pay the costs above and below.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

DR. JEPHTHA E. PITSNOGLE and Wife, Appts.,

v.

WESTERN MARYLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

(119 Md. 673, 87 Atl. 917.)

Eminent domain — condemnation of substitutes for private way taken by railroad company.

1. A railroad which takes, under the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

right of eminent domain, for the purpose of its track and yards, the space occupied by a private way which is necessary to permit the owner to reach a highway from his home, may, in order to afford him full compensation for the taking, condemn a strip of land belonging to a stranger as a substitute for the private way.

Same — special jury — statutory provision.

2. The use of the jury regularly drawn for the term, rather than a special jury, is not required by a statute providing that eminent domain proceedings shall be before a jury in court, instead of a sheriff's jury.

Jury — return of summons — failure to name — effect.

3. Failure of the sheriff to state in his return the names of the persons summoned as jurors under order of court in an eminent domain proceeding does not invalidate the return, or affect the eligibility of the persons so summoned to serve.

Trial — instruction — facts not proved.

4. The court should not base an instruction upon the existence of a state of facts which there is no evidence in the record to support.

(April 2, 1913.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Washington County in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to condemn land for railroad purposes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Eminent domain: taking property of one person to compensate another for property taken for a public purpose.

Upon the interesting question raised in PITSNOGLE v. WESTERN MARYLAND R. CO., there is little to be found in the courts of the Union. No attempt is here made to deal with the English and Canadian cases on the subject, in view of the unlimited power of Parliament.

The railroad company may take land for its right of way. This is a public use, but in the taking the citizen's access to the highway is cut off. Is taking for him a right of way through his neighbor's land a taking of the neighbor's land for the use of him whose access has been destroyed, or is it not rather in the larger sense a taking, or an incident of the taking, for the use of the railroad company, which is trying to go through the country doing as little damage as possible? The strength of the position of the railroad company does not seem to increase upon consideration. If the matter is approached from the standpoint of the relation of railroad companies to public roads, it is found that in some juris-

Messrs. Harry Brindle and Frank G. Wagaman, for appellants:

The exercise of the right of eminent domain is purely a legislative function, and not a judicial one.

ditions the companies have power to appropriate highways, provided they furnish in exchange other ways as good. In these cases it cannot be urged that the taking is not for a public use; and if the statute does not empower the company to condemn, and it is claimed that the taking is not for the railway's use, it would seem that the highway authorities might themselves conduct the proceedings (unless, perhaps, the law require as a prerequisite to jurisdiction a petition or the consent of the citizens). If then the railroad company may so act as to public roads, why may it not do the same as to private roads in those jurisdictions where the Constitution permits the taking of property for private roads? But here at once the undertaking becomes full of difficulties. Who shall start the proceedings? May the legislature authorize the railroad company or the highway authorities to petition for such a road? How can the legislature authorize a private road to be opened for the benefit of a citizen who does not ask for it? Again, what becomes of the principle, still vital in some jurisdictions, that "just compensation" means money compensation, and that no other compensation is permissible?

In the PIRSNOGLE CASE it will be observed that, while there was a statute which probably in terms permitted the railroad to take property for a private road, the case arose in a jurisdiction, as the court points out, where the citizen whose access to the highway was destroyed could not condemn a private road in place of that of which he had been deprived. So that the decision rests squarely upon the ground that a citizen's property is taken for a public use when it is taken to recompense another citizen for what has been taken from the latter for a public use. At the least, this is a dangerous door to open both legally and practically. Once opened, where would be the end? The legal and practical way would seem to be to require the condemning party, if necessary, to pay the entire value of the land of the isolated owner.

compensate another arose incidentally in Wheeler v. Essex Public Road Board, 39 N. J. L. 291, where the highway authorities condemned a turnpike road, and, in widening and improving it at a stream crossing, removed the private dam of a mill owner and erected another dam on the land of a third party, and it was held that the erection of the new dam was ultra vires, and that therefore the mill owner had no action for the faulty construction of the new dam, as his remedy was solely for compensation for the taking of the old dam.

In Com. v. Peters, 2 Mass. 125, where the court of session, in altering a highway, deprived one of the benefit of his dam and attempted to make him compensation by giving him a right to build a dam on the property of the owner of the fee of the old road, it was held that the court of session had no power to give any compensation but money. And Sedgwick, J., said that the court could not give title to the land of the owner of the fee of the old road.

An interesting case in connection with the subject is Rogers v. Bradshaw, 20 Johns. 735, where it was held that canal commissioners, having selected a route for a canal covered in part by a turnpike road, had authority to condemn other property for and in place of the turnpike, under the statute declaring it to be lawful for such commissioners to enter upon and use any lands, waters, and streams necessary for the prosecution of the improvements intended by the act, and to make all such canals, locks, dams, and other works, and devices as they might think proper, for said improvements. It was also held that the commissioners had like power of condemnation under another act empowering them to discontinue or alter public roads or highways interfering with the construction of the canal, as a turnpike road was a public road or highway in the popular sense of the words.

As to exercise of power of eminent domain by one corporation for a public purpose to be subserved by another, see note to State v. Superior Ct. 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 448.

Subsequently the opinion was filed by Pattison, J.:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the circuit court for Washington county condemning the right, title, and interest of the appellants in a parcel of land lying and being near Hagerstown, Maryland.

The appellee, the Western Maryland Railway Company, filed its petition in the court below against the appellants, under chapter 117 of the Acts of 1912, in which it alleges that it "desires to acquire the said parcel of land to be used for the purpose of locating its railroad tracks, switches, yard tracks, and side tracks . . . on part of the same, and for the location of a substitute private road on the remainder thereof, in place of the existing private road, which the petitioner desires to close and to use for railroad purposes, said private road being known and designated as the Startzman road. All of which above-described parcel of land it will be necessary for the petitioner to have and use for the said purposes, for the proper working and operation of its railroad and for the proper handling of its railway business, and for said private road." The land sought to be acquired by the appellee is particularly described in the petition, and its location is shown by the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

following plat therewith filed as a part of said petition:

The defendants demurred to the petition, contending (1) that chapter 117 of the Acts of 1912, the act under which the petition was filed, is unconstitutional; and (2) that the petition is insufficient as a basis of a judgment of condemnation, because all of the land sought to be acquired thereby is not, as alleged in the petition, to be used for railroad purposes, but a part of it is to be used "for the location of a substitute private road in place of the existing private road," which is to be closed and used by the petitioner for railroad purposes.

The questions here raised and relied upon by the defendants as affecting the constitutionality of this act were fully presented and argued in the recent case of Ridgely v. Baltimore, 119 Md. 567, 87 Atl. 909, and this court there held the act constitutional, in adopting the opinion of Judge Burke, sitting in the lower court, in which the objections urged against the validity of the statute were fully and ably discussed by him. Therefore we think it unnecessary to further discuss this objection of the defendants made in support of the demurrer.

There is no prohibition in express terms against the taking of private property for private use, found either in our Constitution or the Declaration of Rights, but it is too clear to be questioned that there is such an implied prohibition contained in § 40 of article 3 of the Constitution of this state, which provides that "the general assembly shall enact no law authorizing private property to be taken for public use without just compensation, as agreed upon between the parties, or awarded by a jury being first paid or tendered to the parties entitled to such compensation." Arnsperger v. Crawford, 101 Md. 251, 70 L.R.A. 497, 61 Atl. 413. This constitutional prohibition, as was said by Judge Alvey in the case of New Central Coal Co. v. George's Creek Coal & I. Co. 37 Md. 559, "is but declaratory of the previously existing universal law which forbids the arbitrary and compulsory appropriation of one man's property to the mere private use of another, even though compensation be tendered." And "the legislature cannot make a particular use, either public or private, merely by so declaring it. If it could do so, 'the constitutional restraint would be utterly nugatory.'" Arnsperger v. Crawford and New Central Coal Co. v. George's Creek Coal & I. Co. supra. Whether the use for which private property is taken is public or private, within the meaning of the above provision of the Constitution, is a judicial question, to be determined by the courts. Van Witsen v. Gutman, 79 Md. 405, 24 L.R.A. 403, 29 Atl. 608.

It is not contended by the defendants that the use of the land for railroad purposes is a private, and not a public, use, but they contend that the use of a part of the land for the location of a private road in substitution for the existing private road, which is to be closed and used by the plaintiff company for railroad purposes, is a private use of said land; and that inasmuch as the petition does not state or designate how much and what part of the entire parcel of land so sought to be condemned is to be used for the location of said private road, and how much and what part is to be used for railroad purposes, the whole must fail. The correctness of this contention must be conceded, should we hold, under the facts and circumstances of this case, that the use of a part of said lands for such private road or way is a private use, and not a public use. But is it a private use? In determining this question we are to be controlled by the facts, circumstances, and necessities of this case. The increase in the business of the plaintiff company, as disclosed by the testimony, necessitates an enlargement of what is known as the yards west of Hagerstown, which is fully explained in the record. The road as it now runs is 700 feet south of the Pitznogle lands, but by the removal of curves in it the road will thereafter run about parallel with the south line of said lands, and its center line will be, as it appears from the plat, at the nearest point, about 30 feet, and at the farthest point not over 40 feet, from said lands. Upon this intervening narrow strip of land, for a distance of several hundred feet westward from the Schlottorbeck lands, and occupying the most of it, is located a private road or way which, at the point named, turns southward and crosses the proposed track of the railroad. This private road or way, known as the Startzman road, in which Startzman and others have at least an easement, is used by them in reaching the Clearspring pike, north of the railroad from their respective homes. It is shown that the whole of this intervening space, including the road or way thereon, is required for railroad purposes,—that is, for laying the tracks, side tracks, and switches of said road,—and this is also true of at least a portion of the land that they have sought to condemn. Without the use of this road or private way for the purposes that we have mentioned, the plaintiff would be defeated in its proposed plan of straightening its road and of enlarging its yard, and to close this road without substituting for it another road or way would deprive those entitled to its use of the means of reaching the pike from their homes, and they would not be permitted to condemn a private road or way (Arnsperger v. Crawford, supra) in substitution for the road lost to them, resulting from its necessary use for railroad purposes, which this court has time and again said was a public, and not a private, use.

The right of eminent domain having been conferred upon the plaintiff by legislative enactment, it has the undoubted right to condemn, if need be, the aforementioned Startzman road or private way for railroad purposes, and in our opinion it was not intended by the framers of the Constitution that there should be no adequate relief from the conditions that we have mentioned resulting from the taking of said private road for public use. The condemnation of a part of this land here sought to be condemned for a substitute private road or way is incident to and results from the taking, by reason of public necessity, of the existing private road for public use, and the use of it for such purposes should, we think, be regarded as a public use within the meaning of the Constitution. The legislature of this state has, by enactment of § 278 of article 23 of the Code of 1912, declared it lawful for a railroad company, where its tracks cross any public or private road or way, "to carry said road or highway over its tracks by an overgrade crossing, or to carry it under its track or tracks by an undergrade crossing; and to make such crossings, such corporation may divert any road or highway, so crossed or to be crossed, from its present or existing location; and for entering upon, taking, or appropriating any buildings, gardens, yards, or others lands which may be necessary for the new route and the location of said road so diverted, said corporation may proceed as in case of land necessary for its railroad."

It is contended by the plaintiff, although controverted by the defendants, that this statute is applicable to the present case, but assuming, without deciding, that it does not apply, the uses for which private property is permitted to be taken thereunder are similar in character to the use here proposed to be made of the land sought to be acquired in these proceedings, and the validity of this statute, so far as we are informed, has never been assailed because of its contravening the Constitution of this state in permitting private property to be taken thereunder for private, and not for public, use, although, no doubt, it has been many times availed of when the necessity for its application arose in the construction of railroads. In the case of Van Witsen v. Gutman, supra, it was held by this court that the use to which the defendant, Mrs. Gutman, under an ordinance of the mayor and city council of Baltimore, appropriated the property of the plaintiff in any alley upon which his lands abutted, was a private, and not a public, use. In discussing that case this court said: "The extinguishment of their [the plaintiffs'] interests does not appear to inure in any way to the public service; nor to tend to the relief of any public necessity, nor to promote any public interest, nor to subserve any public purpose . . . nor, in short, to have any relation to the public convenience or public welfare." This cannot be said of the use to which the lands here sought to be condemned are to be appropriated, for the extinguishment of the defendants' interest in the property here mentioned inures to the public service, and has connection with and relation to the public welfare.

Upon the court below overruling the demurrer, the defendants answered and the plaintiff filed its replication, whereupon the court, on the 13th of September, passed its order directing the sheriff to "summon twenty good and lawful men of Washington county to appear at the courthouse on the 17th day of September, 1912, at the hour of 9:30 A. M., to act and serve as jurors at the hearing and determination of said case." The sheriff's return thereto was "jurors summoned as commanded." For some reason not disclosed by the record, the case was not heard on the 17th, but on September 19th, two days thereafter, at which time the defendants moved to quash and annul the said order of court passed on September 13th. This motion being overruled, the defendants then moved to quash the proceedings of the sheriff under said order, and particularly his return thereto. This motion, too, was overruled, whereupon the defendants entered a "challenge to the array," which was denied them, when the defendants refused the list of jurors.

These various motions arose from the contentions of the defendants, which were (1) that the jury was not selected in the manner intended and provided for by said chapter 117 of the Acts of 1912; and (2) that the return of the sheriff, "Jurors summoned as commanded," was not a proper return, inasmuch as it did not give the names of the persons so summoned by him. The defendants contend that in cases like the one before us the Acts of 1912, chap. 117, prohibits the method here adopted of selecting persons to serve as jurors, and they insist that under that statute, which is now in force, jurors in such cases should be selected in the usual way from those regularly drawn as jurors to serve at a given term of the court. It is upon the following language found in the title, and repeated in the 1st section of the act, that the defendants base their contention, to wit: "Providing that the proceedings therefor shall be before a jury in court, instead of before a sheriff's jury." In addition to this language there is nothing in the act that sheds further light upon the question here raised.

Prior to the passage of this act, in proceedings like the one before us, the jury was not only selected by the sheriff, but the hearing was before him,—that is, in his presence, and out of the presence of the court,—and it is to such a jury that the statute has reference when it speaks of a "sheriff's jury," and it is it which the statute distinguishes from a "jury in court." Under the present law, there is no express direction as to how a jury shall be selected, but it is required that the proceedings shall be before a "jury in court;" that is, the testimony shall be taken and the case tried in the presence of the court and subject to its direction as in other cases. In support of their contention, our attention has been called by the appellants to the language of this court in the case of Baltimore Belt R. Co. v. Baltzell, 75 Md. 94, 23 Atl. 74, in which it said: "The term 'jury,' used in a Constitution or a statute, will be understood as meaning a common-law jury." This expression of the court, however, taken from the body of the opinion, is misleading, when not considered in connection with what was also said by the court in relation thereto. The court there said: "But for the opinion of the judge below it would not have occurred to us there was any difficulty as to this question. Ordinarily, it is true, the term 'jury,' used in a Constitution or a statute, will be understood as meaning a common-law jury, and, if no other jury had been known in law at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1851, this argument might have been unanswerable. But it is conceded from the earliest colonial history, and from the formation of the state government down to the adoption of the Constitution, the legislature had provided for the taking of private property for public use upon making compensation to the owner as assessed by a special jury summoned on warrant. . . . As to railroads, the legislature, without exception, provided that the compensation should be awarded by a special jury summoned as directed by § 167. . . . In two thirds of the counties of this state, there are but two jury terms a year, each about six months apart, and we can hardly suppose the framers of the Constitution meant to delay and embarrass the construction of railroads and other public improvements by requiring compensation to be awarded in court by a common-law jury. At least, if such had been the intention, if they intended to deny to the legislature the exercise of a power in this respect,—a power which had been exercised from the beginning of the government,—it is but fair to presume this intention would have been declared in plain and explicit terms."

What was there said in no wise supports the contention of the defendants, but, on the contrary, furnishes us with authority to hold in this case that such is not the meaning of the Constitution. And what was then said as to the infrequent convening of the jury terms of our courts in many counties of this state is true at the present time, and it has special application to this case. They have in Washington county what are known as three jury terms in each year, which convene on the second Monday in February, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

May, and November, respectively, and one nonjury term, which convenes on the first Monday in August. It will thus be seen that between the first Monday in August and the second Monday in November in each year, a period of three and one-half months, there is no regular panel; that is, a panel regularly drawn for a given term, from which a jury could be selected to hear and determine cases of this character. The petition in this case was filed on August 9th, and therefore, if the case was to be heard only by a jury such as we have mentioned, regularly selected under a statute for a given term of court, this case could not have been heard for more than three months from the date of the filing of the petition. And, as was said in the case from which we have just quoted, we can hardly suppose the framers of the Constitution, or of the statute under which these proceedings were instituted, meant to delay and embarrass the construction of railroads and other public improvements for this length of time. If, "for any reason, there is no regular panel in attendance, and there are cases to be tried which require the intervention of a jury, the court has power to order a special venire. This is a common-law power" inherent in the courts. 24 Cyc. 230; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1192; Rockford Ins. Co. v. Nelson, 75 Ill. 552. When, however, at the time to be fixed by the court for trial of such matters as are to be heard by a jury, the regular panel for the term will be present, or under practice of the court or existing statutes, can be reconvened for the purpose of hearing such matters at that time, the court should, in the absence of some sufficient cause to the contrary, direct the jury to be selected from the regular panel, and for that purpose take such steps as may be necessary to have them present. If there be not a sufficient number of qualified jurors then present, the court can, of course, direct such number of talismen as may be necessary, to be summoned.

The objection made by the defendants to the return of the sheriff because of his failure to return therewith the names of the persons summoned by him under the order of court, to serve as jurors, cannot in our opinion have the effect of invalidating the return, nor can it affect the eligibility as jurors of those summoned by him under the said order of court to which such return was made. Had they asked for it, the court would no doubt have required the sheriff to have amended his return, giving the names of those summoned by him. But, in any event, it would not have invalidated the return, or rendered ineligible, as jurors, those summoned by him.

In the progress of the trial six exceptions were noted by the defendants, five to the rulings of the court on the admission of evidence, and one to its rulings on the prayers. The petitioner offered five prayers, all of which were granted, and the defendants offered eighteen prayers, two of which, the third and eighth, were granted, and the others were rejected. The court, however, granted an instruction in lieu of the fifth prayer offered by the defendants. The defendants excepted to the granting of the plaintiff's prayers and to the rejection of their prayers, as well as to the instruction of the court granted in lieu of their fifth prayer. The five exceptions to the rulings upon the evidence were not pressed in the oral argument or alluded to in the brief. We, however, discover no error in the admission of the testimony. As we have already very fully stated the law of this case, we will not now discuss each of the five granted prayers of the plaintiff, or the sixteen rejected prayers of the defendants, but will state generally that the granted instructions, including the prayer of the court, properly presented the law of this case to the jury, and there is nothing contained therein that is materially inconsistent with the law of the case as we have stated it in this opinion.

We will, however, discuss briefly the sixteenth prayer of the defendants, to which our attention has been particularly called, and which is not covered by what we have already said. In this prayer the court was asked to instruct the jury that, should they find that land in addition to that already used and occupied by the railroad was reasonably necessary for the construction of the addition to the yards of the company, "still the verdict of the jury should be for the defendants if the jury shall further find that the plaintiff is the owner of the tract of land spoken of by the witnesses as the Crawford farm, and also of the tract spoken of by the witnesses as having been purchased by the plaintiff from Daniel Startzman, provided the jury shall further find that the said plaintiff can, with reasonable convenience, for the necessary extension and addition to its yards aforesaid, use the aforesaid lands spoken of by the witnesses as the Crawford farm and the Daniel Startzman lands, instead of the land described in the petition filed in this case, for such addition." In passing upon this prayer, it is not necessary for us to determine whether the law is properly stated therein; for, should it be properly stated, and we are not to be understood as saying that it is, there is nothing in the evidence tending to show that the plaintiff company can, with reasonable convenience, for the necessary extension and addition to its yards, use the lands 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) in the prayer mentioned as belonging to said company. The evidence discloses that the Crawford farm, as well as a part of the Startzman land, is the property of the plaintiff, yet there is no evidence whatever as to the physical character and conformation of said land, or whether it was suitable or convenient for the purposes set forth in the petition. Two of the employees of the company were upon the stand, and the fact of the ownership of this property by the plaintiff company was elicited from them, yet no inquiry was made on the part of the defendants as to the physical character of this land, or whether or not it was suitable for the purposes for which the land sought to be condemned is wanted, or whether it could be conveniently used for such purposes. There is no evidence in the record tending to show the existence of the facts which, by this prayer, are left to the jury to find. It was, however, stated by one of the employees of the company that, if the road or right of way was moved to the south of the proposed railroad, it would be crowded into more tracks, and this they wished to avoid.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed as per curiam heretofore filed, with costs in this court to the appellee, the costs in the lower court to be paid by the appellee, as provided for by the statute.

APPEAL by the defendant surety company from a decree of the Chancery Court for Hinds County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to recover claims of subcontractors against a contractor's bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. H. Thompson and J. H. Thompson, for appellant:

Mechanics and materialmen, in the absence of statutory liens, have no greater rights than other unsecured creditors, in the enforcement of their debts for labor upon, or material used in, the erection of a building.

Jefferson v. Asch, 53 Minn. 446, 25 L.R.A. 257, 39 Am. St. Rep. 618, 55 N. W. 604;

As pointed out in the note in 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1028, by the great weight of authority, public corporations, although not expressly authorized by statute, have the power to require an undertaking by contractors for public work to pay all claims for material or work furnished in the performance of such work, and this is the holding of the later cases considering the question.

Thus, in Missouri it is declared to be settled law by judicial decisions as well as by statutory enactment, that municipal and public bodies have power to contract for the payment of all claims which may be made for labor and material furnished in the construction of public buildings, and may cover same in the bond, so that it inures to the benefit of third parties not known. Eau Claire-St. Louis Lumber Co. v. Banks, 136 Mo. App. 44, 117 S. W. 611; St. Louis v. Hill-O'Meara Constr. Co. — Mo. App. —, 158 S. W. 98.

And it is no defense to an action by a board of education upon a contractor's bond obliging the latter to make prompt payment to all persons supplying him with labor or materials in the prosecution of a public work called for by a contract with such board, the performance of which is secured by the bond, that there is no stat-

The trustees had no express power to require any bond at all; and if, in requiring a bond, the act was intra vires, the power exercised was an implied one, which will not extend to providing for complainants.

Cook, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the chancery court of Hinds county overruling appellant's demurrer to several bills of complaint filed by certain subcontractors against the Reusch Contracting Company and the National Surety Company, surety upon its bond for the performance of its contract to construct the State Charity Hospital at Jackson. These bills made the board of trustees of the Mississippi State Charity Hospital parties thereto, and the state intervened in the litigation. All of these suits were consolidated, and all will be settled by this appeal.

It will be noted that a demurrer was sustained to the bill of the state and the board of trustees, from which decree there was no appeal. The board of trustees of the hospital made a contract with the Reusch Contracting Company to build the hospital, and the contractors made subcontracts with the several complainants to furnish material and construct certain parts of the building. The contractors failed to pay the subcontractors, and these bills were filed to hold the surety company upon its bond of indemnity.

The Reusch Contracting Company, in the contract to erect the building, bound itself to furnish all material and labor necessary to the completion, within a specified time, of the building according to certain specifications named in or made a part of the contract. The owner, in consideration of the erection of the hospital, agreed to pay the builder an agreed sum of money, to wit, $49,845. As an incident to this building contract, and in furtherance of its performance within the time limit, the contractor, contemporaneously with the execution of the same, executed a bond, with the National Surety Company as surety, obligating itself and its surety to pay the board of trustees of the Mississippi State Charity Hospital, and to all subcontractors, workmen, laborers, mechanics, and furnishers of material jointly, as their interests may appear, the sum of $25,000, if it should fail to complete the building according to contract, or if it should fail to pay all of the subcontractors, workmen, laborers, mechanics, and furnishers of material whom it should employ under its said contract. In short, the contractors contracted to furnish all material and labor, and to build within the time fixed a certain building, and at the same time executed a bond in the penalty of $25,000, with the National Surety Company as surety thereon, payable to the owners of the building, and to all subcontractors, materialmen, workmen, laborers, mechanics, and binding itself and its surety thereby to complete the work within the time limit, and binding itself and its surety to pay for all material used in said building, and to pay for all the labor done upon the building, and in default thereof binding itself and its surety to forfeit to the obligees, as their interest may appear, the sum of $25,000.

It is contended by appellant that the bond sued on must be read in connection with the contract and the specifications made part of it; and, in reading the two together, the words in the condition of the bond, "and shall pay all subcontractors, workmen, laborers, mechanics, and furnishers of material whom he shall employ under his said contract," are mere surplusage and without legal effect. Two questions are presented by this contention, viz.: First, the power of the trustees of the hospital to make or accept a bond for the benefit of third persons; and, second, the right of third persons, the complainants (appellees), to sue upon the bond as a contract made for their benefit.

After stating the questions involved here, appellant tentatively admits that the board of trustees was impliedly empowered to require the contractor to execute a bond for the faithful performance of his contract with the board of trustees, but that this power cannot be extended to cover an indemnity to subcontractors. In other words, it is conceded that, while an express power to erect the building carried with it the power to exact a bond from the contractors to insure their performance of their contract to erect the building, the board of trustees was not thereby authorized to demand anything more, and, in the absence of statutory authority, that part of the bond securing the claims of subcontractors was beyond the power of the board to take, or to enforce after it was taken. It does not appear that anything was required of the contractor which he was not perfectly willing to agree to, and we assume that this bond was executed without pressure from the trustees. It is probable that the bond was given voluntarily and in good faith, and the parties to same were not disturbed by the doctrine of ultra vires.

Was the provision of the bond for the benefit of subcontractors, materialmen, and laborers ultra vires? There is authority for and against the power. In Knapp v. Swaney, 56 Mich. 345, 56 Am. Rep. 397, 23 N. W. 162, Judge Cooley rendered the opinion of the court, saying: "A county may go to great pains and great expense to make its courthouse unquestionably safe, that individual citizens may not suffer injuries consequent upon its construction. But if it may do this, it would be very strange if it were found lacking in authority to stipulate in the contract for the building that the contractors, when calling for payment, shall show that they are performing their obligations to those who supply the labor and materials, and that the county is not obtaining the building at the expense of a few of its people. . . . We are of opinion that there was nothing ultra vires in this condition, and that the relators are bound by it." In United States Gypsum Co. v. Gleason, 135 Wis. 539, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 906, 116 N. W. 238, referring to a contract for the erection of a public building, wherein it was provided that the claims for labor performed and material furnished should be paid by the contractor, the court said: "This authority is one incident to the power given it to erect such a building and to provide for payment therefor."

. . . But in ascertaining the extent of a grant authorizing the doing of some specific thing it is to be taken as embracing the authority to do every proper act incident thereto and appropriate in the usual and ordinary course to carry such authority into execution. . . . We are of opinion that the county had power in this case to contract and secure the plaintiffs as provided in the contract and the bond given by defendants."

The same rule is announced in many of the states. In all of these cases it is held that public boards, like the board of trustees in this case, when given the power to contract for the doing of public work, have the power to require the contractor to do certain things for the benefit of third persons before they can collect from the public the money due them by the public for the doing of the public work; and some of them hold that such boards also have the inherent power, without statutory grant, to require bonds to secure subcontractors, laborers, and materialmen. Denver v. Hindry, 40 Colo. 42, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1028, 90 Pac. 1028; Knight & J. Co. v. Castle, 172 Ind. 97, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 573, 87 N. E. 976; School Dist. ex rel. Koken Iron Works v. Livers, 147 Mo. 580, 49 S. W. 507; Snider v. Greer Wilkinson Lumber Co. — Ind. App. —, 96 N. E. 980; Korsmeyer Plumbing & Heating Co. v. McClay, 43 Neb. 649, 62 N. W. 50; Lyman v. Lincoln, 38 Neb. 794, 57 N. W. 532; Ochs v. M. J. Carnahan Co. 42 Ind. App. 160, 76 N. E. 788, 80 N. E. 163; St. Louis Public Schools v. Woods, 77 Mo. 197. Baxter v. Camp, 71 Conn. 245, 42 L.R.A. 514, 71 Am. St. Rep. 169, 41 Atl. 803, and Jefferson v. Asch, 53 Minn. 446, 25 L.R.A. 257, 39 Am. St. Rep. 618, 55 N. W. 604, are the two leading authorities for the lack of power in municipal boards and statutory boards generally to make contracts of the character here involved without express authority.

It would seem that there is no sound reason why the board of trustees would not be empowered to provide for the protection of subcontractors and others furnishing material and labor for the building. The legislature could have conferred this power upon the board, and such a statute would not be a subject of just criticism. But it is said that this was not done, and, that being true, the board of trustees were without power to accept this bond. It seems to us that the trustees had power to make any and all contracts necessary or proper to make in carrying out the erection of the hospital. The power to build certainly carries with it, as a necessary incident, the power to make such terms with the contractor as, in the opinion of the trustees, would best promote the speedy construction of the building. In the exercise of this power we can see no reason why the trustees should be confined to the mere making of the contract with some person to build the hospital, and it seems clear to us that the clause of the bond for the benefit of those who did the work or furnished material for the house does not violate any 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

rule of law or equity; but, on the contrary, we can see the sound business policy in this clause, quite aside from any sentimental or moral obligation to treat "knights of the hatchet and saw" as preferred above other litigants.

Taking it as a cold-blooded business proposition, this clause in the bond would naturally encourage subcontractors of the best sort to take contracts to do certain parts of the work; it would tend to prevent the abandonment of the work by mechanics not promptly paid their wages by the contractors, who might be suspected to be of doubtful financial solvency; it would procure the best work and material, and the prompt services of all workers and subcontractors; and all of this would redound to the benefit of the public. It must be borne in mind that the mechanics, materialmen, and laborers could have no lien upon the building, and that the trustees, representing the state, would not be bound to reserve money with which to pay their claims; but they would have to depend upon the contractor alone. Taking these things into consideration, the bond, in a way, supplied the place of the mechanics' lien law, and thus gave an additional security to all persons working upon this building and supplying material therefor; and this alone was, in our opinion, of the highest importance to the state.

Another reason urged why this bond is void is that the contract does not require the contractor to give the bond to secure third persons not parties to the contract. We think this view unduly narrows the contract. The contract consists of the two instruments, and they must be taken together; and, when so taken, they make the final and complete contract between the parties. Besides the subcontractors are made parties to the contract, and the bond was executed in their interests. The bond does not require the contractor to do anything which the law did not require it to do, in so far as the subcontractors are concerned, and it is difficult to see why the surety could not be bound by its contract to insure his doing his plain legal and moral duty, although it be conceded that the board of trustees did not have the power to demand the bond. There is certainly no inhibition against the contractor entering into such a contract with his subcontractors, either by name or by a general clause in the bond.

Stated more accurately, as one of the conditions of the letting of the contract, and as one of the considerations therefor, the board of trustees exacted the bond to insure the payment of the subcontractors and materialmen. This was not an unreasonable or improper thing to do, and it required nothing of the contractor which the law did not require it to do, except to obtain someone to insure the performance of a plain legal and moral duty.

The contention that the clause of the bond challenged as invalid was without consideration is, in our opinion, unsound. This was a part of the consideration which enabled the contractor to procure the contract, and would have the effect of encouraging contracts with the contractor, and the bills so allege. There can be no doubt of the intention of the parties. The language of the bond is unambiguous; and, if it was within the power of the trustees to require the bond, it manifestly inures to all persons named therein.

It is the policy of the law to look with disfavor upon the defense of ultra vires. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258, 24 L. ed. 693, said: "The doctrine of ultra vires, when invoked for or against a corporation, should not be allowed to prevail, where it would defeat the ends of justice, or work a legal wrong." See also Edwards County v. Jennings, — Tex. Civ. App. — 33 S. W. 585. To discover what contract the bond refers to, it is necessary to read the contract; and it is thus both the bond and the contract constitute the entire contract. The contract requires the contractors to furnish all labor and material, and to furnish it they must pay for it, and to afford them credit for that purpose, and to expedite the work by mechanics capable and willing, the parties to the contract agreed that the bond in question should be executed. An advantage was obtained by the trustees, and an extra credit was given to the contractors; and, it being the duty of the trustees to erect a building with as little delay as possible, and to do so upon the best terms obtainable, we are of the opinion that the plea of ultra vires, if upheld, "would defeat the ends of justice;" and to deny the plea will only require the contractors and their surety to carry out their obligations advisedly assumed.

Affirmed, with leave to answer the bill within thirty days from the filing of the mandate in the trial court.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Division No. 1.)

CHARLES DOUGHERTY, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS et al., Respts.

(— Mo. —, 158 S. W. 326.)

Highway — obstruction — storage of lumber.

1. A dealer in building materials has no right to store in the street adjoining his yard, even temporarily, lumber for which there is no room in the yard.

Municipal corporation — permitting lumber piled in street — liability for injury.

2. A municipal corporation is liable for injuries caused by the fall of a pile of lumber which it permits to be stored in the street by a dealer, upon a boy who is playing around it, although the lumber had been in the street only a short time.

Same — notice of obstruction — necessity.

3. To hold a municipal corporation liable for injury caused by a pile of lumber stored in the street, it must have had notice of its existence.

Trial — instruction — delay in removing lumber pile.

4. Instructing the jury that if a municipal corporation permitted a pile of lumber to remain in a street for about three days, it would be liable for injuries caused by its fall, is misleading, as tending to indicate the reasonable notice to which the municipality was entitled before liability would attach.

(June 28, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Otto F. Karbe and S. C. Rogers, for appellant:

The court erred in giving instructions to the jury offered by defendants Riechers.

The court erred in giving instructions to by individuals having no contractual relation with the city, and so does not include cases where the material has been left by the municipality itself, or by others doing work for it. And the cases considered are only those where the obstruction was not of a permanent nature, and do not include such obstructions as stepping stones, hitching posts, or stands erected for business purposes.

Generally as to liability of municipal corporations for defects or obstructions in streets, see note to Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 513.

A municipality has been held liable for injuries sustained by reason of a horse taking fright at a pile of rubbish consisting of a bathtub, tin cans, etc., which it permitted to remain on the street, close to the part traveled by vehicles. Nicholasville v. Fain, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 564, 99 S. W. 275.

—or at logs and mill material piled in the road by an adjacent mill owner and permitted to remain there several months. Kelly v. Whitechurch Twp. 11 Ont. L. Rep. 155, affirmed without opinion in 12 Ont. L. Rep. 83. The court in this case said that a municipal council could not legally permit two thirds of the statutory road allowance to be made use of by an adjacent mill owner in an old, settled portion of the county, for the piling of his logs and other mill material, and say to the public that they must find their way as best they may through these obstructions.

And in Sutter v. Kansas City, infra, the city was held liable for injuries sustained by one who tripped over bricks which had been scattered on the sidewalk by children who had taken them from the side of the street, where they had been piled by the railroad company, engaged in repairs of its tracks. The court said that the railroad company had the right to pile the bricks at such place, to remain there a reasonable length of time for it to complete the work on its tracks, and to replace them in the street, and while the company had the duty as far as possible to prevent children from scattering the bricks on the sidewalk, the city had a similar duty imposed by law to use every reasonable precaution to keep the sidewalk in a suitable condition for use of the public, and it had this duty primarily, and whether or not the company was negligent in its duty.

A disabled vehicle may be left in the street by the owner for such reasonable time as may be necessary for its removal, and its presence in the street for this time is neither a nuisance nor an obstruction; but after this time elapses, it is both an obstruction and a nuisance, and for any injury resulting therefrom the city may be held liable under a statute which makes it the duty of a city to keep its streets open and in repair and free from nuisances. Cutter v. Des Moines, 137 Iowa, 643, 113 N. W. 1081.

Material placed in street under an express permit from city.

A city which grants permission to a builder to place material in the street is liable for injuries sustained thereby, where it fails to take proper means for protecting and guarding against danger. Blocher v. Dieco, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 689, 99 S. W. 606; Carlisle v. Campbell, 151 Ky. 279, 151 S. W. 673; Apker v. Hoquiam, 51 Wash. 567, 99 Pac. 746; Laporte v. Henry, 41 Ind. App. 197, 83 N. E. 655.

In the Campbell Case the court said that the statute commits the streets to the care of the city, and imposes upon it the burden of keeping them reasonably safe for public travel. This burden the city cannot by its ordinance shift from itself to a property holder. He may be liable to it, but it is answerable to the person injured by reason of the unsafe condition of the street, where it knowingly suffers the obstruction to remain in the street without taking proper precaution for the safety of the traveling public.

And it is immaterial that the material was removed and replaced from time to time, and that the particular material causing the injury had been there but a short time. Apker v. Hoquiam, 51 Wash. 567, 99 Pac. 746.

Necessity of notice of condition.

In Gregg v. Wilmington, 155 N. C. 18, 70 S. E. 1070, and Friedman v. New York, 63 Misc. 310, 116 N. Y. Supp. 750, it was held that where a city grants permission to place building material in the street, it will not be liable for injuries sustained thereby, unless it has notice of dangerous conditions.

But the better reasoning would seem to be that when it issues a permit for using the street for the storage of building material, a city is charged with notice of the dangerous condition of the street, and it must, without further notice, take means to protect the public from danger by reason of the obstruction contemplated in the permit, as was held in DeGarmo v. Vogt, — Ky. —, 152 S. W. 969; Blocher v. Dieco, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 689, 99 S. W. 606.

In Rolsten v. St. John, 36 N. B. 574, a demurrer to the complaint in an action against the city for damages sustained from a pile of lumber on the sidewalk was sustained, as there was no allegation that the city had notice of the obstruction. In this case there was no permit granted by the city.

Length of time sufficient to charge city with notice.

to render it liable for injury sustained by the blowing over of a large signboard placed by the owner temporarily against a fence when it had been standing there not to exceed thirty minutes when the accident occurred. Miller v. Kansas City, 157 Mo. App. 533, 137 S. W. 998.

But where evidence tended to show that children had been in the habit of removing bricks from a pile placed at the side of the street, and scattering them on the sidewalk, which would again be piled up by the contractor, the city had notice of the continuing acts of the children in scattering the bricks, though the injury was caused by stumbling on bricks scattered but one hour before the accident happened. Sutter v. Kansas City 138 Mo. App. 105, 119 S. W. 1084.

And thirty days' obstruction of a main street with building material will impute to a city notice of its existence. Apker v. Hoquiam, supra.

While a city has not, as a rule, constructive notice of an obstruction where material is placed in a street for only from two to four hours before an injury caused thereby, yet, where the unloading of building material in the street had been going on for several days, the material being taken out of the street by the contractor in proceeding with the work, and replaced with other material, the question of notice was for the jury, though the

The negligence declared upon in plaintiff's petition was the alleged careless manner of piling the lumber, and plaintiff could not therefore recover upon any other ground.

And when a disabled vehicle has been allowed to remain at the side of the road for several days, the question whether there had been sufficient length of time for a city to have knowledge of and to remove an obstruction in the street is one of fact for the jury. Cutter v. Des Moines, 137 Iowa, 643, 113 N. W. 1081.

Contributory negligence.

Knowledge that a building is in process of erection, and that the sidewalk is occupied by building material, will not, as a matter of law, preclude one injured thereby from recovering damages against the city if he was, at the time of the injury, using reasonable care. Blocher v. Dieco, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 689, 99 S. W. 606.

Nor will the fact that the injured party was pushed by someone, and thereby made to stumble and fall over the obstruction, lessen the legal liability of the city which permits an obstruction on the sidewalk, as its negligence in this respect directly contributed to the injury, and except for it the accident would not have occurred. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. William E. Baird and Robert Burkham also for respondents.

Graves, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Charles Dougherty, a boy of ten years, sues through his next friend, to recover from the defendants for personal injuries received by him when a pile of lumber in the street fell upon him. The suit was against the city of St. Louis, the two co-partners in the business firm of J. P. Riechers & Son, and the Dimple Realty Company. The latter was dismissed by the trial court upon a demurrer to the testimony, and it is conceded in the briefs here that such ruling was correct. Upon trial a jury returned a verdict for the other defendants, and from that verdict and the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

The negligence charged is thus stated in the petition: "Plaintiff for cause of action states that on the 11th day of February, 1909, St. Louis avenue in said city of St. Louis, and the sidewalks pertaining thereto, constituted an open public highway of said city; that the premises heretofore mentioned abutted on said public highway, to wit, St. Louis avenue, and was surrounded and inclosed by a board fence; that on the day and date above mentioned, and for several days prior thereto, defendants J. P. Riechers, Charles P. Riechers, and the Dimple Realty Company owned and main-

In Brown v. Chicago, 135 Ill. App. 126, where a pedestrian traveling in the street in front of premises upon which a new building was being erected tripped on scantling lying on the surface of the street, in holding the city not liable, the court said the evidence shows that a 2 by 4 scantling was lying flat on the surface of that part of the street designated for vehicles and horsemen. "We do not think it can be held that the scantling lying on the surface of the street made the street dangerous for horsemen or vehicles, or that permitting it to lie there in the roadway was actionable negligence. It is to be inferred from the evidence that there was at the time of the accident sufficient light to enable appellant to see the projecting scantling, for he says he saw it after he fell. If he chose to use that portion of the street designated for vehicles instead of the portion designated for pedestrians, it was his duty to exercise sufficient care to avoid obstacles of that character."

Contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury where one who sustains injuries from building material in the street had passed along that street earlier in the day on which the accident occurred, and saw or should have seen the obstruction. Apker v. Hoquiam, supra. J. H. B.

tained a pile of heavy lumber on the St. Louis avenue side of said premises, and on the open public highway, said pile of lumber being about 15 feet in length, about 5 feet wide, and about 8 feet high, and extended outwardly from said fence a distance of about 5 feet on the public highway; that it was the duty of said city of St. Louis to keep its sidewalks free from nuisances and dangerous obstructions and in reasonably safe condition to persons lawfully on said street; that the fact of said lumber being on said sidewalk was known to the defendants city of St. Louis and its agents and servants, or could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have been known to said defendant city of St. Louis; that said lumber was negligently, carelessly, loosely, and improperly piled, in this; to wit, that defendants failed to brace said lumber with proper ties or crosspieces, placed between the boards constituting said pile of lumber, and that said lumber was not guarded so as to warn persons who might come near or in contact with same of their danger; and that said pile of lumber was dangerous to persons who might come near or in contact therewith." The petition then alleges that plaintiff and other boys were playing in, upon, and around such pile of lumber, when a portion thereof fell upon him and injured him. Damages are asked in the sum of $15,000. The two individual defendants, J. P. and C. P. Riechers, answer (1) by a general denial, and (2) a plea of contributory negligence. The answer of the city is to like effect. The answer of the realty company need not be considered. Complaint is made of the giving and refusing of instructions, the admission of improper evidence, and the refusing to admit proper evidence. Incident facts will be detailed in the course of the opinion in connection with the points made.

I. Plaintiff asked a general instruction, which the court refused to give, and this is one of the complaints urged here. The instruction as asked reads: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe and find from the evidence that the defendants J. P. Riechers and Charles P. Riechers placed the pile of lumber mentioned in the evidence on the sidewalk on St. Louis avenue, near Leffngwell avenue, prior to the 11th day of February, 1909, or owned same and allowed it to be done, and that they allowed it to remain there for about three days, and that the defendant city of St. Louis knew the same was so placed on said sidewalk, or might, by the exercise of reasonable care, have known through its officers and agents that same was there, and that the defendants J. P. Riechers and Charles P. Riechers and the city of St.

Louis knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care could have known, that same was improperly piled and unsafe and dangerous to children lawfully playing on or around same, and that said lumber was carelessly, negligently, loosely, and improperly piled by reason of not being braced with proper ties or crosspieces, placed between the boards constituting said pile of lumber, and that said lumber was unguarded, and that while said lumber was in said condition on said sidewalk, at the place mentioned in the evidence on or about the 11th day of February, 1909, the front tier of said lumber fell and injured Charles Dougherty, plaintiff herein, while he was playing on, near, at, or around same, and that the said plaintiff was, at the time he was injured, in the exercise of ordinary care, then you will find your verdict in favor of plaintiff." This instruction the court modified and gave. The modified instruction reads: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe and find from the evidence, that said St. Louis avenue was, on the 11th day of February, 1909, an open public highway, that the defendants J. P. Riechers and Charles P. Riechers placed the pile of lumber mentioned in the evidence on the sidewalk on St. Louis avenue, near Leffngwell avenue, prior to the 11th day of February, 1909, or owned same and allowed it to be done, and that they allowed it to remain there for an unreasonable length of time, and that the defendant city of St. Louis knew the same was so placed on said sidewalk, or might, by the exercise of reasonable care have known through its officers and agents that same was there, and that the defendants, J. P. Riechers and Charles P. Riechers and the city of St. Louis, knew or by the exercise of reasonable care could have known, the same was improperly piled and unsafe and dangerous to children lawfully playing on or around same, and that said lumber was carelessly, negligently, loosely, and improperly piled by reason of not being braced with proper ties or crosspieces, placed between the boards constituting said pile of lumber, and that said lumber was unguarded, and that while said lumber was in said condition on said sidewalk, at the place mentioned in the evidence, on or about the 11th day of February, 1909, the front tier of said lumber fell and injured Charles Dougherty, plaintiff herein, while he was playing on, near, at, or around same, and that the said plaintiff was, at the time he was injured, in the exercise of ordinary care, then you will find your verdict in favor of plaintiff."

Some pertinent facts should be first stated: The individual defendants were the lessees of the vacant adjoining lot, and had it fenced, and for years had used it for the purpose of storing secondhand lumber and other building material. On St. Louis avenue the space between the board fence surrounding their lot and the curb line of the street was something like 20 feet, the outside portion having a sidewalk upon it. The lumber pile was on the inside portion, and not on the sidewalk portion. The evidence sharply conflicts as to whether the lumber was safely or negligently piled up. A jury could well find either way upon this question. Likewise the evidence sharply conflicts as to how long this particular pile of lumber had been in the street at this point. One witness for defendants says: "I have known Riechers for eight years. The lumber had been there five or six days. I took more interest in this particular case because I knew that these boys would get hurt if they would keep on playing around that lumber pile." Other evidence places the time much shorter, but it is sufficient for us to say that there is a conflict in the evidence, with substantial evidence both ways. The theory of the defense is largely founded upon the testimony of Charles P. Riechers. This is short, as condensed in the abstract, and we quote both sides of it, thus:

Direct examination by Mr. Muench:

My name is Charles Riechers. I am in the general construction business with my father, J. P. Riechers & Son. Have been about twenty-five years. We are occupying the lot at the corner of Leffngwell and St. Louis avenues for storing old building material. The lot is inclosed by a fence. Part of the sidewalk is paved and part unpaved. From the fence to the curb is about 25 feet and 6 inches. I have heard the testimony with reference to the pile of lumber which was outside of the fence, on the St. Louis avenue side of the lot. That lumber was moved from the southwest corner of Grand and Dodier street. We were wrecking a building there. This lumber came out of that building. I had all the nails drawn out of the lumber, perfectly clean, no rub-bish sticking to it, lath nails nor pieces of lath remaining, or anything else. It was absolutely clean. It was white pine joists, 2x6, 2x8, 2x10. I saw the lumber as it was piled and after it was piled. Under the bottom of the pile were two pieces of 4x6, laid on an incline toward the fence, by having two bricks under the outer edge of it, and on this we proceeded to pile the lumber about 5 feet wide up against the fence. The lumber leaned against the fence. The front of the pile was leaning towards the fence northwardly from 12 to 15 inches. That was brought about by the pile being 5 feet at the bottom and from 3½ to 3¾ feet at the top. It was against the fence all the way up. I had last seen this pile of lumber before the accident, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. It certainly looked good and safe to me.

Q. Why was it, Mr. Riechers, that this lumber was not piled in the yard? (Objected to by Mr. Rosenthal.)

Mr. Muench: The purpose of this question is simply to show that at that particular time there was not room inside the fence to store those boards, and for that reason they were placed just outside the fence. I expect to follow that up by other evidence.

The court: Well, he may answer that question upon the statement that you expect to follow it with further proof. (To which ruling plaintiff then and there duly excepted.)

A. On account of a lot of material accumulating on the inside, and we had to remove this stuff from Grand and Dodier in order to make room for other old material that was to be left there, to be reused in the construction of the new building. Consequently by not having room on the inside of this fence, we piled the lumber out against the outside of the fence, and just as quick as we could get these nails and stuff out we hauled it down, and then after we had room made in the lot we were going to proceed to move that stuff in the lot. This particular pile of lumber was laid up one plank on top of the other.

Q. About how long would it have taken one man to remove that lumber from the outside of the fence to the inside? (Objected to as incompetent and immaterial, objection overruled, to which ruling of the court the plaintiff then and there duly excepted.)

A. It might have taken a day and one half. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 11th, the day of the accident, the pile was solid. About 11 o'clock that night I went by there and I saw some joists scattered, but I did not know that anything had happened. I just thought the boys had been playing. The fence is 7 feet high exactly, and the lumber was piled within 6 inches of the top of it. After the accident happened the braces were still under the pile.

Cross-examination by Mr. Rosenthal:

The lumber had been there possibly a day and a quarter. I am not positive whether it was put there on the same day or not, but it was put there on the 10th or 11th, which was Wednesday or Thursday. There had been some lumber out there about six or seven days before. On the 11th of February, 1909, I had timber piled on the Leffngwell side of this property. They were there off and on for quite a number of years. This lumber was piled about 5 foot wide at the bottom, graduating up to the top so that it was narrower on the top than it was on the bottom. There were different sizes, 2x6, 2x8, 2x10. It was timber of different dimensions and we did not pull all of the 2x8 together, nor the 2x6, nor the 2x10. We piled across, one on top of the other, straight from the fence out.

Q. Explain how the lumber was piled 12 or 15 inches narrower at the top than at the bottom, and still have one of these planks lay right on top of the other, as you indicated.

A. Well, it consisted of various widths, 2x6, 2x8, 2x10. If the pile had consisted of only 2x10's, it would naturally mean that the front of the pile would have remained straight, and we would have got as many tiers on the top as we get on the bottom; but by having different widths we incline those piles in from 12 to 15 inches by putting 2x8's, 2x6's, and 2x10's together crossways.

Q. Well, I understood you to say you just took the lumber and unloaded it without any regard to the size, and placed it together?

A. Well, because the pile was going to be moved to the inside of the lot in a few days. That's the reason it was piled so as not to keep it separate. There had been some lumber piled there about six or eight days before. There were no ties or crosspieces or braces between the planks of the pile. There wasn't anything to warn anybody away from the pile or that there was any danger. The lumber was about 12½ feet long. The front tier was practically the same as a pair of stairs, leaning towards the fence from the bottom to the top, 12 or 15 inches. We didn't make any tiers. The back was close against the fence, and the bottom of the pile was close against the fence. The fence is about 4 inches out of plumb.

Redirect examination by Mr. Muench:

The last lumber was piled there on the morning of the 10th, or before 10 o'clock on the morning of the 11th of February. The 2x10's were the last piled on the pile. There has never been any pavement along the west side of that fence along the lot.

We have underscored all the evidence upon which one theory of the given instruction supra was predicated. This testimony is flatly contradicted both as to the manner in which the lumber was piled up, as well as to the length of time it had been there. This sufficiently outlines the additional facts for a discussion of these two instructions.

It will be noticed that the instruction given by the court precludes the right of the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

plaintiff to recover, unless the jury found that the pile of lumber had been in the street "for an unreasonable length of time." In other words, the instruction seems to be predicated on the idea that the Riechers had the lawful right to obstruct this street for a reasonable length of time, and they and the city only became liable for the obstruction after it had remained there more than a reasonable length of time. Under the facts of this case this instruction is vicious. Under certain circumstances abutting property owners have the right to reasonably obstruct a street in the conduct of their business, and of this class of cases the case of Gerdes v. Christopher & S. Architectural Iron & Foundry Co. 124 Mo. loc. cit. 353, 25 S. W. 557, 27 S. W. 617 et seq., states the very limit of the rule. In that case it is said: "The general rule which has been repeatedly declared by this court is that municipal corporations are bound to keep their streets and highways in a proper state of repair and free from obstructions so that they will be reasonably safe for travel; and if, having notice of defects or obstructions, they neglect to repair or remove them, they will be liable for all injuries, provided that he who received the injury was himself at the time in the exercise of due care. Smith v. St. Joseph, 45 Mo. 449; Flynn v. Neosho, 114 Mo. 572, 21 S. W. 903, and cases cited. There is a well-recognized qualification to this strict rule which is declared by Judge Dillon in this language: 'But it is not every obstruction, irrespective of its character or purpose, that is illegal, even although not sanctioned by any express legislative or municipal authority. On the contrary, the right of the public to the free and unobstructed use of a street or way is subject to reasonable and necessary limitations and restrictions. The carriage and delivery of fuel, grain, goods, etc., are legitimate uses of a street, and may result in a temporary obstruction to the right of public transit. . . .

Temporary obstructions of this kind are not invasions of the public easement, but simply incidents to or limitations of it. They can be justified when, and only so long as they are, reasonably necessary. There need be no absolute necessity; it suffices that the necessity is a reasonable one.' 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 730, and cases cited: Stephens v. Macon, 83 Mo. 346; Welsh v. Wilson, 101 N. Y. 256, 54 Am. Rep. 698, 4 N. E. 633. There can be no doubt, under this obviously just qualification, that the manufacturing company had the right to make reasonable use of these streets for the deposit of their manufactured goods, for the purpose of loading and unloading them, though not directly authorized by an ordinance of the city. But it had no right to make a permanent use of the streets for storing its property, or to make such temporary use as would unreasonably interfere with travel. The reasonableness of the use should be measured by the character of the articles to be handled." Other cases are cited by the respondents, but this case sufficiently illustrates the doctrine under which they attempt to sustain this instruction. The trouble is not with the doctrine of a reasonable temporary use of streets by abutting property owners, but in the case at bar the facts do not bring the use within the spirit of the rule. This doctrine of a reasonable temporary obstruction of public streets by abutting property owners has its origin in the law of necessity. In loading and unloading manufactured articles from a factory, a reasonable temporary obstruction of the public street may be necessary, but such obstruction must be both reasonable in kind and temporary in character. Building new buildings and repairing old ones may of necessity require their reasonable and temporary obstruction of streets. And it might be added that the reasonableness of the obstruction, as well as its temporary character, may vary with the facts of each case, and both may be questions for a jury. But under the facts in this case this pile of lumber was an unauthorized obstruction in a public street, and neither its reasonableness, nor its character as to being temporary or otherwise, were questions for the jury, and therein this instruction was error.

We have set out this evidence at length. It shows: (1) That Riechers & Son used the abutting property as a storage place for old building material; (2) that their storage room was full to overflowing, and for that reason they used a public street as a storage room; and (3) that they proposed to so use such street as a storage room for the conduct of their business until such time as the congested condition within their yards was relieved. This testimony does not show a temporary use within the rule established by the cases upon which the defendants rely. Had they shown that the lumber was temporarily thrown in the street at the gateway of their yard, until such time as it could be carried in and then stored, we might have a different question. If a merchant receives a carload of plows, and makes a reasonable use of the sidewalk until such time as, by the use of due diligence (and the situation demanded the use of the sidewalk), he could have them taken away and placed in his storage room or yard, such use might be said to fall within the rule stated in the Gerdes Case, supra; but, if such merchant deliberately stored his carload of plows upon the sidewalk until such time as, in the course of his business, he could reduce his stock, so as to have room to store them upon his own premises, such case would not fall within the rule of a reasonable temporary use. Whilst such a use might not last long, yet the facts would make it in law a permanent and unlawful use. The case at bar falls within this latter class. Under defendants' testimony this lumber was being stored there until such time as they could use sufficient material from within to leave a place for its storage at this later date. Such an obstruction to a public highway is neither reasonable nor temporary, and should be so declared as a matter of law. This modified instruction given by the court does not declare the law under the facts of this case, and for this error, the judgment nisi must be reversed and the cause remanded.

II. Going now to the instruction asked by the plaintiff, supra, it must be said that it, too, is not without some fault. With the view we have expressed in paragraph I, notice to the Riechers was not required. They were the authors of an unauthorized obstruction, and an obstruction dangerous (under plaintiff's evidence) to children who might be lawfully using the street whilst at play. But the city of St. Louis is a defendant, and notice to it was essential to its liability. In this instruction is the clause "and that they allowed it to remain there for about three days," and it may be that this would make the instruction misleading. It might be construed that the court was saying that "about three days" was in law the reasonable notice to which the city was entitled before liability would attach. The clause is awkwardly used, and in redrafting it can be left out or changed as herein suggested. Otherwise this instruction properly declares the law.

III. Instruction No. 5 for the defendants is erroneous for the same reasons given in our paragraph I, and perhaps for others. In fact, there are numerous errors throughout the long list of instructions, but they mostly arise from the erroneous view taken by the trial court, as disclosed in our paragraph I, and for that reason need not be noticed in detail. The plaintiff's evidence is such as to justify the submission of his case both as to the city and the two individual defendants, and under proper instructions the jury may take a different view of the matter.

Let the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded, to be tried according to the views herein expressed.

All concur.

COURT.

GEORGE W. GARLAND, Admr., etc., of Frank W. Garland, Deceased.

v.

BOSTON & MAINE RAILROAD.

(76 N. H. 556, 86 Atl. 141.)

Carriers — trespasser on engine — collision — liability for injury.

One riding on the engine of a train under circumstances such that his presence there could not reasonably be anticipated by the employees or officers of the road other than those in charge of the engine cannot hold the railroad company liable for injuries received through a head-on collision due to unintentional acts of those in charge of another train, although permitting the collision may have been negligent towards passengers on the train on which he was riding, since they owed him no duty, and therefore were not negligent toward him.

(February 4, 1913.)

Note. — May one recover for injuries which would have been avoided by performance of defendant's duty toward another.

As was stated in GARLAND v. BOSTON & M. R. Co., the authorities in this country are substantially unanimous to the effect that in actions for failure to use ordinary care a duty toward the complaining party must be shown to exist. That the reason for the imposition of the duty has been found in the relation of the parties, and while the detailed process of reasoning by which the conclusion is reached is not frequently stated, an examination of the cases generally shows that this is the test which has been applied. To permit one to recover because of a duty owed to another would set at naught this elementary rule which is the basis of liability in all negligent actions. The rule is one that underlies nearly all questions of negligence, and is reflected in the numberless questions that come before the court as to the duty owed by one party to the other.

Two cases, Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 117 N. C. 616, 30 L.R.A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611, 25 S. E. 264, and Carney v. Concord Street R. Co. 72 N. H. 364, 57 Atl. 218, seem to have rendered decisions in conflict with the general rule. These cases have been sufficiently explained in the principal case, by showing that the decision in the Pickett Case depends upon a rule peculiar to that jurisdiction, and in the Carney Case by showing that so as far as it is in conflict with the general rule it has, in effect, been overruled by later cases in the same jurisdiction. See also comment on the Pickett Case in note in 55 L.R.A. 420.

As was said in Akers v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 58 Minn. 540, 60 N. W. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

TRANSFER by the Superior Court for Strafford County for the opinion of the Supreme Court upon exception by plaintiff after the granting of defendant's motion for nonsuit in an action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Overruled.

Messrs. Robert Doe, Leslie P. Snow, and Kivel & Hughes, for defendant:

Plaintiff cannot recover, since defendant owed him no duty and was not negligent toward him.

669, in holding that the statutory duty to block frogs in railroad yards was not a duty due to a mere trespasser: "Actionable negligence is the failure to discharge a legal duty to the person injured. If there is no duty, there is no negligence. Even if a defendant owes a duty to someone else, but does not owe it to the person injured, no action will lie. The duty must be due to the person injured. These principles are elementary, and are equally applicable whether the duty is imposed by positive statute or is founded on general common-law principles. And the principle is the same whether the statute expressly declares that a person shall be liable for any damage sustained by reason of its breach, or merely imposes the duty, with a penalty for its nonperformance. A violation of a statutory duty can be made the foundation of an action only by a person belonging to the class intended to be protected by such regulation, and all statutes requiring the owner or occupant of premises to adopt certain precautions to render them safe are designed for the protection, not of the wrongdoers or trespassers, but of those who are rightfully upon them. Hence it is held universally, except perhaps in Tennessee, that in case of noncompliance with such a statute the injured person, in order to recover, must have been rightfully in the place, and free from contributory negligence. Such statutes were never designed to abrogate the ordinary rules that, to recover, the neglected duty must have been due to the party injured, and that he himself must have been free from contributory negligence."

And in Feeback v. Missouri P. R. Co. 167 Mo. 206, 66 S. W. 965, an action to recover damages for death of a trespasser on a freight train who was killed in a wreck caused by a collision, in holding that there could be no recovery, the court said: "How can it be said, therefore, that the careless engineer of the south-bound train neglected any duty he owed to this man when he had no knowledge of, or reason to apprehend, his presence? It is argued by the learned counsel that the engineer knew that those trains habitually carried passengers, and therefore he ought to have apprehended that passengers were on this train, and his conduct was a reckless disregard of his duty in that respect. But disregard of a duty owing to passengers gives no cause of action to one who was not a passenger. . . . However careless the conduct of the engineer of the south-bound train may be considered, it cannot be adjudged to have been a violation of any duty the defendant owed the plaintiff's husband, and therefore it was not negligence for which the defendant is liable in this suit."

And also in Dalton v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 97, 56 S. W. 657, an action to recover for the death in collision of one who was on a freight train by mere sufferance of the defendant's servants, it was contended that notwithstanding he was on the train by sufferance only, he might recover because of the gross negligence of the company's servants in allowing the two trains to collide; but it was held that the company owed no duty to carry him safely, as he took the risk of the journey when he rode upon the freight train in this way; that the only obligation the company owed to him was not to injure him after knowledge of his danger.

In Talkington v. Washington Veneer Co. 61 Wash. 137, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1061, 112 Pac. 261, it appeared that a boy who had been doing gymnastic stunts on a shaft was injured upon the starting up of the shaft, and it was held that, though the shaft was not protected, inasmuch as the

Peaslee, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's decedent, Garland, was killed in a head-on collision between two trains owned and operated by the defendant. Garland was riding in the engine cab on the up train, and his presence was not known to the defendant's servants, other than the enginemen on that train. There was no claim that these men were negligent; the charge being that the collision was caused by the fault of the men operating the down train, or of those ordering the movement of trains. It was admitted that Garland was a trespasser, and that there was no reason to anticipate his presence in the cab. There is no serious dispute as to the sufficiency of the evidence, and the substantial question in the case is one of law.

May one recover for an injury inflicted upon him through the defendant's failure to use reasonable care toward a third person? It is urged that such liability ought injury did not occur during a performance of any duties, the defendant was not liable because of a violation of the statute in failing to provide proper protection, the court stating that such statute was only for the protection of employees while in the performance of duties. But the writer of the opinion stated that, speaking for himself only, he thought that if at times, as the evidence of one witness indicated, employees, while in the performance of their duties, might come in contact with the shaft, it was the employer's duty to safeguard it, and that had the employer not been negligent in failing to discharge this duty, the accident could not have occurred, and the injured party or minor employee of tender years, who should have been instructed, warned, and protected against such dangers, would not have been injured. As this is a mere obiter statement in expressing his dissent to the majority court, it is of practically no value as a precedent.

As intimated in the opinion in GARLAND v. BOSTON & M. R. Co., while one person cannot recover because of a breach of duty owed to another, the fact that a duty is owed to one class of persons may be an argument or reason for the extension of a similar duty to another class of persons, who would perhaps not otherwise be so entitled. For example, the fact that a railroad company owes a duty to its passengers to keep a lookout for objects on the track that may endanger the safety of the train may serve in a measure to mitigate the hardship upon that railroad company of holding that it owes a similar duty to persons on the track. That, however, is not equivalent to a holding that such a person may recover because of a breach of duty that was owed not to him, but to the passengers.

to exist, because the rule imposes on the defendant no added burden of conduct, because he is admitted to be in the wrong, and when acting wrongfully he should be held responsible for all the consequences of such conduct.

The law governing actions for negligence has for its foundation the rule of reasonable conduct. However much this rule has been infringed upon in certain lines of decisions as to the law of master and servant, it has been adhered to and applied as to other relations. The underlying reason for decisions that liability did not exist has not always been stated. The usual formula is that under these circumstances, or as to this plaintiff, the defendant owed no duty. But this dogmatic statement gives no answer to the arguments now advanced on behalf of the plaintiff.

The conclusion that there was no duty must be preceded by one that there was no unreasonable act or omission. Unless it has this foundation, it has no place in the law of negligence. The general rule is more fully stated as due care under all the circumstances of the particular case. That is, the standard is a relative one. It is not a fixed measure for action or inaction, applicable independent of the surrounding facts of time, place, and the like. "Nothing would follow from the act except for the environment. All acts, apart from their surrounding circumstances, are indifferent to the law." Holmes, Com. L. 54.

The rule of reasonable care necessarily includes two persons, or one person and some right or property of another. It has to do with one's acts in reference to the person, property, or rights of another. It is a rule of relation. If there be no relation, there is nothing upon which the rule can operate. The rule of reasonable care, under the circumstances, could not limit the conduct of Robinson Crusoe as he was first situated; but as soon as he saw the tracks in the sand the rule began to have vitality. He then had notice that there might be other persons on the island; and this knowledge of their presence made it his duty as a reasonable man to use reasonable care to the end that no act of his should injure them.

Unless and until one is brought into relation with other men or property or rights, he has no obligation to act with reference to them; and this is true whether the obligation be called legal, moral, or reasonable. "Most of the rights of property, as well as of person, in the social state, are not absolute, but relative." Losee v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 485, 10 Am. Rep. 623; Brown v. Collins, 53 N. H. 442, 448, 16 Am. Rep. 372. The relation may be to a single person, as where two travelers meet unexpectedly in the desert; it may be to a class; or it may be to the public generally.

It has usually been held that facts which create a relation, and therefore a duty, as to one, do not establish the same obligation to all mankind. To be within the right created, the complaining party must show facts which make the reason for claiming a relation applicable to him. The proposed rule is an abandonment of this idea, and seeks to make the obligation to use care, which springs from the relationship, a duty owed to everybody who, by chance, comes within range of the influence of the act complained of. The argument is that, since the act is one the defendant should have refrained from doing, it is just that he be responsible for all its consequences. But this is a partial view of the situation only. The act is not wrongful in itself. Its wrongfulness is found in its probable effect upon others who are in some relation to the actor. Remove these related parties from the situation, and the act is entirely lawful. As to unrelated parties, the happening is a pure accident.

When it is said that one has been guilty of the negligence denounced by the law, a fault in personal morality is not necessarily implied. The standard by which he is judged is not internal, but external. An outward criterion for legal culpability has been set up. Moral consideration undoubtedly entered into the establishment of the legal standard, but they form no part of the test to be applied. "If the external phenomena, the manifest acts and omissions, are such as it requires, it is wholly indifferent to the internal phenomena of conscience." Holmes, Com. L. 110; Jewell v. Colby, 66 N. H. 399, 24 Atl. 902. The defendant's liability being equally great whether he is or is not morally at fault, the argument that his liability should be enlarged, because he has been guilty of a moral wrong, has no application.

The ordinary act of negligence has in it no element of moral turpitude. There need be no purpose to commit a wrong as to anyone, nor a conscious remissness in legal duty. When such a purpose or consciousness exists, there is an added reason for holding the wrongdoer responsible for all the consequences of his act. It is this idea which is at the foundation of the law in many jurisdictions, imposing liability in a case like this when the fault was wanton or wilful, or what is sometimes called "grossly negligent."

If, in the case of purely unintentional injuries, the relation is not necessary to the existence of the duty,—if the duty exists as to all men, because a relation makes it reasonable to impose it as to one man,—it follows that the law as to duty to trespassers has been wrongly stated. Hobbs v. George W. Blanchard & Sons Co. 75 N. H. 73, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 93, 70 Atl. 1082. The same thing is true of the law as to statutory signals (Blatchelder v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 N. H. 528, 57 Atl. 926) and other safeguards. Hill v. Concord & M. R. Co. 67 N. H. 449, 32 Atl. 766; Casista v. Boston & M. R. Co. 69 N. H. 649, 45 Atl. 712; Flint v. Boston & M. R. Co. 73 N. H. 141, 59 Atl. 938. "It must appear, to render the defendants liable, that the action or omission to act, of which complaint is made, constituted a breach of a duty owed the plaintiff by the defendants." McGill v. Maine & N. H. Granite Co. 70 N. H. 125, 127, 85 Am. St. Rep. 618, 46 Atl. 684; Hughes v. Boston & M. R. Co. 71 N. H. 279, 93 Am. St. Rep. 518, 51 Atl. 1070.

This heretofore recognized rule of law or of conduct was adopted, and has been maintained and approved, because of its inherent reasonableness. Undoubtedly, some reason can be advanced why the liability should be more extensive. But this is true of nearly all rules by which human conduct and responsibility are governed. A rule is not unreasonable because some men would not naturally act according to its admonition; nor is one shown to be reasonable because a small portion of the people believe it to be so.

The authorities in this country are substantially unanimous to the effect that, in actions for failure to use ordinary care, a duty toward the complaining party must be shown to exist. The reason for the imposition of the duty has been found in the relation of the parties. While the detailed process of reasoning by which the conclusion is reached is not frequently stated, an examination of the cases generally shows that this is the test which has been applied. If there is no relationship, there is no duty. But in this case reliance is placed upon Carney v. Concord Street R. Co. 72 N. H. 364, 57 Atl. 218, to show that the rule is otherwise. It is there said that fault as to a trespasser may be predicated upon a failure to keep a lookout for persons rightfully upon the track. The case cited and relied upon in that opinion (Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 117 N. C. 616, 30 L.R.A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611, 23 S. E. 264) depends upon the rule, peculiar to that jurisdiction (Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 728, 25 L.R.A. 287, 19 S. E. 863, 923), that as to everybody it is the duty of a railroad to keep a lookout ahead of its moving trains. This is an application (though in modified form and to one situation only), of the rule laid down in many 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

ancient English authorities, that the actor is liable for all the consequences of his act. The rule had been largely abandoned in England, but was revised as to certain so-called dangerous agencies by the decision in Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, 12 Jur. N. S. 603, 14 Week. Rep. 799, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, 37 L. J. Exch. N. S. 161, 19 L. T. N. S. 220, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 235, 6 Mor. Min. Rep. 129. The whole theory is contrary to the general trend of American authority, and has been repudiated in this state because it "pays no heed to the essential elements of actual fault." Brown v. Collins, 53 N. H. 442, 448, 16 Am. Rep. 372; Moore v. Berlin Mills Co. 74 N. H. 305, 307, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 284, 124 Am. St. Rep. 968, 67 Atl. 578, 13 Ann. Cas. 217.

That the rule in the Pickett Case does not go beyond this is made evident in the later decisions in the same jurisdiction. In Peterson v. South & W. R. Co. 143 N. C. 260, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1240, 118 Am. St. Rep. 799, 55 S. E. 618, the right of a mere licensee on a train to recover for failure to start the train with the care due to passengers thereon is denied, because the duty was not owed to the licensee. In the Pickett Case the fact there was a duty to look out for some people was urged as one reason why the duty should exist as to all. Because of this, of the great danger incident to the movement of trains, it was held that the duty to look is owed to all who chance to be in a position to be injured, when there is a failure to look. This being settled, the rest follows as a matter of course. Pickett recovered not because of a breach of the duty to look out for others, but because the duty was owed to his decedent. Peterson failed to recover because, although there was a breach of the duty owed to others, the duty did not extend to him, even when he was in a place to be injured exactly as one to whom the duty was owed might have been. See also Arrowood v. South Carolina & G. Extension R. Co. 126 N. C. 629, 36 S. E. 151; Jeffries v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 129 N. C. 236, 39 S. E. 836; Sawyer v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. 145 N. C. 24, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 200, 58 S. E. 598; Snipes v. Camp Mfg. Co. 152 N. C. 42, 67 S. E. 27; Edge v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 153 N. C. 212, 69 S. E. 74.

The reasoning in the Carney Case is not along the line of the Pickett Case, but is directly in favor of the plaintiff's contention in the case at bar. If all that was said in the Carney Case were sound law, it would follow that this plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury. The opinion involves a general principle in the law of negligence. It adopts the theory that neglect of duty is sufficient cause for complaint, without considering who the complaining party is, or to whom the duty was primarily owed.

In Hobbs v. George W. Blanchard & Sons Co. 75 N. H. 73, 78, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 939, 70 Atl. 1082, it is erroneously stated that the Carney Case is not an authority when the complaint is merely as to the condition of premises. But the theory upon which the Carney Case was decided is equally applicable in either class of cases. If, in the one case, it is enough to put the defendant in the wrong to show that his neglect of his duty to somebody had a part in causing injury to another, it must be equally so in all cases. The fundamental idea being that since he has failed to act as the law requires of him he is responsible for all the results flowing from his act, it can make no difference in principle whether that failure consists in carelessly obstructing a way by a fallen tree or by a moving train.

It is apparent that the rule in the Carney Case was a wide departure from the principles theretofore announced in this jurisdiction, and generally recognized elsewhere. The point is treated but briefly in the opinion, and nothing is said of the conflict thereby engendered. The later cases have been disposed of as though the rule theretofore applied was the law. Acts are or are not negligent, as to a person who is injured, according to whether he does or does not establish the relation between himself and the defendant because of which the duty arises or is imposed. Chickering v. Thompson, 76 N. H. 311, 82 Atl. 839; Lydston v. Rockingham County Light & P. Co. 75 N. H. 23, 70 Atl. 385, 21 Ann. Cas. 1236; Brown v. Boston & M. R. Co. 73 N. H. 568, 64 Atl. 194; Flint v. Boston & M. R. Co. 73 N. H. 141, 59 Atl. 938. So far as the Carney Case is in conflict with this principle, it has in effect been overruled by these cases.

The case of McDonald v. Snelling, 14 Allen, 290, 92 Am. Dec. 741, which is also relied upon by the plaintiff, does not conflict with the view here expressed. It states the general rule as commonly applied. The defendant is responsible for all the consequences of his act to those whom he ought reasonably to have foreseen might be injured thereby. He is not liable to those who reasonable men would not have anticipated might be injured.

The rule of reasonable conduct is constantly invoked to fix responsibility upon defendants. Nonliability should be settled by the same test. The plaintiff must be in a position to say to the defendant: "You did not act as you should have acted towards me; you knew, or ought to have 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

known, it was likely that I would be in a position to be injuriously affected by your carelessness." No such situation appeared in this case. So far as the actors upon whom fault is here charged are concerned, Garland's presence was unknown, and not to be anticipated. They were not required to foresee his chance or casual trespass upon the engine of the up train. Shea v. Concord & M. R. Co. 69 N. H. 361, 41 Atl. 774; Myers v. Boston & M. R. Co. 72 N. H. 175, 55 Atl. 892, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 119.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,

Resp'ts.,

v.

WILLIAM LINGLEY, Alias Harry Miller, alias "Big Bill," Appt.

(207 N. Y. 396, 101 N. E. 170.)

Evidence — weight — inability of witness to identify accused.

1. The inability of one of three witnesses present at about the time of the commission of a crime to identify accused as the person who was seen at the place where it was committed, and who the evidence tends to show did the deed, is not significant as against his explicit identification by the other two, and his own voluntary confession of guilt.

Trial — construction — presumption of character.

2. An accused in a criminal case who offers no evidence as to his good character is not entitled to have the jury instructed that the law presumes that it is good.

(February 25, 1913.)

Note. — Presumption as to good character of defendant in criminal case.

It is not infrequently said by the courts that there is a presumption that the character of the defendant in a criminal case is good. Bennett v. State, 86 Ga. 401, 12 L.R.A. 449, 22 Am. St. Rep. 465, 12 S. E. 806; Cluck v. State, 40 Ind. 263 (but see Knight v. State, infra); Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 124, 19 Am. Rep. 673; Howard v. Com. 114 Ky. 372, 70 S. W. 1055; Biester v. State, 65 Neb. 276, 91 N. W. 416; Brown v. State, 32 Ohio C. C. 93; Hays v. Territory, — Okla. —, 52 Pac. 950; United States v. Neverson, 1 Mackey, 152; McKnight v. United States, 38 C. C. A. 115, 97 Fed. 208; Mullen v. United States, 46 C. C. A. 22, 106 Fed. 892; Lowdon v. United States, 79 C. C. A. 361, 149 Fed. 673; United States v. Guthrie, 171 Fed. 528.

When, however, the connection in which the declaration was made in these cases—

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of General Sessions for New York County, convicting him of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James D. McClelland and Charles Sullivan for appellant.

Mr. Robert C. Taylor, with Mr. Charles S. Whitman for respondents.

Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The victim of the homicide of which the appellant has been found guilty was one Patrick Burns, the keeper of a liquor saloon in the borough of the Bronx, who was shot to death in his barroom in the nighttime of February 10-11, 1912. Two strangers, a large man and a small man, visited the saloon for purposes of robbery; and while engaged in the commission of that crime, in which both actively participated, one of them killed Burns. No evidence was introduced in behalf of the defense; and the proof for the people amply justified the jury in finding that the perpetrators of the robbery were guilty of murder in the first degree on the ground that while engaged in committing or attempting to commit a felony, they had killed a human being.

It was essential to the people's case, of course, to identify the defendant as one of the two strangers; and the principal point made in his behalf on this appeal, so far as the facts are concerned, is that the identification was insufficient to support the ver-shown in the subsequent parts of the note, where they are set out—is considered, it appears that, with the exception of Mullen v. United States, 46 C. C. A. 22, 106 Fed. 892, holding that the defendant is entitled to an instruction that his character is presumed to be good, no practical effect was given to the declaration, and it was at most a mere abstract proposition which served no practical purpose that could not have been equally well served by a declaration that there is no presumption that the character of the defendant is bad. As stated in the Mullen Case, if the presumption exists in favor of the accused, it cannot be available to him unless he can have an instruction advising the jury thereof. The true view seems to be that there is no presumption that the defendant's character is good or that it is bad, his character not being an issue in the case unless and until he introduces evidence in support of it, and the prosecution introduces rebutting evidence; in which case the issue is to be determined upon the evidence without the aid of any presumption as to character.

This view gives defendant full benefit of the presumption of innocence and every other safeguard belonging to the accused whereby he is protected against prejudice resulting from the accusation, since it permits no unfavorable deduction to be made from the failure to offer testimony. As pointed out in Wigmore on Evidence, § 290, note 2, cited in PEOPLE v. LINGLEY, it would be illogical to presume the defendant's character good, since to do so would be to give him the benefit of evidence that he could probably not have produced, and that without the risk of the counter evidence by the prosecution. Under such a view a defendant would always be in a better position to rely on the presumption than to offer evidence.

This view is expressly sustained by many of the cases, and, as above intimated, with a very few exceptions the cases that appear to be opposed to it may, considered from a practical point of view, at least, be reconciled with it.

Right of accused to an instruction that his character is good—where character has not been put in issue by the evidence.

In accord with PEOPLE v. LINGLEY, it is held in the following cases that there is no presumption at all as to whether the character of one accused of crime is good or bad, and that therefore an instruction as to the presumption of his good character is properly denied where no evidence has been offered on the subject. Danner v. State, 54 Ala. 127, 25 Am. Rep. 662; Little v. State, 58 Ala. 265; Dryman v. State, 102 Ala. 130, 15 So. 433; Gater v. State, 141 Ala. 10, 37 So. 692; Griffin v. State, 165 Ala. 29, 50 So. 962; Fields v. United States, 27 App. D. C. 433, certiorari refused without discussion on this point in 205 U. S. 292, 51 L. ed. 807, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 543; McDuffee v. State, 55 Fla. 125, 46 So. 721; Addison v. People, 193 Ill. 405, 62 N. E. 235; People v. Kemmis, 153 Mich. 117, 116 N. W. 554.

In Danner v. State, 54 Ala. 127, 25 Am. Rep. 662, it was said: "While it is true that the law presumes everyone to be innocent until the contrary appears by evidence, it does not presume everyone to have a good character. It presumes nothing in respect to a defendant's general reputation. In the absence of all proof on the subject, his character is not to be taken as either good or bad; and the jury are not authorized, by assuming that it is one or the other, to let it have weight in inclining them toward either his acquittal or his conviction. In such a case, their verdict should be founded entirely on the evidence legally introduced, and not on any idea unsupported by direct testimony concerning his general character."

And in McDuffee v. State, 55 Fla. 125, 46 So. 721, it was said in this connection: "It would be wholly illogical to say that the defense may, by keeping silent, obtain the benefits that come from good character. and yet by that same silence prevent the prosecution inquiring into it. There are authorities, especially Federal cases, holding the converse; but we think the true dict. I think otherwise. The bartender, who was present on the occasion of the robbery and shooting, testified positively that the larger of the two strangers was the defendant. He was also emphatically identified by an employee of the Edison Electric Company, who saw the two strangers on the premises and left them there a short time before the homicide occurred. It is true that a companion of this witness, who was there and went out with him, was not able to say positively whether either of the two strangers whom he saw and left in the saloon was present in court at the trial; but his inability thus to identify the defendant is not very significant as against the explicit identification by the other witnesses who have been mentioned, and the strong confirmation afforded by the voluntary confessions of the defendant himself. The settled principles which regulate the exercise of our jurisdiction to review the facts on an appeal from a judgment of death forbid us from interfering with this verdict on the ground that it was against the evidence or the weight of evidence, or without sufficient support in the evidence.

There is only one question of law in the case which requires notice, and that arises on an exception to the refusal of the learned trial judge to charge the following request: "Mr. McClelland [counsel for defendant]: I ask your honor to charge that the law presumes the character of the defendant is good." If this request embodies a correct statement of the law, it might well be urged rule is that laid down in State v. O'Neal, 29 N. C. (7 Ired. L.) 251, that 'no deduction results in law unfavorable or favorable to the character of an individual charged by an indictment, from the fact that he has introduced no evidence to show he is a person of good character. The character, not appearing either good or bad, necessarily stands indifferent.'

To the same effect is Addison v. People, 193 Ill. 405, 62 N. E. 235, wherein the court said: "Defendant did not choose to put his reputation in issue or prove that it was good, but sought by the instruction all the benefit of an affirmative finding of such fact, without proof or an opportunity to combat the claim or prove the negative. If the instruction were the law, a defendant need never prove good reputation, but could take the benefit of proof which perhaps he could not make. The court was right in the refusal."

And in Fields v. United States, 27 App. D. C. 433, it was said: "If such an instruction is required to be given when demanded, there would be no occasion to introduce evidence of good character in any case. We are of the opinion, however, that the court is not required to give an instruction on anything that has not been put in issue."

And so in the following cases in which the court apparently recognizes the existence of a presumption of good character in favor of one accused of crime, it is nevertheless held that an instruction to that effect is properly denied where character has not been put in issue by the evidence. People v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 142; People v. Griffith, 146 Cal. 339, 80 Pac. 68; People v. Lee, 1 Cal. App. 169, 81 Pac. 969; People v. Conte, 17 Cal. App. 771, 122 Pac. 450, 457; Mixon v. State, 123 Ga. 581, 107 Am. St. Rep. 149, 51 S. E. 580; State v. Gruber, 19 Idaho, 692, 115 Pac. 1; Howard v. Com. 114 Ky. 372, 70 S. W. 1055; People v. Pekarz, 185 N. Y. 470, 78 N. E. 294; People v. Langley, 114 App. Div. 427, 100 N. Y. Supp. 123; Ackley v. People, 9 Barb. 609; People v. Bodine, 1 Denio, 281 (it should be observed that these New York 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cases are in effect overruled by PEOPLE v. LINGLEY in so far as they recognize the existence of a legal presumption of good character in favor of one accused of crime.

And in State v. Smith, 50 Kan. 69, 31 Pac. 784, it was held that the refusal to instruct the jury as to the good character of accused was not error, where no evidence had been introduced with regard to his character.

It was further held that a request for instruction to the effect that the character of every defendant in a criminal case is conclusively presumed to be good was properly denied as being too strong. Ibid.

In People v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 142, McKinstry, J., said: "If, in the absence of evidence on the subject, the presumption of good character is to weigh as much in his favor as affirmative proof of it, the necessity of proving good character would never arise; and the prosecution would frequently be in a worse case than if evidence of good character had been given, since the prosecution would be debarred from introducing evidence to overcome the presumption."

In People v. Lee, 1 Cal. App. 169, 81 Pac. 969, it was said that the presumption that the accused has a fair character amounts to nothing more than that his character or reputation is not bad; and that if any inference may be drawn from the fact thus presumed, it is contained in the legal presumption of defendant's innocence until evidence to the contrary may appear, and does not justify the assumption that the defendant was of such character as to justify a higher probability of his innocence of the crime than would result from the general presumption of innocence, as this fact can only appear by evidence, which the prosecution will, upon its admission, be allowed to contradict.

In Howard v. Com. 114 Ky. 372, 70 S. W. 1055, it was held that a request for an instruction that the law presumes the accused to be a person of at least ordinarily good character, and that this presumption continues throughout the case, was properly refused, though correctly stated as an abstract proposition of law. The court upon us that the refusal so to instruct the jury was an error seriously prejudicial to the defendant.

In the case of People v. Pekarz, 185 N. Y. 470, 483, 78 N. E. 294, 298, the trial judge was asked to charge that, "in the absence of any testimony on the subject of the character of the defendant, the presumption is that the defendant's character was good, prior to this offense," to which the judge responded: "Oh, there is no evidence against it at all. I have said that to the jury already." Counsel for defendant then explained that he meant that the presumption that the defendant's character was good must be considered by the jury. The court declined to charge further on the subject, and defendant's counsel excepted; but the court added: "There is no presumption against him at all. The presumptions are all in his favor on that head." This court held that there was no error to the prejudice of the defendant, saying that when no evidence had been given on the subject in his behalf, his character was not in issue, and he was not entitled to the instruction that the presumption that his character is good must be considered by the jury." In the Pekarz Case, however, the remark of the trial judge to the effect that the presumptions were all in favor of the defendant on that head, i. e., the subject of good character, was not quite equivalent to the absolute refusal to charge the request in the present case; and, although that decision is to be deemed an authoritative expresdistinguished the Mullen Case upon the ground that the Federal courts follow the English practice as to charging the jury, saying that the judges comment at length upon the testimony, and advise the jury specifically as to the weight and credit which should be given to particular parts of it, and that while it might be eminently proper, under that system of charging the jury, to say to them that the accused was presumed to be a person of at least ordinarily good character, and that this presumption continues throughout the trial of the case, such a procedure is unheard of under the system in that jurisdiction.

In People v. Bodine, 1 Denio. 314, it was said that where no proof of general character is given, the law assumes that it is ordinary fairness and respectability; but under such circumstances the general character of the accused is not a subject to be considered by the jury at all,—that they should determine the guilt or innocence of the accused upon the evidence before them, wholly irrespective of the question of character.

In Davidson v. State, 135 Ind. 254, 34 N. E. 972, the court instructed the jury at the request of the accused that the law presumed his character to be good, until the contrary appeared from the evidence. and that he was under no obligation to prove a good character, but refused to instruct the jury in addition to the above, that the law presumed he had a good character and reputation as a peaceable and humane man, until the contrary was shown by the evidence in the case, and it was held that there was no error in this ruling. The court said: "No evidence was introduced on the trial of the case touching the character of the appellant, and, for that reason, his character formed no element in the case."

But, in Mullen v. United States, 46 C. C. A. 22, 106 Fed. 892, it was held that an accused is entitled to have the jury instructed that his character is presumed to be good though there is no testimony upon the subject. The court, after observing that there were cases that held the contrary, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

said: "But, if the presumption exists in favor of the accused, it cannot be available to him unless he can have an instruction advising the jury of this proposition of law. This presumption, to the extent to which it exists, though less important, is as much his right in a criminal trial as the presumption in favor of innocence. It is in consonance with the general principle of law that a man is presumed to stand ordinarily well, and to have at least the average qualities of morality and good conduct."

In United States v. Guthrie, 171 Fed. 528, the court charged the jury that the accused is presumed to have a good character; that this presumption runs in his favor throughout the case until removed beyond a reasonable doubt; and that he is not required to call any witnesses as to his general good character, and his failure to do so raises no presumption or inference that it was bad. The report contains only the charge of the court, and it does not appear whether any evidence had been offered to support or impeach the character of accused.

In Stephens v. State, 20 Tex. App. 255, it was held that as counsel for the state improperly discussed the character of the defendant, which was not put in issue, the trial court should have given the jury a special charge as to the presumption of good character, in order to prevent, as far as possible, any prejudice to the defendant by reason of the improper remarks.

In Hays v. Territory, — Okla. —, 52 Pac. 950, it was held that while the trial court should not give an instruction on the defendant's character when there is no evidence given to support or impeach it, it is not reversible error to charge that the defendant's character is presumed good until the contrary is proved, and that the defendant's character cannot be attacked until he first introduces evidence in support of it, and that no such evidence has been offered.

In Brown v. State, 32 Ohio C. C. 93, it was held that an instruction which seemed to imply that if accused did not produce sion of opinion upon the question under consideration, it must be conceded that there is highly reputable authority in other jurisdictions to the effect that, in the absence of any evidence on the subject, the law presumes the character of a defendant in a criminal case to be good. As these cases were not brought to our attention in the Pekarz Case, it is due to the defendant to consider them here.

The most carefully considered decision in support of this doctrine is Mullen v. United States, 46 C. C. A. 22, 106 Fed. 892, in the United States circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit in 1901. The plaintiffs in error were indicted for a violation of the election laws of the United States. At the conclusion of the charge their counsel called the attention of the court to an instruction which they had requested to the effect that the defendants were presumed to be persons of good character, and that that presumption prevailed during the progress of the case. To this the court responded: "I do not think that the jury should be told that the defendants are presumed to be persons of good character, but they are presumed, as the court had told the jury, whether of good character or bad character, to be innocent until their guilt has been established to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt by testimony." An exception was taken to this ruling, and before the jury retired the defendants asked for the following further instruction, which was refused: "You are charged that the law presumes the good character of the accused, and such presumption is to be considered as evidence in favor of the accused in considering the question of the guilt or innocence of them or any of them." The defendants excepted to the refusal of the court to charge this request. The circuit court of appeals, consisting of Judges Lurton, Day, and Severns, reversed the judgment and granted a new trial on the ground, among others, that it was error for the trial court to refuse to charge as requested upon the subject of character. The opinion was written by Judge Day, who began by stating that the exceptions "raise the question whether, in a criminal trial in a court of evidence as to his good character and good reputation, he thereby did not claim to be of good character, or to have a good reputation, was prejudicial, for it was said the presumption is in favor of the good character and the good reputation of the accused, and these cannot be attacked until he himself has offered evidence of the same.

—where character has been put in issue by the evidence.

It has been held that even where the character of the accused has been made an issue in the case by the evidence, he is not entitled to an instruction that the law presumes his character to be good.

Thus, in Knight v. State, 70 Ind. 375, where it appeared that evidence had been introduced touching the general character of the accused for peace and quiet, it was objected that the instruction on this evidence failed to tell the jury that the character of the accused for peace and quiet was presumed to be good until the contrary was shown, and in overruling this objection the court said: "In a criminal cause, the defendant's character is not taken into consideration, unless the defendant first introduces evidence in support of it. In that event, the question of character has to be decided upon the evidence, in the same manner as any other question in the cause."

And in McQueen v. State, 82 Ind. 72, it was held that the trial court properly refused an instruction to the effect that, in addition to the evidence upon the subject of character, the law presumes that the character of the defendants for honesty is good. The court said: "Character is to be determined from the evidence pre- 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

sent to the jury. It is a question of fact, depending for its solution upon the evidence. If the defendant offers no testimony upon that subject, then it forms no element of the case; if he does, then it must be determined upon that testimony, considered in connection with all the other evidence in the case."

In United States v. Neverson, 1 Mackey, 152, where the character of the defendants was put in issue by the evidence, the following charge to the jury was apparently approved on appeal: "As to presumption of good character, the prisoners are entitled to the presumption of having sustained good character up to the time of the alleged murder, and this presumption remains in their favor unless the jury shall believe from the evidence that they in fact were not entitled to such reputation;" though there is no discussion on this point.

Miscellaneous cases.

In a number of cases in which the court was not called upon for an instruction, it was said that the law presumes good character in favor of one accused of crime.

Thus, it has been held that as the law presumes the general character of the accused to be good, it is error for the prosecuting attorney to urge in argument the failure of accused to offer evidence of his good character, as furnishing a basis of inference against the general good character of accused, upon the ground that until accused offers evidence of his character, he is entitled to the benefit of the presumption, and to have the jury infer that his character is unimpeached. McKnight v. United States, 38 C. C. A. 115, 97 Fed.

the United States, where no testimony has been offered as to the previous good character of the accused, a presumption of such good character exists in favor of the accused, of which, upon a request to that effect, the jury should be instructed." Circuit Judge Day went on to say that he found no difference of opinion in the well-recognized text writers upon the question whether such a presumption exists. "All assert that a presumption exists in favor of the accused in the absence of testimony, that he had a good character previous to the time of the alleged commission of the offense in question. It is true that the government may not attack the character of the accused until he puts it in issue by affirmative testimony on his part. He is not obliged to do this, but may, if he sees fit, rest upon the presumption raised by the law." The judge then quotes from 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. 4th ed. § 1112, ¶ 2, and from Underhill, Crim. Ev. § 76. The opinion of Judge Day continues as follows: "It is true that there are cases which hold that, where there is no testimony upon the subject, the court is not obliged to say anything to the jury, either one way or the other. But if the presumption exists in favor of the accused, it cannot be available to him unless he can have an instruction advising the jury of this proposition of law. This presumption, to the extent to which it exists, though less important, is as much his right in a criminal trial as the presumption in favor of his innocence. It is in consonance with the general principle of law that a man is presumed to stand ordinarily well, and to have at least the average qualities of morality and good conduct."

The statements of the text writers to which Judge Day referred are as follows: "The doctrine is that the defendant is presumed to be innocent, and his character to be at least of ordinary goodness." 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. 4th ed. § 1112, ¶ 2. "The character of the accused means his reputation; i. e., the general consensus of opinion regarding him, based on his deportment and conduct, which is held by his neighbors, friends, and acquaintances. The accused may always prove his good character. If, 208; Lowdon v. United States, 79 C. C. A. 361, 149 Fed. 673; State v. Upham, 38 Me. 261; Bennett v. State, 86 Ga. 401, 12 L.R.A. 449, 22 Am. St. Rep. 465, 12 S. E. 806.

So, in Cluck v. State, 40 Ind. 263, it was said that the law presumes every man has a good character, and that it is competent for counsel of an accused to comment, in argument, on such presumption, but that counsel have no right to discuss the character of the accused where no evidence has been offered as to such character, as was attempted in that case.

In Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 124, 19 Am. Rep. 673, it was said that the law invests every person accused of crime with a presumption in favor of good character, and that this presumption continues and must be indulged as long as the accused rests upon such presumption; and that the mere fact that the accused becomes a witness in his own behalf does not entitle the state to impeach his general moral character, where he has not put his general character in issue by offering evidence in support of it, though after he has become a witness, the prosecution may show that his reputation for truth and veracity is bad.

And in People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 137, it was held that it was error for the prosecution to impeach the character of the accused before he had directly put his character in issue by the introduction of evidence on the subject, as the accused was entitled to rely upon the presumption of law that his character was of ordinary fairness.

And in People v. Gleason, 122 Cal. 370, 55 Pac. 123, it was said that the law assumes that the accused has a fair character, and where no evidence has been offered as to his character, he has a right to have the jury assume that his character is unimpeached, and that therefore it was error to instruct the jury that the prosecution is not permitted to assail the character of a defendant on trial in a criminal case until the defendant has himself put his character in issue by calling witnesses and offering evidence in its support, as the effect of it was to suggest to the jury that if the prosecution had had an opportunity to do so, they might possibly have shown that the defendant was not a man of good character; that though it was a correct proposition of law by which a court is to be governed in determining the admissibility of evidence, it was not for the guidance of the jury, and being an abstract rule of law that had no application to the evidence before the jury, it tended to confuse and mislead them.

In Biester v. State, 65 Neb. 276, 91 N. W. 416, the question before the court was whether the costs and fees of witnesses summoned to impeach the character of the accused could be taxed against him, especially when the witnesses had not been called upon to testify, as the emergency in which they would be available did not arise. The court said that the character of the accused was not necessarily involved in the issue; it was presumed to be good, but he was not required to rely on the presumption, and was at liberty to establish it by evidence, and such evidence the state had a right to contradict; and it was held that fees for a reasonable number of witnesses could properly be taxed as costs in the case, which the defendant would be compelled to pay.

however, he offers no evidence on this point, the law presumes he has a fair and respectable, if not, indeed, an excellent, character; and does not permit any presumption of guilt to arise from his silence, or from his failure to offer evidence on this point. That his character is bad can never be presumed, nor should the prosecution be permitted to comment unfavorably upon this omission." Underhill, Crim. Ev. § 76.

To these may be added a subrule laid down by Mr. Lawson in his well-known treatise on the Law of Presumptive Evidence, under the general rule that the law presumes the innocence of a person charged with crime until the contrary is proved beyond a reasonable doubt. "And good character is presumed." Lawson, Presumptive Ev. 2d ed. p. 520. The only authority cited by Mr. Lawson in support of this subrule is People v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 142. This was a murder case in which the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that, "where no evidence of the character of the defendant is introduced, his character is presumed to be of ordinary fairness in the traits involved in the crime with which . . . [defendant] is charged, and that it is a fact to be considered by them in arriving at their verdict in connection with all the other facts in the case." Two of the three judges who heard the appeal held that there was no error in refusing to give this instruction because the substantial point covered thereby was fully embraced in other instructions given. The third member of the court, McKinstry, J., however, said: "And the instruction as to character was properly rejected. The prosecution cannot attack the character of a defendant until the defense has introduced evidence to establish his good character. When a defendant charged with a criminal homicide, has been shown to be a quiet and peaceable man, his character is to be considered by the jury in connection with the evidence, and may weigh in the balance so as to create a reasonable doubt of his guilt. If, in the absence of evidence on the subject, the presumption of good character is to weigh as much in his favor as affirmative proof of it, the necessity of proving good character would never arise; and the prosecution would frequently be in a worse case than if evidence of good character had been given, since the prosecution would be debarred from introducing evidence to overcome the presumption." I may remark here in passing that this dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice McKinstry is a correct statement of the law, according to the weight of authority, as I view it.

Another California case to the same effect is People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 137, 149, where it was said in the opinion of the court that 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the law assumes the prisoner to possess a good character—good in the sense of not being bad in cases in which no evidence upon the subject of general character is offered. "The presumption of a character of ordinary fairness, with which the law clothed her [the defendant] for the purposes of the case, was one to the benefit of which she was entitled, and which could not be put in peril unless, discarding the presumption thus afforded her, she had elected to put it distinctly in issue, and so constituted it a fact to be determined by the jury as other facts in issue were to be determined. . . . Until the prisoner thus initiates the inquiry, the prosecution are bound to assume it to be, as the law presumes it, ordinarily fair, and must establish her guilt, if at all, in the face of this presumption, and despite the benefit it affords her."

An obiter dictum in Ackley v. People, 9 Barb. 609, is also sometimes relied upon to support the presumption of good character. In that case it was correctly decided that the failure of the defendant in a criminal case to introduce proof of his good character can never be taken into account against him; but the general term went further and said that "the more recent cases hold that, where no proof of general character is given, the law assumes that it is of ordinary fairness."

On the other hand, we are not without text-book and judicial authority in denial of the doctrine. No recent American law writer has achieved more distinction than Prof. John H. Wigmore of the Northwestern University, whose elaborate treatise on the Law of Evidence is a worthy successor to the classic work of Greenleaf. This learned author expressly denies the correctness of the decision in Mullen v. United States, 46 C. C. A. 22, 106 Fed. 892, to the effect that the good character of the accused is presumed. "This inconsistently gives him the untrammelled benefit of evidence which if he had introduced might have been disputed. What really happens, or ought to, is that the defendant's character is simply a nonexistent quantity in the evidence." 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 290, note. Two cases are cited to sustain this proposition. In Addison v. People, 193 Ill. 405, 419, 62 N. E. 235, 239, which was an indictment for assault with intent to commit rape, the judge was requested to instruct the jury that the law "presumes that the defendant has a good character and reputation as a law-abiding, peaceable citizen until the contrary is shown by the evidence, and it is not necessary for the defendant to prove his reputation in that respect. . . . The jury . . . must presume that he is a man of good character and reputation in that respect,—and that, without any proof on the subject,—and should take the good character of defendant into consideration in making up their verdict.” This instruction was refused, and the supreme court of Illinois held that the trial court was right in the refusal, saying: “Defendant had a right to put his reputation as a law-abiding citizen in issue if he saw fit. In such a case it would be a proper subject for evidence on each side. . . . Defendant did not choose to put his reputation in issue or prove that it was good, but sought by the instruction all the benefit of an affirmative finding of such fact without proof or an opportunity to combat the claim or prove the negative. If the instruction were the law, a defendant need never prove good reputation, but could take the benefit of proof which perhaps he could not make.” In Knight v. State, 70 Ind. 375, which was a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, complaint was made by the appellant of the failure of the trial court to tell the jury that the character of the defendant for peace and quiet was presumed to be good until the contrary was shown. As to this, the supreme court of Indiana said: “In a criminal cause the defendant’s character is not taken into consideration unless the defendant first introduces evidence in support of it. In that event the question of character has to be decided upon the evidence, in the same manner as any other question in the cause.” It was accordingly held that there was no error in omitting to give the instruction asked.

Most of the text writers and judges who have asserted the existence of the presumption of good character in favor of the accused have contented themselves with a dogmatic declaration that such is the law. Where it is attempted to support the proposition by argument, the theory usually advanced is that the alleged presumption forms a part of the presumption of innocence and is necessarily involved therein. That this cannot be so is manifest when we consider the contention in the light of the universally recognized rule that the prosecution may never introduce evidence assailing the general character of the accused unless he has first offered proof that his general character is good. People v. Hinkman, 192 N. Y. 421, 85 N. E. 676. The presumption of innocence in behalf of the defendant in a criminal case is always open to attack on the part of the prosecution. Indeed, throughout the trial, the case for the prosecution is aimed at the destruction of that presumption, directly or indirectly. If the presumption of a good character were a part of the presumption of innocence, the prosecution would be at liberty to assail that presumption also, irrespective of the introduction of any evidence on the subject by the defendant; yet this the prosecution is not permitted to do anywhere. The rule “firmly and universally established in policy and tradition is that the prosecution may not initially attack the defendant’s character.” 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 57.

This prohibition against any attempt to blacken the general character of the accused unless he opens the door by seeking to establish the excellence of that character is tantamount to a rule that the general character of the defendant in a criminal case, although relevant, may not be made an issue unless the defendant chooses to make it so. If, in addition to this adequate protection against the possibility of undue prejudice, the defendant is also shielded by an unassailable presumption of general good character, the prosecution may be placed in a position of unwarrantable disadvantage. The defendant in every criminal trial will be entitled to have the jury instructed that the law presumes his general character to be good; while the prosecution cannot appeal to any evidence to overcome this presumption if the defendant has introduced none to support it. In other words, the accused may always have the benefit of a very influential presumption which he can invariably prevent the prosecution from rebutting at his own will. To hold that this alleged presumption of general good character exists would be to give an unfair advantage to the defendant, uncalled for by any considerations of justice or even extreme solicitude on account of the difficulties which sometimes beset an accused person in establishing his defense.

The true doctrine, as it seems to me, is that there is no presumption, one way or the other, upon the question whether the general character of the accused is good or bad. As is well said by Prof. Wigmore, supra, “the defendant’s character is simply a non-existent quantity in the evidence.” While nothing is to be taken against the defendant by reason of the nonintroduction of evidence on his part to establish his good character, there is no rule, such as the presumption contended for would create, which compels the jury to conclude that his character is good in the absence of any proof on the subject. Under such circumstances the law does not presume anything about it.

I think that in accordance with the views expressed in the case of People v. Pekarz, 185 N. Y. 470, 483, 78 N. E. 294, 298, the learned trial judge properly refused to give the instruction prayed for to the effect that the law presumed the character of the defendant to be good. There is no other question in the case demanding discussion, and I therefore advise an affirmance of the judgment.

Callahan is sued for the negligent and careless acts of Wheeler in cutting a crevice in the wall of the building. These are each separate acts in which the other is not charged to have to any extent assisted.

In trespass, if the defendant's responsibility is necessarily dependent upon the culpability of another, who was the immediate actor, and who, in an action against him by the same plaintiff for the same acts, has been adjudged not culpable, no recovery can be had against the principal.

Upon the general question whether a judgment in favor of one who was the immediate debtor in an alleged wrong as an estoppel in favor of another whose wrong, if any, was derivative, see opinion in Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Stratton's Independence, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 677, and comment in footnote.

Rosser, C., filed the following opinion:

This was an action by David Graves against E. B. Putman, Link Cowan, Anna Callahan, and L. Wheeler. Plaintiff's amended petition alleged that about the 15th of June, 1909, plaintiff was occupying, under an oral lease, a certain one-story brick building in Shawnee, which was then owned by Anna Callahan and leased to plaintiff by her authorized agent, L. Wheeler; that plaintiff used the building as a barber shop; that the west side of the building was a solid brick wall, supported by foundation of stone and cement filled in a well trench about 2 feet below the surface of the ground; that Putman and Cowan contracted with the owner of the adjoining lot to erect a two-story brick building; that, as plaintiff believed, they were acting as independent contractors; that pursuant to their contract Putman and Cowan dug a trench for the foundation of the east wall of the building they were to erect, immediately adjoining the west wall of the barber shop; that the trench was about 18 inches wide and about 15 inches below the foundation of the wall of the barber shop; that the defendants Putman and Cowan were careless and negligent in the digging of the trench; that on account of their carelessness and negligence the wall of the barber shop fell, causing injury to plaintiff's property. The second and third paragraphs of their petition are as follows:

"For a further cause of action against defendant, Anna Callahan and L. Wheeler, plaintiff alleges and says: (1) That (including all the allegations in paragraph 1, in count 1) at the same time, or just immediately after the negligent, careless, and unskilful acts on the part of the said E. B. Putman and Link Cowan as aforesaid, defendant L. Wheeler, duly authorized agent and manager of the property of the said Anna Callahan, began and completed the cutting of a crevice in the west side of the west wall of said barber shop as aforesaid; that said crevice was cut for the purpose of laying a rain spout therein and thus enable said contractors, E. B. Putman and Link Cowan, to build the east wall of said building to be erected on lot 12 as aforesaid immediately adjacent to said wall of said barber shop; that said trench was about 7 inches in depth and 6 inches in width, and extending the entire length of said wall diagonally with the same and in the middle thereof from its base and the roof of said barber shop; that in cutting said crevice as aforesaid the said Anna Callahan and L. Wheeler were careless, negligent, and unskilful, and failed to exercise due care and reasonable precaution, whereby said wall was caused to fall and crumble down upon plaintiff's barber equipments and property within said barber shop, and totally destroying the same, to his damage as per Exhibit A; that said negligent and careless acts on the part of the said Anna Callahan and L. Wheeler as aforesaid were the concurring causes with the negligent and careless acts on the part of the said defendants E. B. Putman and Link Cowan as aforesaid in causing said damage and injuries to plaintiff's property as aforesaid.

"III. For a further cause of action against said defendants, E. B. Putman, Link Cowan, Anna Callahan, and L. Wheeler (including paragraphs 1 and 2 in count 1 and paragraph 1 in count 11 herein), plaintiff alleges and says: (1) That the injuries to plaintiff's property, resulting in his damage in the sum of $750, was the result of, and directly due to, the concurrent, negligent, careless, and unskilful acts of said defendants as aforesaid.

"Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against said defendants, and each of them, in the sum of $750, for the costs of this action, and for all other relief justified in the premises."

At the close of the evidence the court instructed the jury to find for the defendants Putman and Cowan and Wheeler, but submitted the question of Anna Callahan's liability to the jury. The evidence shows that a crevice was cut the length of the wall for the purpose of putting in a pipe, and that it was completed a short time before the crevice for the adjoining building was completed. Wheeler ordered the trench to be cut in the wall. He was Mrs. Callahan's agent to collect rents and make repairs. Mrs. Callahan was living in Omaha, Nebraska, and had not been in Shawnee at any recent time before the crevice was cut. Her agent had not notified her that another building was going to be erected on the adjoining lot. Wheeler was having the pipe put in the wall to carry off the water, for the reason that on account of the erection of the building on the adjoining lot there would not be room for the pipe on the outside.

The brief of plaintiff in error contains numerous assignments of error. The principal one is that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant Callahan. It is the contention of plaintiff in error that, when the court found that Wheeler was not liable, it was its duty to make the same finding as to Mrs. Callahan. In other words, she contends that if her agent was not liable she was not liable. This contention is correct. Wheeler was the person who had the work done. Unless he was liable his principal was not liable. When a tort has been committed the person who actually commits it is liable if anyone is. If he is not liable then his principal cannot be held liable. If he acts as the agent of another, the other is responsible by reason of the doctrine of respondent superior, and not because he has himself done a wrong.

In the case of New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Jopes, 142 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 919, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109, Mr. Justice Brewer said: "It would seem on general principles that if the party who actually causes the injury is free from all civil and criminal liability therefor, his employer must also be entitled to a like immunity. . . . But here the defense is that the act of the conductor was lawful. If the immediate actor is free from responsibility because his act was lawful, can his employer, one taking no direct part in the transaction, be held responsible? . . . If an act of an employee be lawful, and one which he is justified in doing, and which casts no personal responsibility upon him, no responsibility attaches to the employer therefor." This opinion was followed by the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit in Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Stratton's Independence, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 677, 85 C. C. A. 393, 158 Fed. 63, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Van Devanter, now of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In McGinnis v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 200 Mo. 347, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 880, 118 Am. St. Rep. 661, 98 S. W. 590, 9 Ann. Cas. 656, the third paragraph of the syllabus is as follows: "Where the servant is charged with misfeasance, and he and the master are joined as defendants, and the petition imputes the negligence of the servant to the master, a verdict of the jury finding the servant not guilty of negligence discharges the master also, although the verdict is against the master." The same doctrine is announced in Hayes v. Chicago Teleph. Co. 218 Ill. 414, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 764, 75 N. E. 1003; Featherstone v. Newburgh & C. Turnp. Road, 71 Hun, 109, 24 N. Y. Supp. 603; Doremus v. Root, 23 Wash. 710, 54 L.R.A. 649, 63 Pac. 572; Indiana Nitro-glycerine & Torpedo Co. v. Lippincott Glass Co. 165 Ind. 361, 75 N. E. 649; Stevick v. Northern P. R. Co. 39 Wash. 501, 81 Pac. 969, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 667; Morris v. Northwestern Improv. Co. 53 Wash. 451, 102 Pac. 402; Bradley v. Rosenthal, 154 Cal. 420, 129 Am. St. Rep. 171, 97 Pac. 875; Hill v. Bain, 15 R. I. 75, 2 Am. St. Rep. 873, 23 Atl. 44; Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. McManigal, 73 Neb. 580, 103 N. W. 305, 107 N. W. 243.

The defendant Wheeler was not acting under the direct instructions of his principal, but was acting under a general agency, without specific instructions from his principal to do this particular act. If he is not responsible there is no liability anywhere.

The defendant in error has not filed a brief in the case. It would appear from some statements of the brief of plaintiff in error that the court permitted the case to go to the jury for a breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment of the premises, but the petition was not framed upon that theory, and the measure of damages submitted to the jury was not based upon that theory, and the instructions to the jury upon the measure of damages would not be proper if the action were one for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment. Therefore it will not be presumed that it was upon that theory that the case was decided as it was.

As the judgment of the lower court in favor of Wheeler has become final, the judgment against Mrs. Callahan should be reversed and here rendered in her favor.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAIL-ROAD COMPANY

v.

IDA A. SANDERSON et al.

(99 Miss. 148, 54 So. 885.)

Trial — absence of finding for or against codefendant — right to judgment.

1. A failure of the jury to find either for or against one of two codefendants in an action to recover damages for negligent injuries, when finding against the other, justifies the entering of a judgment in his favor.

Carriers — passenger — intention to pay fare.

2. One who boards a train to ride a short

Note. — As to effect of verdict for servant in an action against master and servant for servant's negligence or misfeasance, see footnote to Callahan v. Graves, ante, 350.

Generally as to liability of carrier for wilful torts of servants to passengers, see note to Gassenheimer v. Western R. Co. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 999.

As to liability of carrier for assault by employee on passenger outside of car or train, see note to Blomness v. Puget Sound Electric R. Co. 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 764. As to assault by servant on passenger while on train, see note to Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Bush, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1201.

distance, with intention to pay his fare if he is asked for it, may be found to be a passenger, although he remains on the platform and has not been approached by the conductor for fare.

Same — killing of passenger by conductor — liability.

3. A railroad company is liable for the killing of a passenger by a bullet fired by the conductor from a pistol borrowed from another passenger while they were standing beside the train, without intention of doing injury, upon the theory that it is the carrier's duty to protect passengers, although the conductor was acting entirely outside the line of his duty.

Appeal — codefendant — right of one to advantage of error against another.

4. A railroad company jointly sued with its conductor for injury to a passenger inflicted by him cannot complain of the exoneration of the conductor when judgment was entered against itself, if the statute provides that one of several appellants shall not be entitled to reversal because of error in the judgment against another not affecting his rights in the case.

(March 13, 1911.)

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Monroe County in an action brought to recover compensation for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's husband and father; defendant railroad company appealing from so much of the decree as held it liable for the death and plaintiffs appealing from so much as refused to hold the conductor of the train also liable. Affirmed.

Statement by Whitfield, C.:

This is a suit by the appellees, the widow and children of one J. P. Sanderson, for damages for killing of Sanderson, by the conductor, Willis, in charge of a passenger train of the appellant railroad company. The record discloses the fact that Sanderson, in company with a young man named Pennington, got upon the platform of a passenger train of appellant about 10 o'clock at night, intending to ride from Amory to Aberdeen junction, a distance of 1 mile. The fare was 5 cents. The conductor did not see these two parties on the platform, nor did they offer to pay fares, though Pennington says that they were ready and willing to pay same and expected to do so when the conductor should ask them. The conductor testified that he did not, as a rule, work the train between these two points, but that he occasionally collected fares from persons traveling that distance, and that he did not see the deceased and his companion, nor did he know that they were on the train that night. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

When the train reached Aberdeen junction, deceased and his companion got off on the side of the car, and the conductor and two of the passengers stepped off, when the conductor borrowed a pistol from one of the passengers and fired, killing Sanderson. The defense is that he did not shoot at Sanderson, and did not know that he was in that direction, and that the killing was purely accidental. This question however, was submitted to the jury; it being the theory of the appellees that the killing was not an accident, or that at least the conductor was guilty of gross, wanton negligence in firing the pistol. Suit was brought against the railroad company and the conductor, and the jury returned a verdict for $10,000 against the railroad company, from which this appeal comes.

Mr. E. O. Sykes, Jr., for defendant:

If a passenger elects to ride upon the platform of a steam railway car, without any necessity, real or apparent, for taking that position, and while so riding is injured under such circumstances that he would not have been injured if he had not taken that position . . . he cannot recover damages from the company.

The conduct of Sanderson and Pennington both show that it was never their intention to come under the care or control of the appellant during the ride.

Whitfield, C., filed the following opinion:

On the trial of this case, which was an action against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company and T. P. Willis, the conductor, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs against the railroad company for $10,000 damages. But the verdict was silent as to the codefendant, Willis, the conductor. We think, on the authorities, that this amounted to a verdict exonerating Willis, to the same extent as if they had found a verdict for Willis. After the verdict, Willis made a motion, based on this theory, and the court sustained the motion, and entered a judgment discharging Willis from liability. The cross appeal is prosecuted from this. We think the action of the court was correct on the matter involved in the cross appeal.

The defendant company later made a motion in arrest of the judgment against it. The railroad company presents four defenses: First, that the firing of the pistol by the conductor, Willis, and the killing of the deceased, Sanderson, the husband and father of the plaintiffs, was an accident pure and simple, and hence that the company was not liable; second, that the firing of the pistol and the killing of the deceased by the conductor, Willis, if intentional, was a thing not done in the line of his duty while engaged in the service of his master, and hence, being a thing outside the scope of his employment, and not in the line of his duty, the company was not liable; third, that the deceased was not a passenger, and hence the company was not liable; and, fourth, that the verdict and judgment exonerating Willis, the conductor, necessarily operated logically as an exoneration also of the master, and that the verdict for Willis and against the company was an inconsistent, irregular, and illogical verdict, and that the motion in arrest of the judgment, therefore, should have been sustained.

As to the first, the verdict of the jury must be taken as having established the fact that the act was not accidental.

As to the third defense, that the deceased was not a passenger, we think, also, that the evidence as to whether he was a passenger, under all the peculiar circumstances of this particular case as shown by the evidence, was a question of fact for the jury to determine, on proper instructions from the court. The defendant company got the benefit of instructions which told them, in varying forms, that if they believed from the evidence that the deceased was concealing himself so as to evade the payment of his fare, that he did not have the bona fide intention when he boarded the train of paying his fare, but was stealing a ride and attempting to evade his fare, they should find for the defendant company. Under these full instructions on the testimony in the case, the time of the ride being only about 5 minutes, we think the fact that he was a passenger was properly submitted to the jury for their determination, and that the verdict consequently establishes the fact that he was a passenger. The authorities on this subject have been admirably collected by the counsel on both sides, whose briefs are able and exhaustive, and we refer to them without further comment.

As to the second proposition, if it should be conceded that the act was not one in the line of the conductor's duty, but was one wholly outside of the scope of his employment and the line of his duty, it is thoroughly well settled that this beneficent principle, applicable in proper cases, that the master is not responsible for the acts done by the servant outside the line of his duty, and not in the service of the master, has no application whatever to a case where the conductor, the alter ego of the company, himself inflicts the injury on the passenger. In Thompson on Negligence, vol. 3, § 3187, it is said: "This calls up a plain distinction between the liability of a carrier of passengers for assaults or insults committed by his own servants upon his passengers and for similar wrongs committed by them upon trespassers or third persons. For such wrongs committed upon his passengers he will be liable in any event, whether in doing them his servant was acting within the scope of his employment or not, since they are a breach of his contract to carry his passenger in safety and with good treatment." And in a masterly opinion by McClellan, Ch. J., Birmingham Ry. & Electric Co. v. Baird, reported in 130 Ala. 334, 54 L.R.A. 752, 89 Am. St. Rep. 43, 30 So. 456, this doctrine is elaborately discussed and thoroughly vindicated, citing and reviewing a large number of authorities. Judge McClellan, speaking for the supreme court of Alabama in that case, says: "And it is of no consequence, when the wrong is committed by the carrier's own servant, even that servant particularly charged with the duty of conserving the passenger's well-being, en route, that the act bears no connection or relation with or to the duties of such servant to the carrier, and is not committed as an incident to the discharge of any duty, but is utterly violative of all duty, and apart and away from the scope of employment, as that term is understood in the class of cases first above referred to. The carrier is liable in such cases, because the act is violative of the duty it owes through the servant to the passenger, and not upon the idea that the act is incident to a duty within the scope of the servant's employment; and it is manifestly immaterial that the act may have been one of private retribution on the part of the servant, actuated by personal malice toward the passenger, and having no attribute of service to the carrier in it. It is wholly inapt and erroneous to apply the doctrine of scope of employment, as ordinarily understood, to such an act. Its only relation to the scope of the servant's employment rests upon the disregard and violation of a duty imposed by the employment. This is, beyond question, we think, the true doctrine on principle, and while, as indicated above, there are adjudications against it, the great weight of authority supports it."

He quotes in that opinion the following from Chief Justice Ryan in the case of Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657, 17 Am. Rep. 504, 8 Am. Neg. Cas. 665: "But we need not pursue the subject; for, however that may be in general, there can be no doubt of it in those employments in which the agent performs a duty of the principal to third persons, as between such third persons and the principal. Because the principal is responsible for the duty, and if he delegate it to an agent, and the agent fail to perform it, it is immaterial whether the failure be accidental or wilful, in the negligence or in the malice of the agent, the contract of the principal is equally broken in the negligent disregard, or in the malicious violation, of the duty by the agent. It would be cheap and superficial morality to allow one owing a duty to another to commit the performance of his duty to a third, without responsibility for the malicious conduct of the substitute in performance of the duty. If one owe bread to another, and appoint an agent to furnish it, and the agent of malice furnish a stone instead, the principal is responsible for the stone and its consequences. In such cases, malice is negligence. Courts are generally inclining to this view, and this court long since affirmed it." And he also quotes the following from Elliott on Railroads: "There is much apparent conflict among the authorities upon this subject; but we think some of it is due to the use of the term 'scope of employment,' or 'line of duty' in a different sense in different cases, or to a failure to place the decision upon the correct ground. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

It is not merely a question of negligence in such cases, nor is it strictly a question depending upon the scope of the servant's particular employment. It is a question of the absolute duty of a railroad company to its passengers as long as that relation subsists, and a breach of that duty on its part, whether caused by the wilful act of an employee or not. . . . Either the company or the passengers must take the risk of infirmities of temper, maliciousness, and misconduct of the employees whom the company has placed upon the train, and to whom it has committed the discharge of its duty to protect and look after the safety of its passengers. A passenger has no control over them, and the company alone has the power to select and remove them. It is, therefore, but just to make the company, rather than the passengers, take this risk, and to hold it responsible." 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1638.

We approve this as the true rule in this character of cases. The supreme and paramount duty of the conductor, who is the master in such cases, is to protect the passengers from injury; and the absolute character of this duty excludes entirely the operation of the other principle, applicable in proper cases, that the master is not liable for the servant's act, where that act is clearly not in the line of his duty and done outside the scope of his employment. It seems to us a perfectly sound rule, founded in the highest and most beneficent public policy.

The only remaining defense is the technical one, founded in the rules of pleading and practice; to wit, that the verdict and judgment exonerating the conductor necessarily and logically resulted inevitably in the exoneration also of the master. The reasoning is that the master can only be responsible in a case like this, because the servant is, on the doctrine of respondet superior. It is said with great ingenuity and ability that the master can only be derivatively liable; that is, he is liable, if at all, only because of the act of the servant, when that act makes the servant liable; and a verdict, as in this case, for the conductor, and against the defendant, is inconsistent, irregular, and illogical. The Texas supreme court, in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. James, 73 Tex. 12, 15 Am. St. Rep. 743, 10 S. W. 744, which was a case exactly like this, admitted that the verdict was apparently inconsistent, yet nevertheless said it presented no ground on that account for a reversal of a judgment against the company.

In the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Clarke, 85 Miss. 697, 38 So. 97, this court followed the Texas supreme court, and rested its judgment on two grounds: First, that if it were assumed in such case that the company and its servant were jointly liable, nevertheless the right of action which the plaintiff had was both joint and several, and that, though both were equally liable, the liability was based on distinct and different legal principles,—the servant because of his personal trespass, and the company because of its failure to discharge its nondelegable duty towards the public regarding its custody and management of its dangerous instrumentalities, or, as here, in not having a competent conductor. And the court rests its judgment in the second place on our statute (§ 4944 of the Code of 1906; § 4378 of the Code of 1892), which is in the following words: "In all cases, civil or criminal, a judgment or decree appealed from may be affirmed as to some of the appellants and be reversed as to others; and one of several appellants shall not be entitled to a judgment of reversal because of an error in the judgment or decree against another, not affecting his rights in the case. And when a judgment or decree shall be affirmed as to some of the appellants and be reversed as to others, the case shall thereafter be proceeded with, so far as necessary, as if separate suits had been begun and prosecuted; and execution of the judgment of affirmance may be had accordingly. Costs may be adjudged in such cases as the supreme court shall deem proper." This statute was construed in the case of Weis v. Aaron, 75 Miss. 138, 65 Am. St. Rep. 594, 21 So. 763. We there said: "When the action of the court below results in merely reversible error as to one of the parties, the other cannot assign here that error."

We think this statute, with this construction placed upon it, is a perfect answer to the argument of learned counsel for appellant on the motion in arrest of judgment. The error assigned by the railroad company, that the verdict exonerating Willis, the conductor, was wrong, at the same time a verdict against the company was rendered, under our statute, and the construction referred to here, is at most merely a reversible error as to Willis, not affecting the validity of the judgment against the railroad company. Besides all of which, it is further to be said that we have recently reviewed, on full consideration, the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Clarke, in the case of Nelson v. Illinois C. R. Co. 98 Miss. 295, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 689, 53 So. 619, and approved and reaffirmed the doctrine of the Clarke Case on this point, and we remain satisfied of the correctness of our conclusion on the grounds indicated. There are cases to the contrary, which are pointed out by the learned counsel for appellant; but those cases were decided in the absence, so far as they show, of any statute like ours on this subject. Our statute was manifestly intended to do away with the opposite rule, as one which would in many cases sacrifice the substantial rights of parties to a mere rule of procedure, founded on too refined a basis for the practical administration of justice. In the case of Sellards v. Zomes, 5 Bush. 90, cited in Louisville & E. Mail Co. v. Barnes, 79 S. W. 261, 64 L.R.A. 574, 111 Am. St. Rep. 273, 117 Ky. 860, the court said: "The liability of joint trespassers is several, and any one or all of them may be sued for the entire wrong."

Consequently, since our statute of 1836, authorizing several judgments, a dismissal or release of one or more who are sued, cannot per se release the others. This construction of the Kentucky statute is exactly our construction of our statute. See, also the elaborate notes to Louisville & E. Mail Co. v. Barnes, supra, and the note to Abb v. Northern P. R. Co. 92 Am. St. Rep. 872. And see the opinion of this court in Bailey v. Delta Electric Light, Power & Mfg. Co. 86 Miss. 634, 38 So. 354, where, in concluding the opinion, it was said: "This is more in accord with justice and in better harmony with the principles of enlightened jurisprudence, which will not permit a party suffering a wrong to be deprived of his right to redress by any purely technical reasoning."

Per Curiam:

The above opinion is adopted as the opinion of the court, and for the reasons therein indicated the judgment of the court below is affirmed, both on the appeal and cross appeal.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 1.)

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.
W. T. LEE.

(— Okla. —, 132 Pac. 1072.)

Carrier — entering car to assist passenger — duty.

1. One who goes upon a train to render

Headnotes by ROBERTSON, C.

Note. — Duty of carrier to one who goes upon a train to assist a passenger.

The earlier cases on this question are presented in notes in 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 432; 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 910; and 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 773.

assistance to a passenger, in conformity with a practice approved or acquiesced in by the carrier, has a right to render the needed assistance and leave the train, and the carrier, in permitting him to enter, with knowledge of his purpose, is presumed to agree that he may execute it, and is bound to hold the train a reasonable time therefor. If he is injured by reason of the sudden starting of the train or the omission to give the customary signals, the carrier will be liable.

Same — duty to assist passenger.

2. As a general rule it is not the duty of a carrier to station an employee at the entrance of a car for the purpose of assisting passengers off and on; the carrier is, however, required to announce the station as the train arrives, to stop the car at the platform, to hold the train a reasonable length of time to enable all persons using reasonable diligence to enter or depart, to furnish a safe and convenient mode of entering or leaving the train, and to give the usual and customary signals before starting the train.

Same — assistance in alighting.

3. It is not the general duty of a car-

As shown in the earlier notes it is generally held that, in the absence of any regulation forbidding persons to enter trains to assist a passenger, a person who enters a train for that purpose does so under an implied permission or license; and if notice of his intention to enter the train and return again to the station and platform is given to the company, it owes him the duty of ordinary care for his protection. To the same effect are: Southern R. Co. v. Parham, 10 Ga. App. 531, 73 S. E. 763; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. McAlester, — Okla. —, 134 Pac. 661; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. LEE; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Guess, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 154 S. W. 1060.

But, in the absence of any notice, either actual or constructive, it seems that the carrier owes no duty to a person thus entering its train, except not to injure him willfully or wantonly. Midland Valley R. Co. v. Bailey, — Okla. —, 124 Pac. 987; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. LEE.

In Midland Valley R. Co. v. Bailey, — Okla. —, 124 Pac. 987, it was said: "If persons not intending to become passengers desire to assist sick persons to enter the train, they have the right to do so, but, if they desire special service on account of their intention to leave the train after seating the patient, it is only fair that they should notify the railroad company of this desire. The conductor cannot be expected to enter his train and inquire of persons whether they desire to get off, but, when reasonable time has been given and the platform is clear, he has a right to start the train, and, as the plaintiff in this case had not given the conductor or any other employee of the defendant any notice of her intention to leave the train after rier to assist a passenger to alight from a train, unless some special circumstance imposes such duty. But in the case of a sick, old, or infirm passenger, or one making request for assistance, it undoubtedly is the duty of the company to assist them, and in cases where by the use of ordinary care the conductor, or other employee, sees that such help is needed, it becomes the duty of the company to furnish such assistance.

Negligence — what constitutes.

4. In every case involving actionable negligence there must be a duty on the part of defendant, a failure to perform that duty, and an injury or damage resulting by reason of such failure.

seating her daughter, it was not the duty of the defendant to hold the train indefinitely or make special inquiry concerning her plans."

The mere fact that there was no agent or employee of the carrier at or near the car at the time the person entered thereon, and that therefore no opportunity was given to him to notify the company of his intention to alight after assisting the passenger to a seat, does not serve as an excuse for notice, or impose a duty on defendant to hold the train until he has an opportunity to alight; as it is not the duty of a carrier to station an employee at the entrance of a car for the purpose of assisting passengers off and on, where access to the car is not difficult and the car is stopped at the platform prepared and used by the company for that purpose, in the usual manner, and no special circumstance exists demanding such additional care. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. LEE.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Guess, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 154 S. W. 1061, it was held that it was no part of the duty of the brakeman, who was assisting passengers to get on and off the train, to listen to and understand conversations between parties about to get on the train, so that the occurrence of a conversation, in his hearing, to the effect that the plaintiff should assist the other on the train, did not charge the carrier with the duty of holding the train until he could get off, where it did not appear that the brakeman understood the conversation, and testified that he did not.

But in Texas C. R. Co. v. Hutchinsons, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 132 S. W. 509, it is held that one who enters a train to assist a passenger has the right to assume that the train will remain at the station the usual and customary time, and long enough to permit the passengers desiring to do so to disembark, and is entitled to recover for injuries sustained while attempting to alight after the train was in motion where he was compelled to do so because of the carrier's failure to remain the customary period and permit all the passengers desiring to do so to disembark, notwithstanding the fact that the company had no notice of his intention to alight, where it is shown that the company and its employees in charge of the train were familiar with and acquiesced in the custom of persons to board the trains to assist passengers, and then get off before the train started.

In Otto v. Milwaukee Northern R. Co. 148 Wis. 54, 134 N. W. 157, where the question of notice to the company's servants is not discussed, it was held that one who while assisting passengers to board an electric car stepped upon the lower tread to place some baggage upon the platform was a licensee, and entitled to be treated by those in charge of the car with ordinary care, and was entitled to recover for injuries sustained by being thrown from the car, which was suddenly started with a jerk, without signal being given, though it appeared that the conductor was not present. The court said: "Obviously, it is the business of a railroad company to use reasonable diligence to discover whether a person who has stepped on a car has mounted the platform or stepped to the ground, before starting. It seems there was room in the evidence for the jury to conclude that there was a fatal omission of defendant in that regard."

It cannot be said as a matter of law that the negligence of the railroad company was not the proximate cause of injuries sustained by plaintiff in alighting from a moving train in the darkness, where it appeared the plaintiff, without having had much experience in getting on and off trains, boarded the train for the purpose of assisting his wife and four children, who were passengers, with assurance of the conductor that he would have time to do so and return in safety, that the train was held less than a minute, and not near as long as usual, and started before he was able to get off, and that he was prevented from alighting by the act of the brakeman in closing the doors at which he had entered; and that, upon requesting the brakeman to stop the train, he was directed to go to the next vestibule door and get off, and in accord with such direction he was compelled to alight in the darkness about 200 yards from the station.

So, in Southern R. Co. v. Parham, 10 Ga. App. 531, 73 S. E. 763, it was held that the question of contributory negligence in attempting to alight from a moving train in the darkness was for the jury, where it appeared plaintiff did so at the direction of the conductor.

Robertson, C., filed the following opinion:

On July 28, 1908, the plaintiff below, W. T. Lee, accompanied his mother-in-law, Mrs. A. C. Cabbler, an aged and infirm lady, to defendant's depot at Haworth, Oklahoma, for the purpose of assisting her to take the train to Hugo, Oklahoma; he purchased her ticket, and when the train arrived, assisted her in entering the car, and entered thereon himself, carrying two pieces of hand baggage. After having secured a seat for Mrs. Cabbler and deposited her baggage, he started to leave the train, which by that time had started; he claims that as he was in the act of getting off the train some person was attempting to get on and struck his foot and caused him to fall headlong on the platform, whereby he was seriously and permanently injured. The conductor testified positively that he, as was his usual custom, stood by the steps of the car and assisted passengers off and on; that he had no knowledge of plaintiff's intentions to get off the train, but supposed he was a regular passenger. In his original petition plaintiff alleges "that the defendant expressly agreed and promised that it would stop its locomotive engine and cars at said station a sufficient length of 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

time, not only to permit the said Mrs. Cabbler to be assisted aboard the said cars by the plaintiff, but also a sufficient time for plaintiff to leave the cars in safety." There being a failure of proof on this issue, the trial court, over the objections of defendant, permitted plaintiff, after he had rested his case, to amend his petition so as to charge that none of the defendant's employees or agents were present at the time he entered the car, and that therefore he could not notify them, or any of them, of his intention to alight after finding a seat for Mrs. Cabbler, and contends that the train made a shorter stop that day than it ordinarily did, and that it started without notice to him and before he could get off. The testimony on this point is conflicting.

The only question in this case is: Did the company, in the absence of knowledge of Mr. Lee's intent to leave the train, owe him the duty of holding the train until he had an opportunity to alight?

This question is practically disposed of by the case of Midland Valley R. Co. v. Bailey, — Okla. —, 124 Pac. 987. In that case plaintiff's daughter was sick and was taken to defendant's train by a physician and one or two others, for the purpose of being carried as a passenger. The physician notified the conductor that he had a sick patient whom he desired to put on the train, and asked for time to put her on the car. The physician was intending to remain on the train in order to accompany the patient, and said nothing to the conductor about getting off the train; plaintiff also went aboard the train. After the usual business had been transacted the train started, and plaintiff, after the train had gone a short distance, stepped off, fell, and was injured. She sued the company and recovered a judgment. On appeal the case was reversed on the ground that the company owed her no duty in the absence of notice that she intended to alight. In the body of that opinion it is said: "The principal question in the case is whether or not the conductor of a train who is not informed that a person assisting a sick passenger desires to leave the train after the passenger has been seated, and who does not know that such person desires to leave the train, is bound to ascertain that fact before starting his train. To state the question is practically to answer it. In this case the petition did not allege that the defendant company had any knowledge that it was the purpose of the plaintiff to leave the train. It did not allege that there were any facts or circumstances which charged the defendant with notice that it was her intention to leave the train, and the evidence was in perfect harmony with the petition; there being no evidence of any kind whatsoever tending to show such knowledge on the part of the defendant company, or any circumstances tending to charge the company with notice. A demurrer was filed to the petition, which was overruled. Objection to the introduction of evidence was made and overruled. A demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence was interposed and overruled, and a request for a peremptory instruction was presented and denied, so that the point was saved at every step in the proceeding. There is no controversy but that it is the duty of a railroad company to stop at stations a sufficient length of time to permit reasonably careful persons to leave and enter the train and transact their business with the company. If the railroad company receives sick passengers, it is its duty to stop a sufficient length of time to enable these passengers, in the exercise of reasonable care, to enter the train. If persons not intending to become passengers desire to assist sick persons to enter the train, they have the right to do so; but, if they desire special service on account of their intention to leave the train after seating the patient, it is only fair that they should notify the railroad company of this desire. The conductor cannot be expected to enter his train and inquire of persons whether they desire to get off; but, when reasonable time has been given and the platform is clear, he has a right to start the train, and, as the plaintiff in this case had not given the conductor, or any other employee of the defendant, any notice of her intention to leave the train after seating her daughter, it was not the duty of the defendant to hold the train indefinitely or make special inquiry concerning her plans. The doctor did speak about putting his patient on the train, but said nothing about wanting time to get off, and in fact, did not get off, as it was his purpose to, and he did, become a passenger. going with the patient to her destination. It would have been entirely convenient in that same conversation to have cautioned the conductor that the plaintiff desired to leave the train, but he did not do so, and therefore no special duty devolved upon the defendant to do more than give reasonable time for reasonable people to enter the train with the patient. These principles are so simple and seem so clear and just that it is not surprising that the authorities are in substantial harmony in laying down the rule. In Hutchinson on Carriers 3d ed. § 991, the rule is stated as follows: 'A person who comes to a railroad station to assist passengers in entering or leaving the train, though not a passenger, is not a trespasser, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

as he comes with at least the tacit invitation of the carrier. While so engaged, he does not stand in the relation to the carrier of a bare licensee, but is deemed to have been invited to be there by virtue of the relation existing between the carrier and the intending or arriving passenger. The carrier therefore owes to him the duty of exercising at least ordinary care to see that he is not injured by reason of defective station facilities or approaches thereto. So, one who goes upon a train to render necessary assistance to a passenger, in conformity with a practice approved or acquiesced in by the carrier, has a right to render the needed assistance and leave the train; and the carrier, in permitting him to enter with knowledge of his purpose, is presumed to agree that he may execute it, and is bound to hold the train a reasonable time therefor. If he is injured by reason of the sudden starting of the train or the omission to give the customary signals, the carrier will be liable.' This rule is supported by numerous authorities, amongst which are the following, to which our attention is called by the plaintiff in error: Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Lawton, 55 Ark. 428, 15 L.R.A. 434, 29 Am. St. Rep. 483, 18 S. W. 543, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 148; Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Bradley, 125 Ga. 193, 114 Am. St. Rep. 196, 54 S. E. 69; *Hill v. by the plaintiff which in any way conflicts with this general rule is Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Crunk, 119 Ind. 542, 12 Am. St. Rep. 443, 21 N. E. 31, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 229, but this case appears never to have been followed in the state of Indiana, and it has been expressly criticized in the case of *Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Other authorities supporting the rule we announce are collected in notes in 15 L.R.A. 434, and 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 433."

In 2 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 991, it is said: "But the duty of the carrier in this respect is dependent upon the knowledge of such person's purpose by those in charge of the train; for without such knowledge they may reasonably conclude that he entered to become a passenger, and cause the train to be moved after giving him a reasonable time to get aboard. He should, accordingly, notify someone in the management of the train of his presence, business, or purpose, so as to create some relation to the carrier and thus make it its duty to care for him. And where the carrier's servants have no knowledge, or there are no circumstances tending to put them on notice, that a person who has boarded a train to assist another intends to alight before the train starts, they are not bound to hold the train until he has had time to disembark, nor to notify him before the train is started."

It might be urged, however, that the above authorities are not controlling in the instant case, for that it is in the petition (as amended) charged that none of defendant's agents or employees were present at the car at the time plaintiff entered upon it, and that therefore he could not give notice to them.

Admitting that there was no agent or employee of defendant at or near the car at the time plaintiff entered thereon (although there is strong evidence in the record to the contrary), and that therefore no opportunity was given him to notify the company of his intention to alight after assisting Mrs. Cabbler to a seat, would that fact serve as an excuse for notice, and did it impose a duty on defendant to hold the train until plaintiff had an opportunity to alight? 46 L.R.A. (N.S.).

The negligent act of which plaintiff complains is the starting of the train. By the authorities herein above cited it appears that the defendant may start its train at any time without liability to one who may be intending to leave it, in the absence of knowledge of his intention to so leave. Can a person entering a train, like a regular passenger, without notice to anyone of his intention to alight, insist that the company owes him a duty to keep the train standing until he has alighted? Certainly not, unless the absence of the conductor from his post can be said to be the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

This necessity raises the question: Is it the duty of a carrier to station an employee at the entrance of a car or train for the purpose of assisting passengers off and on? As a general proposition no such duty rests on the carrier, and in the instant case, where access to the car was not difficult, and the car was stopped at the platform prepared and used by the company for that purpose, and in the usual and customary manner, and where no special circumstance existed demanding such additional care, it is obvious that no such duty was imposed on the carrier. We do not desire to be understood as saying that under no circumstance or condition such duty would not exist, but in the case under consideration we say it did not exist.

Defendant in error was not a passenger on the train, neither was he a trespasser. He was there by implied invitation, and the company owed him only ordinary care. It did not owe him that high degree of care it owed a passenger. Yet from the adjudicated cases it would seem that, even though he had been a passenger, all the duty the company would owe was to announce the station as the train arrived, to stop the train a reasonable length of time to enable all persons using reasonable diligence to enter or depart, and to furnish a safe and convenient mode of entering or leaving the train, and to give the usual and customary signals before starting the train. From the undisputed facts in this case all these things were done. It is not the duty of the company to assist a passenger in alighting from a train, unless some special circumstance imposes such duty. Thus, in the case of a sick, old, or infirm passenger, or one making request for assistance, it undoubtedly is the duty of the company to assist them, and in cases where, by the use of ordinary care, the conductor or other train employees sees that such help is needed it becomes the duty of the company to furnish such assistance. But in the instant case no such assistance was required, nor was it requested, and, above all, the company had no knowledge of the plaintiff's intent to alight, and inasmuch as the company owed him no duty, except ordinary care which was given, there can be no liability. Raben v. Central Iowa R. Co. 73 Iowa, 579, 5 Am. St. Rep. 708, 35 N. W. 645, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 379; Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 94 Mo. 255, 4 Am. St. Rep. 374, 7 S. W. 1, 4 Am. Neg. Cas. 584; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Slatton, 54 Ill. 133, 5 Am. Rep. 109, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 583.

If there was no duty there could be no liability; for in every case involving actionable negligence there must have been a duty on the part of defendant, a failure to perform that duty, and an injury or damage resulting by reason of such failure. Faurot v. Oklahoma Wholesale Grocery Co. 21 Okla. 104, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 136, 95 Pac. 463; Rogers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 32 Okla. 109, 120 Pac. 1093.

Without doubt the subject is one of regulation, and such additional duty might, by law, be imposed upon a carrier. But that is without the case, and speculation thereon at this time would be useless.

Entertaining the views hereinabove expressed, it necessarily follows that the judgment should be reversed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

PACIFIC MILLING & ELEVATOR COMPANY, Resp't.,

v.

CITY OF PORTLAND et al., Appts.

STATE OF OREGON, Intervener, Appt.

(— Or. —, 133 Pac. 72.)

Statute — title — sufficiency — coast — tidal river.

1. A title "An Act to Provide for the Sale of Tide and Overflowed Land on the Seashore and Coast" is sufficient to support legislation disposing of land on a tidal river which flows into the sea, without any money consideration.

Same — curing defect.

2. An amendatory statute cannot be declared invalid because not supported by the title to the original act, if a subsequent amendment recognizes it under a title sufficiently broad to cover its provisions, and it has been acted upon by the people generally for many years.

Same — repeal — implications.

3. Charter authority to provide for the construction and maintenance of docks does not by implication repeal a statute authorizing riparian owners to construct wharves.

Riparian rights — conveyance by plat — severance from upland.

4. The conveyance of riparian property by reference to plats and maps attaches the riparian right to the outermost lot.

Water — tide land — right of state to grant.

5. A state may grant its title to tidelands between high and low water mark into private ownership, subject to the paramount, public right of navigation and such reasonable regulation as the state may prescribe.

Same — wharf right — implied reservation in state.

6. The grant by the state to a riparian owner of the land between high and low water mark, together with the right to wharf out to the line of navigability, is subject to no implied right on the part of the state or its agencies to use the locus in quo for the making of dock, wharves, or other improvements in aid of navigation.

APPEAL by defendants and intervener from a decree of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enjoin defendants from erecting a wharf on and in front of plaintiff's premises. Affirmed.

Statement by Bean, J.:

This is a suit to restrain the defendants from erecting a wharf on and in front of plaintiff's premises below the line of ordinary high water in the Willamette river. The defendants appeal from a decree of the circuit court adjudging plaintiff to be the owner of the premises and of the wharfage rights in front thereof.

Plaintiff avers that it is the owner and in the actual possession of the following described real estate, water frontage, and wharfage rights situated within the corporate limits of the city of Portland, to wit: The northerly 55 feet of the lot 17, all of lots 18, 19, and 20 of Watson's addition to the city of Portland, and the southerly 40 feet of lot 21 of Doscher's addition to the above city; that the lots are 200 by 100 feet, extending from Front street at a point above and westerly of the line of ordinary high water in the left bank of the Willamette river, easterly to the established harbor line; that plaintiff is entitled and desires to construct a wharf on and in front of the premises, and has applied to the defendant city of Portland for a permit to do so, but has been refused the same on the ground that the city asserts that it has the exclusive right of constructing a wharf on all that part of the premises below the line of ordinary high water; and that, pursuant to such claim, the dock commissioners of the defendant city have selected the premises for a wharf site, have entered upon such river frontage, have engaged in driving spiles therein preparatory to the construction of a wharf and dock, and threaten to occupy such premises permanently, and to exclude plaintiff therefrom. The defendant city and its officers deny plaintiff's title, and allege, among other things, that the property described in plaintiff's complaint has never been in the actual possession of anyone; that the whole thereof, including all of North Front street adjacent thereto, has at all times been below the ordinary high-water line of the Willamette river, and that the same accrued and became vested in the state of Oregon at the time the state was admitted into the United States, and that it has never sold or conveyed the same to any one; that the state of Oregon, by its constitution and through the charter of the city of Portland adopted in 1903, and a certain amendment thereto, establishing a department of public docks and making provisions with reference thereto, adopted by the people of the city of Portland, November 8 1910, pursuant to the Constitution granted unto the city the right, power, and authority to construct and maintain wharves, docks, and all appurtenances there-to upon the property of the state of Oregon lying below the ordinary high-water line of the Willamette river, particularly upon such portions thereof as a commission of the department of public docks of the city might select; that the commission has duly selected the property described in the complaint for that purpose, and intends to erect thereon a large dock extending from ordinary high-water line out to the harbor line, and to take possession of the whole of such frontage and premises without paying plaintiff any compensation therefor. The plaintiff asks that its title to the premises be quieted, and that defendants be enjoined from erecting or maintaining any structure thereon.

The state intervened, and alleges, in substance, in addition to the facts stated by the defendant city of Portland, that it is the owner of all the land between the ordinary high-water mark and the harbor line in front of and on the river side of such lands; that the city of Portland and its dock commission are fully authorized by the grant in its charter to enter upon and construct below high-water mark a public dock and wharf for the purpose of aiding and promoting the commerce and navigation of the Willamette river; that in attempting to construct a public dock, the city of Portland is acting by virtue of such authority; that the plaintiff has no franchise or license to construct wharves or docks in front of such lands below ordinary high-water mark; that such license or franchise has been forfeited, abandoned, and lost for more than ten years prior to the commencement of this suit; and that plaintiff and its predecessors have in no wise attempted to use the same during such time. The state prays that it be declared to be the exclusive owner of the property, except as to the city of Portland, and that plaintiff be enjoined from driving piles in or building any structure upon the land below high-water mark, or from asserting any claim to the land adverse to the intervenor.

The following matters are agreed to: (1) That Watson's addition to the city of Portland was platted March 7, 1871, by A. J. Watson, the owner of all the land included within its boundaries above the line of ordinary high water. (2) That Doscher's addition to said city was platted April 11, 1871, by John C. and Ann L. Doscher, the owners of all the land within its boundaries above ordinary high-water line. (3) That both of said additions were platted on a part of the donation land claim of Wm. Blockinestone, and that the easterly boundary of said claim was the Willamette river, which is navigable. That said plats are contiguous, Doscher's addition joining Watson's addition on the north, and being a continuation thereof, so far as "river block" in the latter addition is concerned; "river block No. 2" of Doscher addition being a continuation of "river block" in Watson's addition, and both of said additions being bounded on the west by Front street. (4) That the plat of Watson's addition shows the left boundary line of the Willamette river extending northerly and southerly practically through the middle of said "river block." (5) That, according to the field notes of the survey of the donation land claim, the meander line of said claim is located about 40 feet easterly of and practically parallel with Front street. (6) That plaintiff has succeeded by mesne conveyances to whatever title Watson and the Doschers had to lots 18, 19, and 20, and the northerly 55 feet of lot 17 of said "river block," and the southerly 40 of the lot 21 of said "river block No. 2" and, if the lots are entirely below the ordinary high-water line of the river, plaintiff has nevertheless acquired and owns all the rights of the bank or upland property to such lots and parts of lots and the frontage thereof. (7) That all such title and right as the owner of the land adjacent to the line of ordinary high water in the Willamette river might have under the law is vested in the plaintiff so far as concerns the premises in front of lots 26, 27, and 28 of terminal block in Watson's addition.

The evidence shows that there is a large area of similar land in the city, much of it occupied as private property, and all held in private ownership. D. B. Sigler, for about fourteen years county assessor, testified that the land between ordinary high and low water marks has always been assessed; that there is $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 invested in such lands and structures thereon. It appears that the plaintiff paid $137,000 for the lots five years ago. Since 1909 the assessed valuation has been from $74,750 to $91,250. In 1910 the taxes amounted to $2,007.50. The land in question, in its original state, consisted of a low flat, broken by a spring branch or creek, and for the last twenty-five years has been gradually filling up, so that much of it is now 15 feet higher than it was formerly. The lots immediately to the south, which are in the same class of property as the land in question, are occupied by a horse barn, blacksmith shop, engine house, a bridge company's plant, comprising an investment of several thousand dollars, and other buildings. The city first commenced an action to condemn the right to construct a wharf on the premises, which action was dismissed.

Mr. Fred W. Mulkey, with Messrs. Frank S. Grant and Lyman E. Latourrette, for appellants:

The state of Oregon, upon its admission into the Union, became owner of the bed and banks of the Willamette river up to the line of ordinary high water, subject only to the paramount right of navigation and the right of Congress to regulate commerce between the states.

The wharf act created only a permit or license to the upland owner to wharf out, but plaintiff, not having accepted such permit or license, and having constructed no wharf, has acquired no vested right for which compensation need be made.

Messrs. Malarkey, Seabrook, & Dubble and Martin L. Pipes also amici curiæ.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The claims of the respective parties may be summarized as follows:

Plaintiff claims:

(1) Title in fee by patent from the government and subsequent conveyances as to the westerly 100 feet, which plaintiff claims has always been above the ordinary high-water line, or is now above such line by reason of accretion.

(2) Title in fee from the state of Oregon, granted by acts of the legislature of 1874 and 1876, known as the tideland acts, and subsequent conveyance to a strip about 100 feet wide east of and adjacent to the above, being between the ordinary high-water line and low-water line as claimed by plaintiff.

(3) Riparian or littoral rights and a wharf right to the portion between low water and the harbor line.

Defendants, in answer to the first claim, maintained that the locus in quo belongs to the state of Oregon, because it is entirely below the ordinary high-water line, which is westerly of North Front street, although the apparent line is now near the easterly line of such street. Plaintiff's second claim is based on the tideland act as amended in 1874 and 1876, whereby the state purports to grant to the adjacent upland owners "any tide or overflowed lands upon said Willamette river." In answer to this claim defendants maintain: (1) That the locus in quo is river shore, and not "tide or overflowed lands," within the meaning of this act, and (2) that, in any event, this portion of the act is void because not embraced in its title. In answer to plaintiff's third claim, defendants maintain: (1) That the state's ownership of the bed and shores of a navigable river is absolute, admitting of no easement on the part of the adjacent upland owner; (2) that the wharf act creates only a permit or license to the upland owner to wharf out, but plaintiff, not having constructed a wharf, has acquired no vested right, and his license or permit has been revoked by the act of the city in selecting the locus in quo and proceeding to construct a public dock under legislative authority; and (3) that, in any event, littoral or wharf rights are subject to right of the state and its agencies to construct docks and other improvements in aid of navigation and commerce.

It is only fair to say that the learned counsel on both sides, as well as those appearing amici curiæ in their several briefs, have shed much light upon the question involved, and have stated their positions with clearness. As a basis for proper understanding, it may be well to observe that, by the common law of England, the title and dominion of the sea and of rivers and arms of the sea where the tide ebbs and flows, and of all the lands below high-water mark, within the jurisdiction of the Crown of England, are in the King. These waters and the land which they cover are not capable of ordinary occupation, cultivation, and improvement, and their primary uses are public in their nature, for highways of navigation and commerce and for fishing purposes by all the King's subjects. Therefore the title jus privatum in such lands, as of waste and unoccupied lands, belongs to the King as the sovereign; and the dominion jus publicum is vested in him as the representative of the nation and for the public good. The English possessions in America were held by the King, and the exclusive power to grant them was vested in him in like manner. The English monarchs granted charters for large tracts of land on the Atlantic coast, giving the grantees both the territory described and the powers of government, including the property and dominion of lands under tide waters. With the surrender of the British, all the rights of the Crown and of Parliament became vested in the several states, subject to the rights relinquished to the national government by the Constitution of the United States. In this manner the government of the colonies and the original states became vested with the title to lands under navigable waters. The states admitted to the Union since the adoption of the Constitution have the same rights as the original states had in the tide waters and lands below the high-water mark within their respective jurisdictions. In this country the same principle applies to the Great Lakes, and in some states it has been extended to navigable rivers. In the early government of the colonies, and later of the states, in order to induce persons to erect wharves for the benefit of navigation and commerce, the owners of land bounding on tide waters were allowed greater rights and privileges in the shore below high-water mark than in England. The nature and degree of the rights and privileges differed in the various states; in some they were regulated by statute and in others by usage only. Each state, according to its own views of policy and justice, has dealt with the lands under the water as it has deemed best for the public interests, reserving its own control over such lands, or granting within its limits rights therein to individuals or corporations, whether owners of the adjoining upland or not. Therefore the title and rights of riparian owners in the soil below high-water mark are governed by the local laws of the several states, subject to the rights granted by the Federal Constitution of the United States for regulating and improving navigation. The holdings have not been uniform in regard to the right of a riparian owner to establish a wharf on his own land extending over the shore between high and low water marks and lands under the water for the purpose of reaching a navigable point. In some states it is held, sometimes because of long usage, sometimes by statute, and sometimes upon the interpretation of the common law adopted by the courts, that, for the purpose of making available the right of a riparian owner to access to navigable waters, he may make a landing, dock, wharf, or pier for his own use or that of the public, for the purpose of reaching the ordinary point of navigation, subject to whatever rules the legislature may enact for the protection of the public, and also subject to the right of the United States to exercise its powers for regulating and improving navigation. The right of a riparian owner to construct a wharf or landing is founded largely upon equitable considerations. Where a wharf has been constructed by a riparian owner, in opposition to no statute, and without the interference of the state, and without detriment to superior public rights, and large and valuable interests have been created, the owner has generally been held to have been justified in constructing such wharf. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 264.

The paramount right of navigation, which is vested in the state, and also in the general government of the United States by virtue of the authority conferred upon it to regulate commerce between the states and with foreign nations, is receiving constant elucidation by the courts, but no fixed rule can yet be laid down defining the extent to which the Federal government or the state may interfere with the property of riparian and other owners without becoming liable for compensation. Id. § 265.

Let us then consider what policy has been adopted by the state of Oregon, and what has been done in confirmation thereof. In 1862 the legislative assembly, evidently deeming it for the best interests of the state to encourage private parties to construct docks, wharves, etc., for the convenience of and in aid of navigation, without the state, either directly or through its municipalities, engaging in such enterprises, passed what is known as the wharf act (§§ 5201, 5202, L. O. L.). The 1st section provides that "the owner of any land in this state lying upon any navigable stream or other like water, and within the corporate limits of any incorporate town therein, is hereby authorized to construct a wharf or wharves upon the same, and extend such wharf or wharves into such stream or other like water beyond low-water mark so far as may be necessary and convenient for the use and accommodation of any ships or other boats or vessels that may or can navigate such stream or other live water." The other section confers upon the corporate authorities of the town wherein such wharf is proposed to be constructed the power to regulate the exercise of the privilege or franchise granted, and to prescribe the mode and extent to which the same may be exercised beyond the line of low water, so that the same will not unnecessarily interfere with navigation. The premises in controversy were included within the limits of the city of Portland in 1883. The grant of the privilege mentioned in § 5201, L. O. L. is a continuing grant, and speaks in the present tense as long as the statute continues in force; therefore the act, if it has not been revoked, applies to the land in question.

When a statute is expressed in general terms and in words of the present tense, it will, as a general rule, be construed to apply not only to things and conditions existing at the time of its passage, but will also be given a prospective interpretation by which it will apply to such as come into existence thereafter. 36 Cyc. 1235.

In 1872 the legislature passed an act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Sale of Tide and Overflowed Lands on the Seashore and Coast." Laws 1872, p. 129. This act gave the owners of land fronting upon such tideland the preference right to purchase the tideland belonging to the state in front of the land so owned. By an act approved October 26, 1874 (Laws 1874, p. 76), the following amendment was incorporated into the tideland act, without changing the title, namely: "That the Willamette river shall not be deemed a river in which the tide ebbs and flows within the meaning of this act, or of the act to which this act is amendatory; and the title of this state to any tide or overflowed lands upon said Willamette river is hereby granted and confirmed to the owners of the adjacent lands, or when any such tide or overflowed lands have been sold, then in that case, to the purchaser or purchasers of such tide or overflowed lands from such owner of such adjacent lands, or some previous owner thereof, as the case may be." This act was further amended in 1876 (see Laws 1876, p. 69) so as to include in its provisions the Coquille, Coos, and Umpqua rivers.

The validity of the acts is attacked on the ground that the subject-matter of a grant of land on the Willamette river is not included in the title of the act of 1872, of which the acts in question are amendments. L. 1872, p. 129. Therefore the amendments are repugnant to the requirements of art. 4, § 20, of the Constitution of Oregon, providing that "every act shall embrace but one subject, and matters properly connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in the title." It is contended on behalf of plaintiff that the title of this act is broad enough to embrace tide and overflowed lands along rivers emptying into the ocean, and that this is established by decisions defining the meaning of the terms used. That "the shore of the sea is that part of the land covered by water in its greatest ordinary flux, the ports, bays, roadsteads, and gulfs, and the rivers, although they may not be navigable, . . . their beds, mouths, and the salt marshes." United Land Assn. v. Knight, 85 Cal. 448, 482, 23 Pac. 267, 24 Pac. 818. That the word "sea" has been held to mean "not only high sea, but arms of the sea, waters flowing from it into ports and havens, and as high upon rivers as the tide ebbs and flows." Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. 441, 462, 12 L. ed. 226, 236. That "tide waters" are waters, "whether salt or fresh, wherever the ebb and flow of the tide from the sea is felt." Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441, 447; Atty. Gen. v. Woods, 108 Mass. 436, 439, 11 Am. Rep. 380. That the word "'coast' is defined to be the seaboard of a country." Ravesies v. United States (D. C.) 35 Fed. 917, 919. That that portion of the country which drains into the Pacific ocean is frequently spoken of as the "Pacific coast."

It is well settled that every presumption will be indulged in to hold a statute valid, and it is only where an act is purely repugnant to the Constitution that the courts will hold it void. This is especially true 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

where the act in question has been enacted for many years, and acted upon by the officers of the state and by the people as valid, so that it has become a rule of property. Millions of dollars have been invested upon the strength of the validity of these laws, and the value of lands have been thereby enhanced; therefore the acts should not be overturned unless it is necessary to do so in order to avoid doing violence to the Constitution. Stability of land titles is an object of moment and worth to the people of the state of Oregon.

The subject-matter of the act of 1872, and the amendments of 1874 and 1876, is the disposal of the state's land on the seashore and coast, and any matter germane to or connected with that subject may be embodied in the act. The title does not use the word "disposal," but uses the word "sale." In discussing the question of title to a legislative act, Mr. Justice Bean, in State v. Shaw, 22 Or. 287, at page 289, 29 Pac. 1028, said: "The departure (from the title) must be plain and manifest, and all doubts will be resolved in favor of the law. . . . If all the provisions of the law relate directly or indirectly to the same subject, are naturally connected, and are not foreign to the subject expressed in the title, they will not be held unconstitutional."

The word "sale" used in the act of 1872 does not definitely refer to the matter of granting or confirming title to tide and overflowed lands upon the Willamette and other rivers, and disposing of the same without a money consideration. See vol. 7 Words & Phrases, p. 6291. We cannot say, however, that the matter is foreign to the subject expressed in the title.

Be that as it may, and passing to the amendatory act of 1876, the title of this act was the whole of the act of 1874, including the amendments granting and confirming tide and overflowed lands on the Willamette and other rivers, which was referred to in the title of the act of 1876. There could certainly be no mistake in regard to this act. Many authorities support the rule that the title of an amendatory act is sufficient and will uphold any legislation that would have been permissible under the original title, when the law amended or enacted after the amendatory act refers by chapter or by section to the act amended, giving its title. This practice, however, has been criticized. Fort Street Union Depot Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 118 Mich. 340, 76 N. W. 631. After the enactment of the amendment of 1874, had there been a "joker" in the act, the members of the legislature and the people of the state would have had two years in which to consider the same and retrace their steps in 1876. Instead of so doing, the lawmakers re-enacted the measure. From this, in connection with the fact that the courts and people in general have sanctioned the grant as expressed by the legislature for more than twenty-five years, and have acted thereon, and that the state, county, and city have treated the land as plaintiff's or its grantors, we conclude that the statute is a valid one, and that the grant and confirmation are complete.

In Lewis v. Portland, 25 Or. 123, 22 L.R.A. 736, 42 Am. St. Rep. 772, 35 Pac. 256, this court practically settled the question as to the statutes applying to lands between high and low water marks on the Willamette river. At page 162 of 25 Or. of the opinion, Justice Lord said: "This grant conveyed the title to all such lands along these rivers, whether tide or overflowed, to the riparian owners, subject to the public trust. As the Willamette is a fresh-water river, and only slightly affected by the tides a short distance from its mouth, there is no tideland at Portland, as held in Andrus v. Knott, 12 Or. 501, 8 Pac. 763, and therefore it results that if the submerged or overflowed lands described in the act include such as are not affected by the tides, and lie between the upland and navigable water, they belong to such owners, subject to the paramount right of navigation and commerce." See Coquille Mill & Mercantile Co. v. Johnson, 52 Or. 547, 132 Am. St. Rep. 716, 98 Pac. 132.

The charter of the city of Portland, § 216, provides that all the wharves, water front, and harbor within the city of Portland shall be under the management and control of the executive board, subject to ordinance. And subdiv. 78 of § 73 provides that the council shall have power and authority to provide for the construction and maintenance of wharves, docks, and levees, and all such other work as may be required for the accommodation of commerce. The people of Portland, by the popular vote in 1910, adopted an amendment to § 118 of the charter, whereby the department of public docks was created, with authority inter alia to exercise the powers above granted to the executive board and council. On August 29, 1912, this commission made a selection of a site for a public dock embracing the locus in quo, and it is contended on behalf of the city that the authorization of the municipality to construct public docks necessarily authorized it to use such portion of the state's property as might be reasonably necessary therefor. To this contention we are unwilling to accede. It is not contended that the charter of 1903 in terms repealed the wharf act of 1862.

The rule that repeals by implication are not favored, and will not be held to exist 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

if there is any other reasonable construction, is well settled. To repeal a statute by implication, there must be such a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new and the old that they cannot stand together or be harmonized. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d. ed. 267; Palmer v. State, 2 Or. 66; State v. Benjamin, 2 Or. 125; Booth's Will, 40 Or. 154, 156, 61 Pac. 1135, 66 Pac. 710; United States v. Greathouse, 166 U. S. 601, 605, 41 L. ed. 1130, 1131, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 701.

The authority of the city to provide for public landing places, and to construct docks and wharves, only authorizes such action where the rights of others will not be interfered with thereby. The existence of such rights in private individuals is recognized by the statutory authorization to acquire them by condemnation or otherwise. From the whole tenor of the different statutes, it does not appear that the later act was intended to revoke the provisions of the old acts of 1862, 1874, and 1876. A charter of the city which authorized it to lay out, open, and improve streets would not be held to authorize the city to open such street through a block, the title to which was vested in the state of Oregon. The city can construct docks and wharves on any property which it has previously acquired; therefore the provisions of the charter can be given effect without interfering with the rights conferred by the act granting and confirming title in the tide and overflowed lands to the riparian owners on the banks of the Willamette.

One statute is not repugnant to another unless they relate to the same subject and are enacted for the same purpose. When there is a difference in the whole purview of two statutes apparently relating to the same subject, the former is not repealed by the latter. Undoubtedly, the two statutes under consideration relate to different subjects. See United States v. Claflin, 97 U. S. 552, 24 L. ed. 1085; United States v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407, 416, 24 L. ed. 503, 505.

The case of San Pedro v. Southern P. R. Co. 101 Cal. 333, 35 Pac. 993, is a case in point. The state of California had granted the city the right to construct and maintain wharves, piers, etc., on any land bordering on any navigable bay within the corporate limits. The city claimed, as the defendants do in the case at bar, that the state had granted to it the right to construct and maintain wharves. It was held that the power and authority conferred did not convey to the city the state's land, or clothe the city with the absolute right to construct a wharf at any point on its water front which it might select, irrespective of the rights of others, but granted the city the power to erect docks the same as a natural person.

In regard to the high-water mark the circuit court found as follows: "That the line of ordinary high water in the left bank of the Willamette river at the present time, and at the time of the commencement of this suit, was and is located over and across the said river block in Watson's addition and the said river block No. 2 in Doscher's addition, and easterly of the easterly line of said Front street, which said Front street was continued on its course through said Doscher's addition at the time of the platting thereof."

The line of ordinary high water is the line to which the water rises in the seasons of ordinary high water, or the line at which the presence of water is continued for such length of time as to mark upon the soil and vegetation a distinct character. Johnson v. Knott, 13 Or. 308, 10 Pac. 418; Sun Dial Ranch v. May Land Co. 61 Or. 205, 119 Pac. 758. This line should be ascertained by an examination of the bed and banks of the river, and by taking into consideration all the circumstances and all the natural objects connected therewith, and by ascertaining where the presence and action of water are so common and usual and so long continued in all ordinary years as to mark upon the soil of the bed a character distinct from that of the banks. The learned judge who tried the case appears to have been acquainted with the locus in quo to a certain extent, and, as we understand, examined the same. This would lend great weight to the findings. While we do not deem the question vitally material, from an examination of the evidence upon this point, we think that this finding was correct, and manifestly should not be disturbed.

It is claimed by defendants that, even if plaintiff were considered as having a vested riparian right or wharf right, such right is subject to the implied reservation on the part of the state and its agencies to use the locus in quo for the purpose of constructing public docks, wharves, and other improvements in aid of navigation and commerce.

To further notice the trend of the decisions in the different states, we note the following in the case of State ex rel. Ellis v. Gerbing, 56 Fla. 603, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 337, at page 343, 47 So. 353: The rights of the people of the state in the navigable waters and the lands thereunder, including the shores or space between ordinary high and low water marks in the state, are designed for the public welfare, and the state may regulate such rights and the uses of the waters and the lands thereunder for the benefit of the whole people of the state as circumstances may demand, subject to the right of navigation, the control of which was surrendered to the Federal government by the Constitution. The shores of a navigable river are the spaces between high and low water marks, and the bed of a river includes the shores. Tideland is that daily covered and uncovered by water by the ordinary flux and reflux of normal tides (citing 1 Farnham, Waters, 227; Baer v. Moran Bros. Co. 153 U. S. 287, 38 L. ed. 718, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 823; Baird v. Campbell, 67 App. Div. 104, 73 N. Y. Supp. 617). In the above case it was also held that, for the purpose of aiding navigation or commerce, or of encouraging new industries and the development of natural or artificial resources, the state may grant reasonable and limited rights and privileges to individuals, to erect docks, wharves, and slips over shallow waters to reach navigable portions thereof, or to fill in shallow waters adjacent to navigable waters and erect structures thereon, for the purposes of commerce incidental to navigation on the waters; or the state may grant reasonable and limited privileges for planting and propagating oysters or shellfish on land covered by waters of navigable streams; but such privileges should not unreasonably impair the rights of the whole people of the state in the use of the waters or the lands thereunder for the purposes implied by law (citing State v. Black River Phosphate Co. 32 Fla. 82, 21 L.R.A. 189, 13 So. 640. It was further held in the case of State ex rel. Ellis v. Gerbing, supra, which is cited and relied on by the state in the case at bar, that the title to lands under navigable waters, including the shores or space between ordinary high and low water marks, is held by the state, by virtue of its sovereignty, in trust for the people of the state for navigation and other useful purposes afforded by the waters over such lands, and the trustees of the internal improvement fund of the state are not authorized to convey the title to the lands of this character.

In the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, it was held that the trust with which these lands are held by the state is governmental, and cannot be wholly alienated. For the purpose of enhancing and improving the rights and interests of the whole people, the state may, by appropriate means, grant to individuals the title to limited portions of the lands, or give individuals limited privileges therein, but not so as to divert them from their proper uses, or so as to relieve the state of the control and regulation of the uses afforded by the land and water. In that case the state of Illinois had granted to the railroad company a right of way 200 feet wide from Cairo to Chicago over the lands and waters of the state, and by consent of the city the right of way was located along the margin of Lake Michigan, and an embankment raised and so protected from the violence of storms on the lake as to make the way safe as a roadbed. From water front lots owned by it adjacent to this levee, the company built docks, extending out to deep water of the lake. Afterwards the legislature of that state passed a law granting to the company the bed of the lake along a mile and a half of the city water front, and extending a mile out into and including most of the outer harbor. This law was repealed by a subsequent legislature. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the repeal was a valid exercise of legislative power, for the reason that the law repealed undertook to invest the railroad company with rights inimical to navigation and commerce, and assumed to grant lands subject to the navigable waters of the lake. The use and enjoyment of its embankment, which occupied part of the original margin of the lake and the water thereof, and the maintenance of its docks by the company, were protected in that case, subject to the condition that they should not extend into the lake beyond the point of practical navigability.

By an act of the legislature, the state of Florida, in aid of commerce, vests in the United States or citizens thereof, owning lands actually bounded by and extending to the low-water mark on navigable streams, bays, and harbors, title to the submerged lands in front of the abutting lands as far to the edge of the channel, for the purpose of filling up from the shore, bank, or beach, and of erecting structures thereon in aid of commerce, not obstructing the channel, but leaving the full space for the requirements of commerce. Gen. Stat. (Fla.) 1906, §§ 643, 644.

In a note to State ex rel. Ellis v. Gerbing, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 337, it is said: "There seems little doubt of the correctness of the general proposition that the title to tidelands is in the state, and may pass therefrom by grant. Such, indeed, was the specific conclusion reached in the following cases: Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 563; Mumford v. Wardwell, 6 Wall. 423, 18 L. ed. 756; Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 124 U. S. 656, 31 L. ed. 543, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 643,"—and a long list of other cases.

In Jones v. Oemler, 110 Ga. 202, 35 S. E. 375, it was said that there could be no question but that the state owned the beds of all rivers within its jurisdiction, and that it had an absolute control over such lands as it had over any other property it might own, with the same power to grant, sell, or lease it, or any portion thereof, to any of its citizens, upon terms or conditions which its legislature might prescribe, to the same extent that it would have the right to dispose of its wild or other lands. This proposition, sometimes laid down in broad and unrestricted terms, must be understood with the qualifications that the right of a state to grant tidelands is subject to those provisions of the national Constitution giving Congress control of the waters upon which foreign and interstate navigation is conducted. Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 10 L. ed. 997; United States v. Mission Rock Co. 189 U. S. 391, 47 L. ed. 865, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606; Richardson v. United States (C. C.) 100 Fed. 714; Mobile Transp. Co. v. Mobile, 128 Ala. 335, 64 L.R.A. 333; 86 Am. St. Rep. 143, 30 So. 645, affirmed in 187 U. S. 479, 47 L. ed. 266, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 170.

In Weber v. State Harbor Comrs. 18 Wall. 57, 65, 21 L. ed. 798, 801, it was held that, upon the admission of a state into the Union upon equal footing with original states, absolute property in, and dominion and sovereignty over, all soil under tide waters within her limits, passed to the state, with the consequent right to dispose of the title to any part of the soil in such manner as she might deem proper, subject only to the paramount right of navigation of the waters so far as such navigation might be required by the necessities of commerce with foreign nations or among the several states, the regulation of which was vested in the general government.

In Eisenbach v. Hatfield, 2 Wash. 236, 244, 12 L.R.A. 632, 26 Pac. 539, it was said that there was no doubt whatever but that tidelands belonged to the state in actual propriety, and that the state had full power to dispose of the same, subject to no restrictions save those imposed upon the legislature by the Constitution of the state and by the Constitution of the United States. In a few earlier cases the courts attempted to impose a trust in favor of the public upon the state's title to tidelands, thereby, to some extent at least, restricting the right of the state to grant the same.

Thus, in Ward v. Mulford, 32 Cal. 365, it was held that, while tidelands belong to the state by virtue of her sovereignty, yet the state held the same for the benefit of the people, and theoretically, at least, could make no disposal of such lands prejudicial to the rights of the public to use them for the purposes of navigation and fishery. This conclusion was quoted with approval in People ex rel. Harbor Comrs. v. Kerber, 152 Cal. 731, 125 Am. St. Rep. 93, 93 Pac. 878.

It has been said that the true limit of this trust doctrine has been best set forth in the New York decisions. In People v. New York & S. I. Ferry Co. 68 N. Y. 71, the court said: "The title to lands under tide waters in this country, which before the Revolution was vested in the King, became, upon the separation of the colonies, vested in the states within which they were situated. The people of the state in their right of sovereignty succeeded to the royal title, and through the legislature 'may exercise the same powers which, previous to the Revolution, could have been exercised by the King alone, or by him in conjunction with Parliament, subject only to those restrictions which have been imposed by the Constitution of the state and of the United States.' Chancellor in Lansing v. Smith, 4 Wend. 9, 21 Am. Dec. 89. The public right in navigable waters was in no way affected or impaired by the change of title. The state, in place of the Crown, holds the title as trustee of a public trust, but the legislature may, as the representative of the people, grant the soil, or confer an exclusive privilege in tide waters, or authorize a use inconsistent with the public right, subject to the paramount control of Congress."

Coming back to our own state in Hume v. Rogue River Packing Co. 51 Or. 237, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 398, 131 Am. St. Rep. 732, 83 Pac. 391, 92 Pac. 1065, 96 Pac. 865, it was held that the state, by its admission into the Union by virtue of its sovereignty, became vested with the title to all tidelands, subject, however, to the public right of navigation and the common rights of the citizens of the state to fish therein.

In the early case of Hinman v. Warren, 6 Or. 408, 411, tideland on the Columbia river was involved, and was described in a patent from the United States to John McClure and wife. The plaintiff claimed title to it by a chain of conveyances from the McClures, and the defendant by deed from the state. Mr. Justice McArthur said, in substance, that the tidelands which are covered and uncovered by the ebb and flow of the sea belong to the state of Oregon by virtue of its sovereignty, and, adopting the principle common in cases from Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224, said: "As the state became the owner of the tidelands, it had the power, under the provisions of the act providing for the sale of such lands, . . . to sell the same. It has, however, no authority to dispose of its tidelands in such a manner as may interfere with the free and untrammelled navigation of its rivers, bays, inlets, and the like. The grantees of the state took the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

land subject to every easement growing out of the right of navigation inherent in the public." This was quoted and approved in the leading case of Bowlby v. Shively, 22 Or. 410, 30 Pac. 154; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 54, 38 L. ed. 331, 351, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548. Mr. Justice Lord, at page 417 of 22 Or. of the opinion, said: "Some contention is made that the phrase which describes the ownership of the state as being 'by virtue of its sovereignty' indicates that the title held by the state to such lands is as trustee for the public, and not as absolute owner, capable of conveying private rights therein, subject only to the paramount right of navigation. But the use of this phrase in that case was not designed to convey that meaning, when considered with reference to the whole decision. The contention was that the title of the tidelands, before the admission of the state into the Union, was in the United States and subject to its disposal; and, as it had granted away by its patent the tidelands in question before the state was admitted, no rights of the state ever attached to them. The court refused to accede to this view, but, adopting the reasoning of Pollard v. Hagan, supra, held that the state, upon its admission into the Union, became the owner of the tidelands, not as a grantee of the United States, but by virtue of its sovereignty; that the state had the right to dispose of such tidelands under the provisions of the statute referred to providing for their sale, and that its grantees took them subject only to the paramount right of navigation existing in favor of the public." In the same case it is declared that the prior adjudged cases in this state regarding the nature of the state's title to lands between high and low water marks are the foundation of the doctrine that the state may sell and convey its tidelands, and that its grantees take them free from any right therein by the upland owner, and subject only to the paramount right of navigation inherent in the public.

Mr. Justice Boise, in Parker v. Taylor, 7 Or. 435, at page 446, said: "As has been before stated, the patent from the United States conferred on the patentee no right to the tidelands lying between high and low water. These were the property of the state and absolutely at its disposal. Its deed gives to them the same fee simple title as the patent from the United States gave to the land above high tide. . . . Land situated as this is, covered with shoal water, may, under proper regulations by the state and municipal authorities, be reclaimed from the sea by filling in or by driving piles and building on them, and becomes private property and the subject of sale the same as any other property."

The view that the state is the absolute owner of the tidelands, subject only to the paramount right of navigation, is further illustrated in the case of Parker v. Rogers, 8 Or. 183. At page 189 of 8 Or. of the opinion, Mr. Justice Boise, speaking for the court, said: "We are aware that it is a general rule that what is appurtenant to land passes with it, being an incorporeal hereditament, but the right to build a wharf on the land of the state below high water is a franchise which attaches to the tideland, and it is appurtenant to it rather than to the adjacent land, for it can be severed from the adjacent land and enjoyed without it."

In Corvallis & E. R. Co. v. Benson, 61 Or. 359, 121 Pac. 418, Mr. Justice Burnett, speaking for the court, after an examination of many authorities, held that the title to the tidelands between high and low water marks acquired by the state consisted of two elements: Jus privatum, or private right, and the jus publicum, or public right,—the jus privatum being a species of private property which the state held the same as a private owner and might grant to anyone, in any manner, or for any purpose not forbidden by the Constitution, the grantee thereby taking the title as absolutely as under a private conveyance; but the jus publicum, being the dominion of sovereignty in the state, by which it prevents any use of lands bordering on navigable waters which would materially interfere with navigation and commerce thereon, cannot be abdicated or granted.

Much reliance is placed by the defendants on the opinion in the case of Sage v. New York, 154 N. Y. 61, 38 L.R.A. 606, 61 Am. St. Rep. 592, 47 N. E. 1096, wherein it was held that the absolute power to improve a water front for the benefit of navigation exists in the state or in its municipal grantee as a trustee for the public, free from any interference by riparian owner, whose sole right as against such authority was the statutory right of pre-emption in case of a sale; the riparian owner never having exercised such right of pre-emption, and having no title or interest in the land under water in front of his premises.

In Lewis v. Portland, supra, 25 Or. at page 167, in discussing the wharfage act, it was said: "It is doubtless true that, if the statute should be repealed or the adjacent tidelands disposed of, the privilege given the upland owner to build a wharf across the tidelands into deep water, unless acted upon or availed of, would be revoked."

In the case at bar the adjacent overflowed land has been conveyed by the state to the upland owner. However, an upland owner of land bordering on a navigable stream owns only to the high-water line, and the stream and the river and its banks and bed belong to the state. State v. Portland General Electric Co. 52 Or. 502, 95 Pac. 722, 98 Pac. 160.

In Coquille Mill & Mercantile Co. v. Johnson, 52 Or. 547, at page 549, 132 Am. St. Rep. 716, 98 Pac. 132, it is held that, as the land abutted upon the Coquille river, which is navigable at the point in question, by virtue of the act of October 21, 1876, of the legislative assembly of this state (Sess. Laws 1876, p. 69), Gilman's title was extended to low-water mark. At page 551 of 52 Or., the following is quoted with approval: "Riparian owners upon navigable fresh rivers and lakes may construct, in the shoal water in front of their land, wharves, piers, landings, and booms, in aid of, and not obstructing, navigation,"—citing 2 Gould, Waters, 2d ed. § 179; Montgomery v. Shaver, 40 Or. 244, 66 Pac. 923; Stevens Point Boom Co. v. Reilly, 44 Wis. 295; Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. ed. 206.

In regard to tideland, in Grant v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 49 Or. 324, at page 328, 90 Pac. 179, Mr. Justice Eakin said: "By the legislative acts of 1872 (Laws 1872, pp. 129, 130) and 1874 (Laws 1874, pp. 76, 77), the upland owner was given the preference right to purchase the tideland, and upon such purchase, if not already vested in another under § 4042, Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, he thereby acquired also the exclusive wharfage right to deep water, and also all accretions to his tideland, and the right to fill up the shallows or flats, so long as he does not impede navigation or interfere with commerce over the same,"—citing Miller v. Mendenhall, 43 Minn. 95, 8 L.R.A. 89, 19 Am. St. Rep. 219, 44 N. W. 1141.

In Montgomery v. Shaver, 40 Or. 244, at page 248, 66 Pac. 923, at page 924, Mr. Justice Wolverton, referring to the wharf act, said: "The statute is, however, declarative of the right or privilege which existed at common law, the exercise of which might be regulated by statute; but so long as it was not prohibited, it existed as a private right derived from the passive or implied license by the public. Gould, Waters, § 176. So that the enactment of § 4227 [Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes] gave positive authority where it previously existed passively and by implication."

In many states lands totally or partially submerged are made the subject of grant by the sovereign, in order that they may be reclaimed for useful purposes. Taylor Sands Fishing Co. v. State Land Board, 56 Or. 157, 161, 108 Pac. 126; Fowler v. Wood, 73

Kan. 511, 549, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162, 117 Am. St. Rep. 534, 85 Pac. 763.

A grant by the sovereign of land bounded by a navigable river limits the land conveyed to high-water mark, and gives the grantee no private or exclusive right below that. In such case the grant is exclusively a grant of dry land, and is to be construed without reference to the water just as if it were bounded on all sides by dry land. But when the sovereign state grants land under water, which cannot, in its natural state, be subjected to any of the uses to which dry land may be devoted, then a different rule of construction must be applied to the grant, so as to make it effectual for some purpose. Such a grant may be made to enable the grantee to fill up the land for wharves, docks, or other buildings. If the purpose be not plainly expressed in the grant, then the intent of the parties must be ascertained from the nature and situation of the land granted and all the circumstances surrounding the grant which may properly be considered for the purpose of ascertaining such intent. Langdon v. New York, 93 N. Y. 129, 144.

In the light of the authorities, and upon principle, we conclude that the state of Oregon, upon its admission into the Union, became the owner of the bed and banks of the Willamette river up to the line of ordinary high water, subject only to the paramount right of navigation and the right of Congress to regulate commerce between the states.

By the platting and dedication of Watson's and Doscher's additions by the former owners, thereby laying out the property in blocks and lots constituting definite metes and bounds, as shown on the maps, and by the conveyances of lots with reference to the maps, the wharf rights were severed and disassociated from all the inside lots, and attached to the outermost ones. Grant v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 49 Or. 330, 90 Pac. 178, 1099.

The act of 1862 (§ 5201, L. O. L.) grants the right of wharfage across the state's land out to the harbor line fixed by state authority, to the riparian owner. This license has never been revoked by the state, but has been reaffirmed by the lawmakers and upheld by the courts. The contemplated use of the land is not inimical to navigation. On the other hand, it is plain to anyone that the industries of commerce and manufacture with which the shore of the Willamette in our metropolis teems, and the storing of the articles and products, as well as the construction of docks and wharves, are an acceleration to navigation. The legislature, considering that the lands adjacent to the Willamette, Couquille, Coos, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) and Umpqua rivers were subject to erosion and inundation, deemed it wise and just to recognize rights in the riparian owners on such streams, and grant and confirm to them all the title of the state to any tide and overflowed lands upon said rivers. This, no doubt, among other reasons, in order that the owners of land adjacent to such rivers might be encouraged and protected in building structures thereon, and riprapping and conserving the banks of the rivers for the purpose of saving their lands from loss or destruction.

The acts of 1874 and 1876 were a valid exercise of the legislative will, and granted and confirmed the title of the state to the tide and overflowed land upon said rivers to the upland owners. Plaintiff has succeeded to the title which the state formerly had in the lots described. Its title is subject to the paramount right of navigation existing in the public, and subject to such reasonable regulation as the state through its municipality may prescribe.

To allow this property to be taken for public use without just compensation would work a great injustice, and do violence to the Constitution of Oregon.

The restrictions upon the state conveying land subjacent to the waters of navigable rivers should, we think, generally speaking, apply to lands under navigable waters, or below ordinary low-water mark, or the bed proper of a river as distinguished from its bank or shore as in the Chicago Water Front Case.

These considerations lead to an affirmance of the decree of the lower court, and the decree is therefore affirmed.

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA, Resp.,
v.
CARL HOLTER, Appt.

(— S. D. —, 142 N. W. 657.)

Seduction — prior chastity — necessity of proof.

1. Under a statute making seduction of woman of previous chaste character punishable, prior chastity must be proved, and cannot be presumed; at least, where such was the judicial interpretation of the statute in the state from which it was adopted.

Appeal — error in instructions — existence of evidence.

2. Error in instructing the jury in a

Note. — For presumption and burden of proof as to chastity where it is an ingredient of the offense or a condition of conviction, see the note to State v. Kelly, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 476.

prosecution for seduction that prosecutrix is presumed to have been chaste until the contrary is shown is not corrected by the fact that there was evidence sufficient to have supported a finding of chastity by the jury.

Witness — impeaching — contradicting answer on cross-examination.

3. Prosecutrix in a proceeding for seduction, who has testified on cross-examination that during the time when the alleged illicit relations existed she was not receiving attentions from other men, may be impeached by evidence that she was receiving such attentions at the time; at least if such evidence also tends to weaken the corroboration of prosecutrix found in evidence of attentions by accused.

Criminal law — seduction — instruction — corroboration.

4. The court must, in a prosecution for seduction, explain to the jury the particular elements of the offense in regard to which the testimony of prosecutrix must be corroborated, and what facts and circumstances are to be considered as corroborative.

Same — evidence — competence — sufficiency.

5. The use of the word "sufficient," instead of "competent," in an instruction in a prosecution for seduction that the fact that accused and prosecutrix acted "as lovers usually do, and other like circumstances," if shown, are "sufficient to constitute corroborative evidence," is error.

(June 3, 1913.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Charles Mix County convicting him of seduction. Reversed.

A decision was reached and an opinion handed down on December 3, 1912, affirming the conviction. The facts were stated by Corson, J., in rendering the opinion as follows:

Upon an information duly filed by the state's attorney of Charles Mix county the defendant was tried and convicted of the crime of seduction under a promise of marriage, and, from the judgment of conviction and order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed to this court.

It is disclosed by the evidence that the prosecutrix was a young lady twenty-two years of age, and that the defendant was a young man residing in the vicinity of the family of the prosecutrix. It is claimed by the prosecutrix that on the evening of June 18, 1911, she was seduced by the defendant under a promise of marriage. There was evidence tending to prove that the defendant took the prosecutrix out riding occasionally, visited her at the home of her parents prior to the date of the alleged seduction, and that, after the alleged seduction, de- 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fendant continued his attentions, and that there were other acts of illicit intercourse between the defendant and the prosecutrix in July and August, and that by reason of her seduction she became enccinte.

Subsequently a petition for rehearing was filed and granted, after which a decision was reached, reversing the conviction, which renders the former opinion immaterial.

Messrs. Charles P. Bates, Charles H. Bartelt, and Perrett F. Gault, for appellant:

Evidence tending to prove acts of sexual intercourse, under promise of marriage, between defendant and the prosecuting witness, subsequent to the act charged in the information and testified to by the prosecuting witness, is inadmissible.

Polley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before the court on rehearing. The former opinion is reported in — S. D. —, 138 N. W. 953, where a statement of facts will be found. In his petition for a rehearing the appellant contends that a number of his assignments that were argued in his brief were either passed over, and not considered by the court, or were not given the consideration to which they were entitled. These assignments are errors that are alleged to have been committed by the court, both in its instructions to the jury and in refusing to admit certain testimony offered on behalf of the defendant at the trial. On a re-examination of the record the court is of the opinion that the appellant is right in his contention, and we shall give our attention to a review of the alleged errors.

The first matter complained of by the appellant, is an instruction by the court, which is as follows: "With reference to this provision of the law in regard to previous chaste character, the court charges that the law presumes a woman to be of chaste character until the contrary is shown; but, if there is a reasonable doubt, as I will hereinafter define it, of her chastity, under all of the evidence, he would be entitled to the benefit of that doubt." The question presented by this assignment is one relating to the material rights of the defendant. The question of law laid down by the court by the instruction, to wit, "the law presumes a woman to be of chaste character until the contrary is shown," assumes the existence of one of the material elements of the offense, and dispenses with any proof thereof on the part of the prosecution. But it even goes further than that; for, by using the words, "but if there is a reasonable doubt, as I shall hereinafter define it, of her chastity, under all of the evidence, he would be entitled to the benefit of that doubt," the court, by implication at least, cast upon the defendant the burden of proving the negative of one of the material allegations in the information, or to that extent it required him to prove his innocence; for, if the prosecutrix is to be presumed to be of chaste character until the contrary is shown, then that is an existing fact, and is free from any doubt whatever. The prosecution is not required to furnish any proof of that allegation, and therefore any doubt to be raised thereon must be the result of proof furnished by the defendant. This, of course, would be an invasion of defendant's constitutional rights; and, after a careful consideration of the question, we are of the opinion that the court erred in this instruction to the jury, and that the defendant's rights were prejudiced thereby.

We are not unmindful of the presumption of the chastity of every woman until the contrary is shown, and that it ought to be recognized wherever it can legally be done. In fact this presumption of chastity and virtue of womanhood is the very foundation of our social fabric. Chastity is the rule, and we believe that we might say it is the fact in the case of every woman until her chastity has been lost or debauched by the false promises, cajolery, or other deceitful wiles practised upon her by some member of the opposite sex. But, conceding all this to be true, this presumption of chastity has no place, and cannot be indulged in a prosecution for seduction under our statute. The offense is purely statutory, and as defined by the statute it consists of four concurrent, essential elements, the existence of each of which is necessary to constitute the crime. These elements are: First, under promise of marriage; second, to have illicit connection; third, with an unmarried female; fourth, of previous chaste character. So far as the statute is concerned, these elements are all of equal importance; each is an allegation of an independent fact, and it is necessary that each be alleged in the indictment or information. To warrant a conviction, the jury must be satisfied, and that beyond a reasonable doubt, of the truth of each. Evidence may be at hand to prove, to an absolute certainty, the existence of either three of the elements of the offense, but, without the existence of the other no conviction can be had or sustained. This being the case, how can it be said that proof of either of these allegations can be dispensed with; or, if proof of one could be dispensed with, why not of another, or two for that matter? If a court could hold that a woman is to be presumed to be chaste until the contrary is shown, and thereby dispense with proof of her chastity, why could he not also presume that a chaste female would not submit to illicit intercourse except under promise of marriage, and thereby dispense with the necessity of proving the promise to marry? Or he might hold that a promise to marry, being a mutual agreement, implies that the parties are capable of entering into a valid marriage; and therefore the female would be presumed to be unmarried, and thus dispense with evidence to prove that she is unmarried. Of course any of these propositions would be absurd, but one is not more absurd than the other, for the indulgence of any of these presumptions would overcome the defendant's presumption of innocence until his guilt be shown, and relieve the state of the burden of establishing his guilt by evidence on the trial, as is required by law.

There is a conflict of authority in the decisions of the various states upon the question involved in this instruction, but an examination of the cases and the statutes under which they were rendered will show that the conflict is more apparent than real. While many, if not most, of the states have statutes defining and making seduction a criminal offense, there is considerable difference in the wording of the various statutes, and most of the decisions are based upon the wording of the particular statute under which the prosecution is had. Our statute on this subject was originally adopted from the laws of Wisconsin. The statute of that state was adopted there in 1849, and is as follows: "Any unmarried man who, under promise of marriage, or any married man, who shall seduce and have illicit connection with any unmarried female of previous chaste character, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished," etc. Rev. Stat. 1849, chap. 139, § 6.

Very soon thereafter, in West v. State, 1 Wis. 209, the question involved in this case came squarely before the supreme court of that state. The indictment alleged, and there was evidence to prove, that the prosecutrix was a female of previous chaste character, but the trial court instructed the jury that the law presumes that the prosecutrix was a chaste female previous to the commission of the offense alleged against the defendant. In considering this instruction, the court said: "The previous chaste character of the female is one of the most essential elements of the offense; made so by the express words of the statute, in conformity with the suggestions of sound reason. A prostitute may be the subject of rape, but not of seduction. It is the chastity of the female which the statute is designed to protect. The pre-existence of that chastity is a sine qua [quo] non to the commission of the crime. That is the subject of legal guardianship, provided by this section. It is a substantive matter necessary to be averred and proved."

With this interpretation of the statute in full force, the legislature of Dakota territory, by § 6, of chapter 10, of the Laws of Dakota, 1862-63, adopted the Wisconsin law verbatim, and by the well-recognized rule of statutory construction the adoption of this statute by the territorial legislature was an adoption of the construction already put upon it by the supreme court of the state from which it was adopted. So there can be no question about the meaning of that statute, from the time it became a part of the territorial law, nor that the construction put upon it there was adopted as much as the law itself.

Our statute remained in its original form until 1865, when the present statute (§ 336, Rev. Penal Code) was adopted from the laws of the state of New York, where it was enacted in 1848, and later on incorporated into the Penal Code, prepared by the Field Code Commission. While the Field Code was not adopted in New York until 1882, it was adopted in its entirety by the legislature of Dakota territory, by an act approved January 11, 1865, and our present statute appears as § 330 of chapter 17, Session Laws of 1864-65. It is different in one respect from the Wisconsin statute, but the portion of it involved in this case was not changed, and there is nothing to indicate that a new construction should be put upon the unchanged portion.

Our attention has not been called to any case decided by the court of appeals of New York that turned upon the precise question involved in this case. Kenyon v. People, 26 N. Y. 204, 84 Am. Dec. 177, cited by the state, does not support the contention of respondent. It appears from an examination of the opinion of the court in that case that the prosecutrix testified to her being of previous chaste character, and Balcom, J., in his concurring opinion said it was proper for the state to show this fact.

The case of People v. Brewer, 27 Mich. 134, cited and relied upon by the respondent, is easily distinguished from the case at 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)
